The annual Festival Service of the Girls' Friendly Society in the diocese was held on the evening of April 28 in St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit. Gowned in white and wearing the blue veils signifying membership in the organization, representatives of every branch in metropolitan Detroit and several outside of Detroit, formed a procession and marched into the Cathedral preceded by the choir and clergy.

The service was conducted by the Very Rev. Kirk B. O'Ferrall, D. D., Dean of the Cathedral, and the Ven. Leonard P. Hagger, Archdeacon of the Diocese. Music was furnished by the Adult Choristers under the direction of Francis A. Mackay, Organist and Master of the Cathedral Choristers.

Bishop Hobson Urges Meditation and Study on Church as Means of Increasing Interest of Laymen.

Over sixty Episcopal laymen from the Church of the Holy Comforter, Burlington, N. C., and surrounding towns and cities participated in an enthusiastic and inspiring dinner meeting at the Parish House in behalf of the Forward Movement of the Episcopal Church.

The address of Bishop Henry W. Hobson, of Southern Ohio, who is also chairman of the National Forward Movement Commission, was the feature of the evening. Music for the occasion was furnished by the Burlington Male quartet.

The toastmaster, R. A. Williams, president of the Holy Comforter Laymen's League, enlivened the occasion by witty introductions of several guests present from Durham, Winston-Salem, Hillsboro, Greensboro and Leaksville-Spray.

Charter Presented.

Before the main speech of the evening, the framed charter of the local Laymen's League was presented to the officers by Bishop Hobson, acting in his capacity as a member of the National Laymen's League body.

The Rev. David T. Eaton, pastor of the church, presented Bishop Hobson in a personal vein, recalling incidents of their previous association on the staff of All Saints' Church, Worcester, Mass., where Mr. Eaton began his ministry under Bishop Hobson's leadership. The Bishop impressed everyone present with his frank and open personality, and his engaging manner.

It was this unique capacity for winning people that led the General Convention of the Episcopal Church at its triennial session in Atlantic City last fall to choose Bishop Hobson as head of the Forward Movement Commission, and to charge him with the leadership of reinvigorating the spiritual life of the Church and rehabilitating its national, diocesan, and parochial life. The Bishop emphasized the fact that there is nothing new in the movement, which represents a concerted effort to recall inactive members of the Church to a more loyal and vigorous discipleship to the Master.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop.

One Hundredth and Fourth Convention.

The diocese of Alabama is in the throes of revising and republishing its diocesan canons, the consideration of which occupied much of the attention of its one hundredth and fourth convention, meeting May 15-16, at Trinity Church, Florence. This city is in the heart of the Tennessee Valley, at Muscle Shoals, and only three miles from Wilson Dam, the largest concrete dam in the world.

The Rt. Rev. William G. McDowell. D. D., Bishop of the diocese, in his annual address, pointed to the tremendous development of the Tennessee Valley as offering a ready field for the Church's advance, and as a reminder that the Church's business is to inject the spiritual element in all man-made schemes for human development.

As an indication of improved conditions in the diocese, the salaries of the Bishop and of the secretary of the diocese were restored to approximately their pre-depression proportions.

At the request of the Bishop, a committee on evaluation was appointed with a view to giving diocesan aid more to growing missionary projects, and less to those showing little sign of progress. Drastic action, based on the findings of this committee, is expected at the next annual convention.

At the public service Wednesday evening, the Rev. William A. Thompson, was formally instituted as rector of Trinity Church by Bishop McDowell. Following this act, several short missionary addresses were heard. Among them was a talk by the Rev. R. C. Fletcher, missionary to the deaf in the Province of Sewanee, and one by Chief Walker, of a settlement of Indians in Southern Alabama, ministered to by the Rev. E. V. Edwards.

Prior to this service there was a banquet and business session of the Diocesan Laymen's League in the parish house, at which Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, nationally known, was the principal speaker. At the same hour the clergy were guests of the neighboring C. C. C. Camp, where they made an inspection of the grounds and buildings. After a bountiful meal they were invited to inspect the kitchen, equipped with every modern device, where the meal was prepared.

MISSIONARY DISTRICT OF WESTERN NEBRASKA.

Rt. Rev. Ernest V. Shayler, D. D., Bishop.

Conference Time at Hand.

Summer conference plans are in the forefront. Programs are now printed and being widely circulated. Conference begins June 17, at Doane College, Crete, Nebr., with the Bishop acting as President. Courses on the "Acts", Y. P. F., Missions, the Prayer Book, Church Schools, and Personal Religion are being offered, by the Rev. Messrs. Gordon Brant, Harry S. Longley, Jr., F. P. Houghton and Mrs. A. J. Ford, and some local leaders. Conference lasts from Monday, June 17 to 24.

Bishop Shayler delivered the baccalaureate sermon this year to the graduating class of the Municipal University, at Trinity Cathedral.

A dinner to the newly confirmed at the Country Club was an unusual feature of the Bishop's recent visit to St. Matthew's, Lincoln. The vestry and officers of the church sponsored the dinner and reception which followed.

At the Sunday School Rally for the Northern Deanery, Norfolk, Neligh, Wayne and Columbus Schools were represented. The Rev. Luther Gramly, formerly Archdeacon of Nebraska, gave the address. About 150 children were present.

Annual Convocation.

The forty-fifth annual convocation was held at St. Luke's Church, Kearney, May 7 and 8. Preceding the convocation proper, there was an informal reception at the Ft. Kearney Hotel Monday evening.

The convocation was opened with the celebration of the Holy Communion in St. Luke's Church with the Rt. Rev. George A. Beecher, Missionary Bishop of Western Nebraska, as celebrant, assisted by the Rev. A. H. Marsden, rector of St. Luke's Parish and the Very Rev. Francis R. Lee, Dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, Hastings.

Taking a bird's-eye view of the District as a whole, the Bishop in his annual address, showed in spite of curtailed resources and loss in man power; yet in parishes and missions distinct advances have been made. He also laid emphasis upon the desirability for a more complete and adequate training of men who enter the priesthood, recommending for them some sort of clinical experience, or internship before they are actively assigned to parochial work.

The joint sessions Wednesday morning had for its principal feature, an address by the Rev. Jerome L. Fritsche, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Scottsbluff, and Rural Dean of the Scottsbluff Deanery. The subject of his address was Discipleship. In this address he made an appeal for deeper spiritual life on the part of the clergy and laity; splendidly supplementing the message that had been given the previous day by Dr. Block of St. Louis.

The sessions of the Woman's Auxiliary were held concurrently with the convocation. Mrs. Floyd Curran, of McCook, Nebraska, was the Presiding Officer at these sessions.

The convocation appointed a committee of five, under the chairmanship of the Very Rev. Francis R. Lee, Dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, Hastings, to formulate suitable plans for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. George A. Beecher, D. D. This celebration will be held in the Pro-Cathedral on St. Andrew's Day, November 30.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, D. D. Bishop.

Belongs to Everyone.

"In this respect," the Bishop said, "the Forward Movement belongs to everyone, and becomes the responsibility of every member of the Church, not simply that of the body of men comprising the commission." While making some pointed comments on the declining influence of the Church in some quarters, the Bishop refused to be set down as a pessimist, declaring that there was abundant evidence throughout the thirty-five dioceses of the Church he had visited in the past six months, not only for a growing concern, but a reawakening of Church people to a sense of their responsibility as Church members.

The commission, the Bishop said, has picked out the period after Easter, which usually marks a slump in the Church's work, as a time for continued devotion and study. "If an insurance man knew as little about his business," declared the Bishop, "as the average church member knows about his Church, its history, its organization and its work, then he would starve to death." He appealed to the laymen to inform themselves about their Church, and then to set about doing something for their church. The fact was emphasized that the Forward Movement is not a financial drive, but a nationwide spiritual appeal which will result in increased church attendance and in strengthening of Sunday schools.

Addresses Women.

The Bishop recommended an every member visitation on the part of the laymen, not with a view of collecting money, but to get acquainted with fellow church members.

Bishop Hobson celebrated the Holy Communion in the parish church and addressed a large group of women on the Forward Movement.

The Illimitability of the Supernatural.

A storm swept through the Universal Club, Providence, composed chiefly of liberal clergy from about all the Protestant sects in this part of New England, when the Rev. Anthony R. Parshley, a member and the rector of St. Michael's Church, Bristol, a while ago read before them his now celebrated paper, "The Illimitability of the Supernatural". The religious editor of the Providence Journal was present, and through him the whole State heard about it. Later the essay was published, word for word, in Mr. Parshley's "Parish Monthly", a large organ of parochial news, taking up the four columns of the first page, half of the second and running over onto the third. Two columns of editorial completed the presentation.

PENTECOST, COMMONLY CALLED WHITSUNDAY.

The Collect.

O God, Who as at this time didst teach the hearts of Thy faithful people, by sending to them the light of Thy Holy Spirit; Grant us by the same Spirit to have a right judgment in all things, and evermore to rejoice in His holy comfort; through the merits of Christ Jesus our Saviour, who liveth and reigneth with Thee, in the unity of the same Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

THESE ARE THE GIFTS I ASK.

These are the gifts I ask
Of Thee, Spirit serene.
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,

Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load,
And for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy at all things heard and seen.

These are the things I fain
Would have Thee take away:
Malice and cold disdain,
Hot anger, sullen hate,

Scorn of the lowly, envy of the great,
And discontent that casts a shadow gray
On all the brightness of the common day.

The Work of the Holy Spirit.

The Spirit does not work in hidden ways that we cannot see and follow, but along definite lines of truth and experience. He comes to convince the world of sin and righteousness and judgment. We might have thought that Christ would send the Spirit to reveal from time to time new and ever more startling truths about science and philosophy and especially about the social order; but sin and righteousness and judgment are among the oldest and simplest truths in the world. They date back to Eden and are more or less known by all the people in the world.

But are they any the less important on this account? Shall we discard bread because it has fed the race for thousands of years or blow out the sun because it has been burning so long in the sky? The best things in the world are old things: old mountains and rivers, old inventions, old literature and art. Things that last through the centuries have in them some substance and vitality that the world will not let die, and many of our modern wonders that are the sensation of the hour, compared with these enduring realities, are as the flash of a meteor compared with the eternal burning of a star.

Yet, because these truths are old and simple we must not think that we have exhausted them. It is the old and apparently simple things that are yet full of undeveloped and unsuspected power. Electricity has always been in the world, but how much men are now discovering in it that they never dreamed of before? Science is constantly searching the oldest and simplest things and finding in them new wonders and uses. And so is it with the work of the Holy Spirit in the world.—Presbyterian Banner.

The Great High Priest.

The high priest of the Jews was an intercessor for their sins. The office to them carried with it a tender meaning—very much like we conceive the word "mother". Christ has become our High Priest. To do so His eternal deity was clothed with our humanity. In the flesh He was in all points tempted like as we, except that He did no sin. While we were yet sinners, He loved us and gave Himself for us. And then He ascended on high, and there before the great white throne He ever liveth to make intercession for us.

Some great preacher has said that there are two types of human experience that disqualify one for helpful sympathy to his fellows. One is that of never having been tempted with the infirmities of his fellows. The other is that of having fallen before and been corrupted by the temptations which afflict them. Our blessed High Priest knew the full force and power of every temptation normal to the life of a man. Indeed He knew temptation and its sting in a measure no else can know it. For he knew it at every point through to the bitter end with surrender, while men know its power imperfectly because they so often surrender before its full power has been developed. By their surrender their spiritual perception is so benumbed that they do not discern the full guilt and corruption of the sin that overcomes them.

Contrary to the thought of man, the Scripture teaching that the most hidden thought of the human heart lies exposed before the searching eye of God, is used as a ground for confident approach to God. "Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need."

The Lord Jesus knows all about our temptations. The temptations to which human flesh is heir were felt by Him. Of His own will He subjected Himself to them. He did it that He might in His own experience understand what it is against which the infirmities of human kind must contend in struggling with the sin which Satan introduced into the stream of human nature.—Western Recorder.

The God of Peace.

Often when we are in trouble and betake ourselves to prayer, we rise from our knees unhelped and unrefreshed because we have not once thought about God in our petitions, but only of the trouble and of ourselves in relation to the trouble. We cannot hear the voice of God, because of our own interior tumult; we are the worse rather than the better, the sadder and weaker rather than the calmer and stronger, for having prayed. Like Elijah in the midnight storm, we are conscious of earthquake, wind and fire, and it is only when these have died down that the still small voice can make itself heard within the breast. When we fix our attention upon God, submitting our will to His, and asking only to be shown what He requires of us and how we may best fulfil our vocation in the brief span of earthly life that awaits us, the Holy Spirit will take possession of our inmost being, quench the throbbing anguish that excludes hope, and transmute our pain to peace.

Yea, sometimes when the agony
Dies of its own excess,
A dew-like calm descends on me,
A shade of tenderness.
And when my heart with soft release
Grows calm as summer sea,
Do I not know the God of peace
Hath laid His hand on me?

The God of peace speaks by His very silence. It is a silence that bids us take for granted that the best is yet to be. Jesus would have told us if it were not so; we should not be allowed to go on dreaming futile dreams or cherishing pathetic illusions concerning the future. Never tremble before the unrevealed: it bears a hidden glory. Never shrink from the unknown: it is better than the known. And when you yourself go down into the great silence, untended and solitary, you will hear that silence broken by your Saviour's voice:

All which thy child's mistake
Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at home;
Rise, clasp my hand, and come.

—C. of E. Newspaper.

THE ANSWER.

When for a purpose
I had prayed and prayed
Until my words seemed worn and bare
With arduous use,
And I had knocked and asked and
Knocked and asked again,
And all my fervor and persistence
Brought no hope,
I paused to give my weary brain a rest
And ceased my anxious human cry.
In that still moment
After self had tried and failed,
There came a glorious vision of God's power
And, lo, my prayer was answered
In that hour.

—Lowell Fillmore.

Surrender to the Spirit.

Throughout the Christian era—from Pentecost until the Lord Jesus shall come again to the earth—the Holy Spirit is His representative on earth in the hearts and lives of His people. This is true in such complete fashion that Jesus taught His disciples, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come unto you", referring to the coming of the Holy Spirit. His promise to be with His disciples always until the close of the age, in the last words of Matthew's Gospel, are fulfilled in the Holy Spirit.

Our Lord is in His disciples today only through the Holy Spirit, In His glorified resurrection body, He ascended to sit on the throne at the right hand of the Father until the Christian era shall close by His return to the earth. It is that they have not by thoughtful study fully mastered the teaching by the Lord and His Apostles on withhrd

It is true that the central work of Spirit is to make known to Christians the invisible Christ. He is our Lord's "advocate" in the hearts of His people. Therefore, those disciples who magnify Christ in their lives and their witness are pleasing the Holy Spirit and are empowered by Him, even when they have not by thoughtful study availed themselves of the abundant teaching by the Lord and His Apostles as to the Holy Spirit.

Reading Dr. A. T. Robertson's Epochs

in the Life of Simon Peter, we came upon the following fine testimony on page 183:

"In one sense the baptism of the Holy Spirit cannot be repeated. But there is another sense of the phrase which is individual. No single individual is endued with this power from on high who does not submit himself to the will of God and who does not place himself at the service of the Holy Spirit by full surrender to Him. It is just here that most Christians fail. They are saved by grace but are useless as witnesses for Christ because they do not continue in vital contact with God in Christ through the Holy Spirit. Christ is the dynamo, which explains Paul's strong language in Phil. 4:13: 'I have strength for all things in the One who keeps on pouring power into me'."

Dr. Robertson definitely traces the failure of so many Christians in spiritual gifts and graces to their lack of surrender to the Holy Spirit. The quotation does not make clear whether he has in mind a once-for-all surrender or a day-by-day, hour-by-hour surrender. If one had asked him, we doubt not that he would have said both. There is no space here to develop the thought, but both once-for-all and day-by-day surrender of the whole self-life to Christ, to be hailed to His Cross, are taught in the New Testament.

Mystical? It is. So in its sources is any vital Christian living worthy of the name. Except "by full surrender to Him", as Dr. Robertson says, we do not become better than "useless as witnesses for Christ"—for vital contact wtih Him is lacking.—Western Recorder.

ONE MUSIC.

There is a high place in the upper air,
So high that all the jarring sounds of earth—
All cursing and all crying and all mirth—
Melt to one murmur and one music there.

And so, perhaps, high over worm and clod,
There is an unimaginable goal,
Where all the wars and discords of the soul
Make one still music to the heart of God.

—Edwin Markham.

Early Churches Teach Us.

We cannot imagine the survival of the Christian communion in the early years of its history had the members of it yielded to the neutralizing influence of frightened sycophants. These latter would have urged as they do today, that the world could best be won to Christ if His professed followers would but moderate what could only be regarded as misguided enthusiasm. If only conservative adherents of the church would reveal the wisdom of going out to meet the world half-way! If they would but accommodate themselves to the world in "non-essential" matters, they would evince that wide tolerance which would overcome the world's hostility!

If the voice of the churches in modern times has been perfidiously stifled by this base spirit of disloyal and faithless compromise, not so the true churches of the first few centuries. For if there was something so absolutely vital in the revealed truths received, believed and handed on, that they could not compromise them and, if necessary, were willing to die for them, love to the Lord, and loyalty to the Kingdom came first in their thoughts, and in their affections. Utterly dependent upon the enabling power which radiated through them from the Person of their Lord, their liberty for service in the world was multiplied a hundred-fold. "For where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." It was just because their sufficiency was of God that their numerical deficiency as contrasted with the world's big batallions, constituted no drawback.

Spiritual work through spiritual means by spiritual men might well sum up the ideal principle of those who, out of love and loyalty to their Master, and in the consecrated liberty of the Kingdom, blazed the trail of the Gospel throughout the then known world. That principle set them free and made them instruments of power to the pulling down of strongholds of evil, and in leading the prisoners out of captivity and guiding them into the way of peace.

And when the growth of their community and organization came to involve administrative labor, yet to the Word of God, to sound doctrine and prayer, and not to their organization, did they give their primary and wholehearted attention. These were the great levers that kept them dynamic in the hands of their Lord and proved them instrumental in arresting the careless convicting sinners and building up those called to be saints in Christ.—C. W. Hale Amos, in "The Church or the World?"

A PRAYER.

God, who touchest earth with beauty,
Make me lovely, too,
With Thy Spirit recreate me,
Make my heart anew.

Like Thy springs and running waters,
Make me crystal pure,
Like Thy rocks of towering grandeur
Make me strong and sure.

Like Thy dancing waves in sunlight,
Make me glad and free,
Like the straightness of the pine trees,
Let me upright be.

Like the arching of the heavens,
Lift my thoughts above,
Turn my dreams to noble action,
Ministries of love.

God, who touchest earth with beauty,
Make me lovely, too,
Keep me ever, by Thy Spirit,
Pure and strong and true.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Birthday of the Church.

Dorothy E. Kolb.

Jesus said to His Apostles, just before He ascended into Heaven:

"If you will go to Jerusalem and wait, I will send you a Comforter, the Holy Spirit, who will give you power to preach the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth."

After Jesus ascended into Heaven, the Apostles went to Jerusalem and waited. Each day they kept very quiet, and prayed, for the Great Comforter. On the tenth day, they were all together in one room, when suddenly, like a mighty rushing wind, the Holy Spirit entered into the house where they were and settled on each one of them like a tongue of fire. They were so full of God's Spirit that they had power to remember all things which Jesus had taught them.

As the day was the Jewish Feast of Pentecost, when the Jews from all over came to the Temple to worship God, there were in Jerusalem men from all the surrounding nations. The Apostles now found themselves able to speak in the languages of these different peoples. They went out among them, and Peter, filled with the power of the Holy Spirit, stood on the steps of the Temple and preached to the people, saying:

"People of Jerusalem, and men of Israel, you crucified Jesus of Nazareth, who is the Son of God. We buried Him in the tomb that belongs to Joseph of Arimathea. On the third day after certain women visited the tomb and were met by angels who told them that Jesus had risen from the dead. When the women came and told us, John and I ran to the tomb and found it empty, with the napkin that had been around His head lying in its place. After that He was seen by Mary outside the tomb, by two men walking to Emmaus, and by all of us many times in the 'upper room' at Jerusalem, when He talked with us.

"He was with us again just before He ascended into Heaven, when He promised to send us the Great Comforter, the Holy Spirit, whom this day received in our hearts, giving us power to remember all things which He has taught us, and to preach the Kingdom of God to you people, and to the uttermost parts of the earth."

Many of the people were frightened when they realized that they had crucified the Son of God, and cried to Peter:

"What shall we do to be forgiven for this terrible sin we have committed?"

Peter answered, and said:

"Believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and learn and do His teachings. Repent and be baptized. Ask God to forgive you. He is always ready to forgive when you are truly sorry, because you are His beloved children. He loves you so much that He wants you to be sorry, believe, and be baptized, when you will also receive power to become workers in the Kingdom of God, and to spread His Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth."

All the people who now believed in Jesus were glad to hear this, and cried, "We will." A thousand of them believed, and asked God to forgive them for all their sins, were baptized, and became the first members of the Church. That day was really the birthday of the Church, and we have always kept one Sunday in the year, which we call Whitsunday, in memory of the first day of the Church, or the day on which the Great Comforter, the Holy Spirit, came to dwell among us.

"Sich a Wiggle" and Other Bird Friends.

Down by the brookside of swampy thicket you hear him early in May, calling, "Sich a wiggle, sich a wiggle," nervously darting about and perhaps chattering, like Jenny Wren, for a moment. He flits about, apparently keeping very busy, but he is studying you, even if you think you are well concealed as you watch.

This is the Maryland yellow throat, known also, because of that mask he has on the front of his face, as The Little Highwayman. His little eyes are too sharp for you to deceive him, and on the other hand, he is not easily frightened by your presence.

Mr. Yellow Throat is a good friend. The one I heard this season has been with me for three years. We know each other fairly well and he knows that I mean no harm when I venture near his nest. But he is nervous just the same, for when I turn around to go back to my cottage, his call comes with less accent and with a questioning "Witchery? Witchery?" as if saying "Why hurry? Why hurry? Why hurry?"

Another nervous, twitching, little friend is the Redstart. His wings are always held in readiness for flight, for he trusts no visitor. In this nervous watchfulness, he is sometimes amusing for in his hasty darting to and fro he gives a little sharp note or two as in warning to his mate to keep her eyes open. He cannot see everything! The Redstart is almost constantly in action, fluttering from twig to twig as he pursues the elusive insects, so that the presence of visitors is not the only time when he is not calm. In fact, he is never calm, it seems, and he looks like a dancing torch as he twists madly about.

I have one little friend who is always in a hurry. I think he is a bit thoughtless of his friends, for he is with us for such a very short time. This is the Golden Crown Kinglet. I happen to live where he passes by on his way north in the spring and on his way South in the fall. So I have no opportunity of seeing him in either summer or winter home. That is really too bad, for I should like to get better acquainted with him. But his very impatience attracts me.

While he is with us, Mr. Golden Crown Kinglet spends most of his time among the coniferous trees where he cleans the pine needles of the eggs of certain insects. He hovers for a moment over one tuft, then darts to the next and in a great hurry passes from one to another as if he must do his work in record time. He is probably the best feathered friend possessed by the owner of a cone-bearing grove. Plant lice, bark lice, and eggs of aphids are his feed and he does not do his tasks by halves.

Few people realize that the Golden Crowned thrush and the Ovenbird are the same. Sometimes you hear the name, "Teacher Bird" given: this being because of his peculiar "teacher, Teacher, TEACHER!" given time after time, each "teacher" emphasized more strongly than the preceding one. He does not have the attractiveness of color that the Yellow Throat, Kinglet or Redstart have, but he is almost as nervous in his actions. Sitting near his Dutch oven nest (hence the name, Oven-bird), he will suddenly dart upward like the skylark, and pour out his song. Then he will shoot swiftly downward, and with many a twitch, go to feeding again. His best song is heard as the sunset glow is showing in the western sky.

Among the larger birds are some more nervous beauties that I claim as friends. There is a Chewink that lives just back of the cottage. His song is beautiful, and I love to sit and listen as he pours forth his melody, but I like best to watch him when he gets excited, for he simply cannot keep still! You see a streak of black, white and chestnut flashing into a bush. His call is short and saucy. He snaps his tail as if it might break off were he not careful. His chest is erect and he sends out his short call of "towee!" in a moderate tone that is not at all in keeping with his nervousness. Rather it suggests coolness and a brave pertness that is funny.

And as I speak of sauciness, were you to ask me what I consider the worst offender, I should unhesitatingly say, "the catbird." This bird, while very bold at times, is, at others, as nervous as the redstart. His various vocal attainments are decidedly nervous in character, as if he were not at all satisfied with any song he has thus far given, but must try his whole repertoire. He can sing most beautifully when so inclined and he can jest when the mood takes him.

But his sauciest call comes when you least expect it. It is a creepy sound when heard in the dead of night, as is often the case when the bird is aroused from his sleep. It is that nasal, "tssy!" coming with emphasis. I have been startled many times when crossing a pasture at early evening and I must confess that every time I jump as if I had never previously heard this alarm call. One simply cannot help doing so.

The Cost of Silk.

It was six o'clock on an October evening in the Yoshino Valley. The electric lights of countless farm houses were visible on both sides of the river and far upon the steep mountains beyond. A hundred or more girls and young women were finishing their day's work, and the machinery of a small country silk-reeling factory was coming to a standstill. The atmosphere reeked with the odor of boiled worms. For ten precious minutes the group of weary workers stood and listened silently while a missionary presented, as simply as he knew how, the meaning of the Cross: "With His stripes we are healed." Most of them had never before heard a Christian message. But they had seen sacrifices made, and had made them, in order that others might be supplied. They had daily witnessed the sacrifice of the lives of countless creatures in the industry, in which they were engaged, in order that garments might be provided for human bodies, two thousand deaths from scalding for every pound of silk. Their own hands bore the unmistakable marks of the scalding water in which they must constantly work. Yes, they knew something of pain borne, for the sake of others.

The speaker told them the story of a wealthy man in an American city, who hastened, without thought of compepnsation, to a hospital to allow skin to be pealed from his own body to cover the otherwise mortal wound of a poor workman, who had been burned by molten iron. He told of the mother, who rushed into a burning building and rescued, uninjured, a sleeping child, but in so doing received a scar which rendered her own face hideous for the remainder of her life. He told them of how Jesus was "wounded for our iniquities", and how "with His stripes we are healed". Did they understand? The almost breathless silence, with which they listened, was answer enough.

One of the finest Christians in this province is Mori San, one of these silk factory girls. Several years ago she was sent as a bride to a man in Osaka. As the result of her being subjected to such brutal treatment, as it is impossible to describe in print, she left the man, entered a silk factory and soon became a Christian. Since then she has regularly led her girl friends to church. A shrine was erected in the factory compound and pressure brought to bear upon the employees to worship there. Mori refused to do so. The result was that she was notified that the factory could run without her. She had been making thirty cents per day and contributing a tithe of it to the church. She went out not knowing whither she went, without a job or any means of supporting herself. But such faith as hers seldom goes long unrewarded. Now she is employed in another mill and still goes to church and contributes her tithe and her strong Christian influence.

I wish some of you who read this would place Miss Mori on your prayer list, especially your thanksgiving prayer list. It is this kind of people, who help to make the missionary enterprise worthwhile. The days of persecution are not over. They may be only beginning for some of the Christians here, and your prayers are going to be needed.—From a Letter of the Rev. A. P. Hassell, Missionary in Japan, in Presbyterian of the South.

Sailing With Captain Dan.

The twins, Bob and Rodney, lived for the summer in a cottage at Horseshoe Beach. All day long they played on the beach or in the little creek that ran along the sand to the ocean. Mother let them wade in the water up to their knees all they wished, but beyond that she was afraid of the undertow, so they had promised her they would not go in any further unless she or father were with them.

The other boys who played on the beach laughed at them. Their mothers had told them the same thing, but they would run out way up to their shoulders, then dry out their bathing suits on the beach, and they teased the twins every chance they got.

The twins did not like this and bit by bit they played more and more in the creek. There was a boathouse there, and by climbing aboard and looking in a window they found they could see a dandy boat painted white and green.

Some of the other boys who had been there years before told them, "That's Captain Dan's boat." He has been away two months but he will be coming home soon. It won't do you any good, though; he never lets any boy go out with him. He never pays any attention to us."

A few days later, as the boys were playing in the creek, some of the older ones came along.

"Oh, see mother's dear little sissy boys!" cried one. "Look at the curls!" cried another, lifting imaginary curls from Rodney's head.

He drew back, flushing angrily, but just then a calm, cool voice said:

"That will do. Big boys like you should be ashamed to pick on smaller ones."

"Aw, but they are so sissy, Captain Dan," protested one of the largest of the boys. "They don't dare go out above their knees because they promised their mother not to."

Rodney saw a tall, sunburnt young man of about thirty-five, who was smiling pleasantly. As the big boy finished speaking he turned toward the twins.

"What have you to say for yourselves, boys?" he asked.

Bob flushed. "It is true," he answered. "We promised mother, and dad says a fellow always keeps his promise."

"Good," said Captain Dan, heartily. "And do you always mind as well as this?"

"Yes, sir," answered Bob, sturdily; "dad says it is only a coward who does not mind those he knows are wiser than he is, and mother knows."

Captain Dan's eyes softened as he looked on the faces raised to him.

"Many times," he answered, "little bears, tigers, rabbits, birds and all wild life have saved their lives by following that principle. I wonder if you would like to go out on the bay with me? If your mother will let you go I will take you."

While they were gone Captain Dan turned to the bigger boys. "You thought it strange I have never taken you out sailing," he said, "but you have the answer now. I have watched you summer after summer as you have been here, growing more and more disobedient and foolhardy about little things, and making fun of the boys who tried to follow the cautions of their parents. You have often succeeded in getting them to be as foolhardy as yourselves, but the shoe is on the other foot now. No boy sails with me who will not mind instantly and unquestioningly. That is why these new boys are going on my boat and you are staying on shore."

He turned to the boat as the twins came racing joyfully along the beach, and soon the three went out in the waters of the bay, leaving a dozen crestfallen boys on shore, who realized that, too late for a summer's pleasure, they had learned why they did not sail with Captain Dan.—Leslie Blake in Advance.

Benjamin West.

In Pennsylvania, many, many years ago lived a Quaker family with two children. One, a little girl, was still being rocked in the cradle, while the son, Benjamin, was old enough to be left in charge of the baby.

Benjamin loved nothing better than pictures. His parents did not believe in spending money for books with pictures, for they felt there were many more worthwhile things in the world to do, than to spend time looking at pictures.

Ma West left Benjamin with the baby one day. The baby was asleep in the cradle and looked as pretty as a picture. He would make a picture, he thought. Quickly he found a long, flat board and from the hearth drew a piece of charcoal.

Slowly he copied the baby's face, her hair, her little hands and pug nose. Time passed rapidly and he heard nothing, not even his mother's footsteps as she came in the door. Breathlessly she watched Benjamin drawing the picture. Then she gasped, "Benjamin, what hast thee been doing?"

"It's a picture of baby, mother," answered scared Benjamin West.

The picture was a remarkable likefrightened. They were frightened for it might be wicked to draw pictures. Therefore, they hid the drawing and hoped to forget about it.

A dear friend of the family was a minister. He lived close by, and often came to the house to chat with and comfort the Wests. He was a very wise man and often helped the family with their troubles and problems.

At last they summoned sufficient courage to show the picture. The minister looked at it long and carefully, and finally remarked: "The hand of the Lord is in this. Let us hope that Benjamin will make good use of his powers and will some day be known as a real helper of man."

The words of the kind minister were borne out. Benjamin West became known as America's first great painter, and brought much happiness by his beautiful paintings.—The Sentinel.

TEACHING SCHOOL.

"I don't like doing house work,"
Said little Milly Brown;
"I don't like washing dishes,
Or sweeping cobwebs down.
I do not like the ironing,
Or making bread and pie;
I hate to do the scrubbing,
And sewing makes me sigh.

"But there's one thing I do like
In weather hot or cool—
From morning until evening
I just love teaching school.
So, early every morning
I take my little broom
And teach him how to hurry
And sweep the sitting room.

"And then I teach the duster
The furniture to clean,
Till everything is shining
That room's four walls between.
Each day I teach the dish-cloth
To wash the cups and spoons,
And all the time we study
We sing the gayest tunes.

"I teach my little flatiron
To gallop here and there,
And leave the clothes behind him
All shining, smooth and fair.
I teach my little mopstick
To scrub the kitchen floor.
He says his lessons better
Each day than e'er before.

"I teach my little needle
To hem, to stitch, to run;
And, oh, he smiles so proudly,
When well the lesson's done!
At night, when school is over,
And lessons are all said,
I teach my feet to carry
The teacher off to bed."

DEATHS

CONWAY WHITTLE SAMS.

At his old home in Norfolk, Virginia, on May 11th, in the early evening, CONWAY WHITTLE SAMS passed quietly into life eternal, after a long, painful illness, heroically borne, conscious to the last, leaving a sorrowing sister to mourn him. Though born in South Carolina, son of Major Horace H. Sams and Grace Latimer Whittle, he lived all his life in Virginia and devoted himself to upholding her noble beginnings, striving always to perpetuate them in his numerous writings, notably in his "Conquest of Virginia". A lawyer by profesion, he had many varied interests and his maps and knowledge of the Norfolk section were highly valued by lawyers and others. He upheld the noblest ideals of his profession and the code of a gentleman. A devoted Churchman, he was an humble, faithful follower of her faith and in all his obligations most careful. He inspired loyalty, and devotion in all who served him and was trusted by all who knew him. He loved life, and all its activities interested him; but now a broader, fuller life is before him, with "no more suffering, no more pain" and he has entered into that "more abundant life" through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

natural" argues that God's powers are unlimited, all the miracles of the Bible are possible, God can step in and interfere in the affairs of the world whenever He chooses, "the sun may have stood still for Joshua", "an angel may have provided Joseph Smith with miraculous spectacles", and "the soil from the grave of Father Powers may have healed a thousand bodies".

Many sides of this meeting the agitated intellectuals are now discusing. First, they are asking why the Rev. Mr. Parshley, with his theology, should be a member of a liberal Protestant Club. That question the author answers convincingly in his editorial. He is drawn to the club by the intellectual fearlessness of its members. Further, the essayist did such a fine job on his thesis that the part of the reading public that can understand what it is all about is waiting for some modernist in the group to reply. The religious editor attempted it, but he limited himself to a paragraph or so and accomplished very little. "The Illimitibility of the Supernatural" is still a live issue here in Rhode Island, both within and outside the Church.

The Social Service Work of Grace Church.

The many services that a church renders to its community in the field of social welfare are revealed in the Annual Report of historic old Grace Church, in New York City, which has just been published in the Grace Church Year Book for 1934.

Dr. W. Russell Bowie, the rector, in his summary, has emphasized the many kinds of social service that the church has continued to render, in spite of serious financial difficulties and drastic economies.

"The year 1934 has given us a consciousness that we have tried to measure up to the obligations which this parish would take upon itself to the unfortunate and a steady hope that this parish, so great in tradition, may continue to be not only a conserver of the past, but a sensitive interpreter of the Christian spirit for each new time," Dr. Bowie has stated.

One of the church's unique ventures is a Workshop for Men, where a number of unemployed people have been taught furniture-making, repairing and upholstery, with such efficiency that they have built up an increasingly wide clientele. Forty-two men and six women, some under ordinary conditions unemployable, have found work here. It has been developed under the direction of Mr. Frederick T. Sherwood, using an empty loft, and with such tools and machinery as Mr. Sherwood was able to acquire or invent.

Huntington House, one of the buildings of Grace Church, is operated as a home for young women, providing board and room at a low rate. A number of girls in residence there enter into the activities of the Young People's Groups of the church. In September of 1934 a similar House for Young Men was opened in the building which was formerly the dormitory of the Grace Church Choristers' School. There are rooms here for sixteen young men, at prices including breakfast, ranging from $4.75 to $9.75 per week. Mrs. Benjamin H. Keeler is Manager of the House. These buildings are maintained to provide a residence for working people at low rates and in a pleasant, morally healthy environment.

Another social service activity of Grace Parish is centered in Grace Chapel at 410 East Fourteenth Street, which the Parish maintains as a neighborhood house, providing a daily recreation and social program for the children and young people of the community, as well as a house of worship. Classes at the Chapel include music instruction in piano, violin and voice, painting, drawing, sewing and other handcrafts, shop work, coaching in sports and athletics such as swimming, basketball, handball, etc. The work is directed largely by volunteers.

During the summer the Chapel maintains two separate vacation camps in Palisades Interstate Park, for boys and girls between the ages of six and eighteen with provisions for mothers and their small children. Attendance at both these camps during the summer is about three hundred, with vacations extending from two weeks to two months.

The Grace Church Choristers' School for the boys in the famous Grace Church Choir was changed during the year from a Boarding to a Day basis. Under the continued direction of Ernest Mitchell, the Choir of Boys and Men remains, as it has long been, one of the finest musical organizations in America. The boys in the choir attend the day school session from Mondays to Fridays. They receive free tuition and daily lunch. The School also accommodates a limited number of students not in the choir on a paid tuition basis. Harry N. Russell is Headmaster.

An important change in the personnel of Grace Church was the appointment of the Rev. William B. Sperry in May, 1935, to succeed the Rev. Francis A. Sanborn, who was compelled to give up the work because of illness as Vicar of Grace Chapel. Dr. W. Russell Bowie is Rector of Grace Church, assisted by the Rev. E. Felix Kloman and Rev. Theodore P. Ferris at the Church and Mr. Sperry at the Chapel.

Ordinations.
Priest.

The Rev. Van Francis Garrett, deacon, Director of Religious Education in St. Paul's Church, Flint, Michigan, was ordained to the priesthood at a service on Monday, May 27, in that parish, by the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop of Michigan. Mr. Garrett was ordained by Bishop Page to the diaconate in June, 1934. He had occupied his present position as a layman for some time before his ordination. The Rev. Lane W. Barton, rector of the parish, presented the candidate, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. F. Sant, Vicar of Christ Church, Detroit. Although the service was held on a Monday morning, the church was crowded. Representatives of all the organizations, and the Junior and Senior Vestry, marched in the procession. After the service, 280 persons attended a luncheon in Mr. Garrett's honor, held in the parish house.

The Rev. Philip Humason Steinmetz and the Rev. Walter Williamson Gale were ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Taitt June 2, at eleven o'clock in St. Paul's Church, Elkin's Park, Pa. Both men are graduates of the Philadelphia Divinity School. Mr. Steinmetz is the son of the Rev. Dr. Philip J. Steinmetz, rector of the Elkin's Park Church, and was presented for ordination by his father. The son is serving as assistant to his father at St. Paul's. Mr. Gale is priest-in-charge of the Church of the Atonement, Morton, Pa., and also of St. Martin's Church, Marcus Hook, and was presented by the Rev. Dr. Henry R. Gummey, a member of the Philadelphia Divinity School faculty. Bishop Taitt preached the sermon. In addition to the service of ordination the Bishop also administered the rite of Confirmation to a class in the same church at the morning service.

Deacon.

William Curtis Draper, Jr., a native of Washington, was ordained to the diaconate Wednesday, May 29, at ten o'clock in the Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., LL. D. He was presented by the Rev. George W. Atkinson, D. D., retired rector of St. James' Parish, and Bishop Freeman preached the sermon.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. W. Curtis Draper, of 1227 Massachusetts Avenue, S. E., the candidate for holy orders was born in Washington in 1908. He is a graduate of McKinley High School and received the Bachelor of Arts degree in 1932 from George Washington University. Following his graduation, Mr. Draper attended the General Theological Seminary in New York City. He received the Ward-Gerry prize this year for excellence in public speaking.

During his last two years at the Seminary, Mr. Draper was in charge of the Sunday School at the Chapel of St. Cornelius the Centurion on Governors Island in New York harbor. THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

How poor and thin a thing is all purely personal religion.

Whoever fights against truth is sure to lose in the end.

God's place for a Christian is where he is most needed.

We are tested by our faithfulness in the common days. To fail in our testing is to come unready to great crises.

"Never have I seen Thee so clearly as when I was breaking bread to the hungry; never have I loved Thee so dearly as when I soothed a brother's pain."

"He who lives in the habitual contemplation of immortality cannot be in bondage to time, or enslaved by transitory temptations."—F. W. Robertson.

"Spiritual states are more infectious than diseases, and every thought in our minds is a force for good or for evil."

It is a truism, but a foundation truth, that the essential prerequisite of any success in disarming the world is that there shall be an adequate spirit of goodwill. The problem will only be settled when there are enough people in the world who are trying to love one another without reservation or limit.—Selected.

When by nobler culture, by purer experience, by breathing the air of a higher duty, vitality at length creeps into the soul, the instincts of immortality will wake within us.—Christan Index.

All we have willed or hope or dreamed of good shall exist;
Not its semblance but itself . . .
The high that proved too high; the heroic for earth too hard,
The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,
Are music sent up to God by the love and the bard;
Enough that He heard it once: we shall hear it by and by.

The silence of God, rightly accepted and understood, is in its appropriate connection as fully charged with tender meaning as aught that He has definitely revealed.

"If the way seems rough I only clasp
The Hand that leads me with a firmer grasp."

"Holy Ghost no more delay:
Come, and in Thy temple stay;
Now Thy inward witness bear,
Strong and permanent and clear:
Spring of life, Thyself impart
Rise eternal in my heart."

I have seen beauty, rising like a star
Out of the grimness of some ancient wrong;
I have seen honor bursting like a song
From out the jangled clamoring of war.
For evil dies, self-slain with hate and strife,
And good springs up from its own seed of life.

—M. Ashmun.

Paradox as it may seem, the only way to grasp that spirit and share the Companioning Friendship that it brings, is to pursue it. For the moment we settle, believing in our pride that we possess it, we lose it, and there remain only the secondary formulas and dogmas, the rules and the rituals. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." We do not ever catch the romantic Spirit of Goodness. We pursue it, and lo, it catches us.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Agrees With Sentiments Expressed.

Mr. Editor:

I am writing to thank you for publishing that splendid letter by Mr. Pembroke W. Reed of Richmond, in your issue of June 1. He expressed my exact sentiments, and I have nothing to add to it, except that I hope every reader of the Southern Churchman paid special attention to it and pondered over it. I also agree with Mr. Tuley of Louisville, and Mr. J. H. Dillard of Charlottesville, in their opinions of the so-called Child Labor Amendment.

For Greater Service in Every Community.

Mr. Editor.

I am glad to note you have adopted modern methods to increase your circulation, and sincerely hope it will eventually place the Churchman in every Episcopal family in the South, and elsewhere.

Personally I have felt the influence of your good Journal from childhood. My mother was a subscriber to it when our family lived in Richmond, 1860 to 1870, and I have received it in my own family for many years since, and I am now in my eightieth year and still enjoy reading it, and passing it along to the younger generation.

Its increased circulation will have a large moral influence in teaching and guiding the Church and her children for greater service in every community.

With best wishes.

The Term "Catholic".

Mr. Editor:

I have read with much interest Bishop Headlam's statement of the really Catholic characteristics of the Christian Church, which is published in your issue of April 27. He says:

"If the term 'Catholic' means universal, then the things which are Catholic are such things as the Bible, the Nicene Creed, and the Christian ministry, though not any particular form of it, and the Sacrament of Baptism and the Sacrament of the Holy Communion. All these are characteristics of the Christian Church, which are really Catholic."

If acceptance of the Nicene Creed is a requisite for being an integral part of the Catholic Church, then the Baptist churches and probably the Methodists, with millions of members, and many others, would be excluded. Baptists profess to have no creed except the Bible itself.

With reference to the Catholic form of the ministry, it may seem presumptious for a mere parish priest to take issue with one of the great scholars of the Church, but I would substitute for his opinion the pronouncement of the Lambeth Conference of 1922: "A ministry which is universally recognized as valid." The only form of ministry so recognized is the three-fold one of Bishops, Priests, Presbyters and Deacons.

Trinity Sunday.

We have passed through in the last very few years more changes in every way than, as our public speakers like to say, the world changed in hundreds of years before that time. Of course, one cannot help but wonder whether or not we are just a little self-conscious of our own changes. Certainly, they must have seemed radical and fast when the power of Rome gradually withdrew to the Byzantine Empire, and pagans descended in hordes to the Eternal City. But there have been changes.

Naturally theology has changed as rapidly as anything else. To some this has seemed as though the whole of Faith has gone, but soon they can see that theology is like any other "ology"—its subject continues to be true, even when man-made theories no longer hold. Our God continues to be true in experience, even though our theories of why He is true may be useless.

Trinity Sunday, either fortunately or unfortunately, is an opportunity for all of us to speculate theologically. In all honesty we have to face the fact that most of this speculation is rather poorly done and often, when it comes in sermons, most uninteresting. The best advice we ever heard from a good orthodox bishop was never to bother about theological correctness as long as we were true to our experience.

Greeks with speculative minds first used our theological terms. To Anglo-Saxons they have not always been easy terms to understand. But there is a wave of feeling that literalness is not as important as it once was thought, and there is also a wave of feeling that seems to return more and more to older and orthodox beliefs. To us the two things come together, naturally.

If we can remember that it might have been possible to say that we in mankind have known God in three main ways, as a Father, in earthly life, and as a friend guiding and correcting us, we can see that reduced to simplicity that simple men can understand we have been talking about the Trinity. The nicety of statement matters little, but the understanding that God is present and that we still have those experiences is very important.

Isn't the secret of making Trinity Sunday real to people, then, found in whether we are simple and true, rather than in complexities that few can understand? It is a day that is needed and its need can be filled with thoughts of God as we find Him today rather than in some ancient philosophy.

If young people who are outside the church could be made to understand that man only writes his theology as it comes to him in experience, and that we today are still writing theology, there would be less misunderstanding of the Church as a whole. Trinity needs explanation, but not the explanation of Athanasius. It needs the explanation of mankind living today. For, after all, our God is a God of every day though our terms may change, and today men are seeking Him and need Him. Trinity Sunday gives us all the opportunity to make Him real to many who are in doubt.

Vacation Time.

This summer should mark a change in attitude of many of our people, including some of the clergy. The Forward Movement is emphasizing the use of the vacation months for renewed spiritual strength, and possibly it will have a proper reaction in the minds of the various clergy and people.

As someone has said, it is not only hot weather that keeps people away from church during the summer season, but the attitude of indifference of the clergy and choirs makes people think there is nothing important about the season in any way. Such attitudes are hardly inspiring, and yet, when we ask ourselves the question, "Does God Himself take a vacation?" we can see the foolishness of our own ways.

Of course, if religion is a task and a disagreeable one, then we can look forward to needing a rest from it, but if it is a task, then the attitude which we have adopted towards it is wrong and silly.

To the rectors we last year made a suggestion that experiments in church worship be attempted during this season. We felt that such experiments would be found to have aroused a renewed interest in the people. Some clergy we were gratified to hear tried various suggestions. We also received letters of protest from some of our readers, asking what we meant by suggesting that the Book of Common Prayer be abandoned! Since we never have been advocates of anything except an intelligent use of the Book of Common Prayer, we wondered whether such correspondents really believed all of its possibilities had been utilized.

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

A Prayer and Its Interpretation

Since the Thousandfold Prayer has been recommended for use by the Forward Movement in the Booklet entitled, "Follow On," I should like to state just what it means to me, so that others may perhaps be able to enter more fully into the spirit of it. But first of all, the Prayer itself must be given, and is as follows:—

The Thousandfold Prayer.

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, Who with Thy Son Jesus Christ, hast given unto us all things in heaven and earth, we beseech Thee to make us a thousandfold more useful to Thee than ever before, that so Thy power and blessing may flow through us to multitudes of others who are in need, and also make us more willing and loving servants of Thine to Thy honor and glory, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

The Basis of the First Part of the Prayer.

To begin with, the first part of the Prayer is based upon the text:—"He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" Rom. 8:32. St. Paul's argument, of course, is that if God were willing to give His only begotten Son for us, there is nothing He will hold back from us. In another place He has said:—"All things are yours." The appeal in the Prayer is, therefore, based upon the truth so clearly set forth in the above text. But since God has thus given us a share in the divine resources through our union with His Son, Jesus Christ, this implies a responsibility on our part for the use of them.

The Duty of Stewardship.

We are being constantly reminded of our duty of stewardship with regard to our material possessions; but the same duty also holds good with regard to our spiritual resources, as joint heirs with Christ. How is it possible for us to fulfil this stewardship? It is something far beyond our own power to carry out, and the Prayer, therefore, appeals to God to make us a thousandfold more useful. This must not, however, be regarded as an exact mathematical figure, but as a symbol of the greater possibilities for usefulness which lie open to us as instruments in the hands of God for the carrying out of His Will and Purpose. "A little one shall become a thousand," illustrates what God can do with the humblest individual, fully and completely obedient to Him.

The Heart of the Prayer.

And now comes the real heart of the Prayer showing how this wonderful increase in usefulness can be brought about, and this is based upon the words of our Lord, given to us by St. John, with his own interpretation of them in the seventh chapter of his Gospel, verses 38 and 39,—"He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of him shall flow rivers of living water. (But this spake He of the Spirit which they that believe on Him should receive; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.)" We have in the Prayer the words, "that so Thy power and blessing may flow through us to multitudes of others who are in need." Here we have the cooperation of the Holy Spirit adding to our own influence His mighty power and blessing the effect of which must be far more wonderful than we can even imagine.

An Illustration.

The incident of the lad bringing his humble store of five barley loaves and two small fishes to meet an urgent need illustrates very clearly how God condescends to take men into partnership with Himself and bring about results far beyond anything that man can do by himself. Thus the lad's contribution, without Christ's blessing and power, could only have fed a mere handful of people, whereas by Christ's power and blessing it was made sufficient for a great multitude. The radio affords a good illustration of the same truth. A speaker whose voice, under ordinary conditions can only reach a few hundred feet at most, can, spoken through the microphone, reach for thousands of miles and be heard by millions of people. The power which makes this possible is a merely physical one, however wonderful it may seem to be. In the case, however, of the Holy Spirit's influence, we are dealing with the infinite, and we cannot estimate the far-reaching influence which can be brought about through His aid.

Christ's Compassion Towards the Multitude.

We are told that at the feeding of the five thousand, Christ had compassion on the multitude, and we have no doubt that He has the same compassion now towards the multitudes who so sorely need His help and blessing. As members of His Body, He can use us in a certain measure as He did the Body which He used here on earth, and it should be a joy and an inspiration to us to believe that by the power of His Spirit He can, through us, reach and bless multitudes who are in need of His blessing. We should try and share that compassion of His as it will give more warmth and feeling in our use of the Prayer. In this way we can see that the stewardship of our spiritual resources is made possible for us by God Himself showing us the way by which we can be enabled to exercise this stewardship.

The More Abundant Life.

Christ, when He said:—"I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly," not only referred to the larger life of the spirit of man, when united with His Spirit, but also to the far greater opportunities for service which the possession of this abundant life would afford. It is high time that we Christians proved to the world that we are the real possessors of this abundant life, and that it has possibilities for the enrichment and blessing of humanity such as cannot be derived from any other source. Christianity has been living too much on the intellectual plane to realize what wonderful progress might be made, and how greatly the world could be transformed if Christians would only rise to the higher level of the spiritual plane and thoroughly explore the great and mighty treasures which lie waiting to be discovered and made use of there. I trust that this may help to make the Prayer more of a blessing to those who use it, although it is quite possible that others may see in it more than I have been able to express myself.

The Future of Virginia Churchmanship

By BEVERLEY D. TUCKER,

Rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond.

IF ST. PAUL, the great Apostle of the Gospel, could confess, as he approached the end of his own earthly ministry, that he had not already obtained nor was already made perfect, there should be no impropriety if we, Virginia churchmen, with all of our thankfulness for our goodly heritage, should yet approach the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Diocese of Virginia, with a similar confession. Without such a confession there would be little room for the development of the topic assigned to me for this evening, namely, The Challenge of the Future to the Church in Virginia, or as I prefer to phrase it, The Future of Virginia Churchmanship. For if we profess that we have already obtained or are already made perfect, the best program for the future would be to repeat the course already pursued, to make a fetish of our traditions, to judge the soundness of our present and future in the lights of their strict adherence to the dead hand of the past.

In making this confession with the Apostle, that we have not already obtained nor are already made perfect, we are in no sense discrediting nor belittling our traditions. We accept them gratefully as our heritage "for other foundation can no man lay than that is laid." We can, however, be true to the purpose of the foundation, only by doing our part to rear thereon the completed building for which the foundation was laid. So the Apostle asserts as his program for the future, "I press on, if so be that I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus."

In like manner, the future program of the Diocese of Virginia, or of Virginia Churchmanship, has its roots in the past, but its fruits are yet to be produced. We are to press on, if so be that we may lay hold on that for which we also have been laid hold on by our fathers who were before us. We can be true to our fathers, not by mere slavish imitation of their forms and repetition of their formulas, but by striving to be true to their purpose, carrying out its implications in the new situations that confront the Church in our day. If we need a slogan, it might well be that of our Master—"I am come, not to destroy, but to fulfill."

This evening, then, I would select a few of the principles that have been characteristic of Virginia Churchmanship in the past, and ask how can we best fulfill them in the terms of our day. The subject is far too large for a single sermon, and necessitates a method of suggestion rather than of exhaustive treatment.

Evangelical Spirit.

At the heart of Virginia Churchmanship is the note of Evangelicalism. The emphasis has been upon personal religion rather than upon institutional religion. Christianity has been interpreted as essentially a personal relationship, as a mystical union between the individual and Christ, rather than as a corporate relationship in which priestly authority and sacraments loom large. It is truth mediated through personality rather than through institutionalism.

This personal note comes out in the loyalty of Virginia churchmen to the bishops. I question whether there is any section of this church where the bishops have exercised a larger personal influence than in the dioceses of Virginia; yet this influence proceeds not primarily from a recognition of the authority of apostolic succession, but from the assumption that the bishop belongs to his people as their chief pastor. It is rooted in a personal relationship, not in a theory of ecclesiastical polity.

My earliest recollections of this tradition go back to Bishop Whittle. While I remember well the impression of his influence, I cannot say that I remember the content of his sermons other than that one of his famous texts was, "He shall be called Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins." This text would suggest the significant emphasis of a personal relationship as the heart of religion.

Bishop Randolph, who is still a vivid personality to me, stood in the same evangelical tradition. His favorite theme was that "love is the fulfilling of the law." The love of God in Christ was the evangelical note that never failed to come to expression in his deeply moving sermons. Yet, with Bishop Randolph, I think, we can detect a fresh emphasis—the conscious need of relating the personal devotion of the vangelical to the thought life of the age. He combined in a rare degree the appeal to the heart and the head.

For the generation that followed him, we can trace a significant result of his influence in that he, with his coadjutor Bishop Tucker, was the moving spirit in bringing both Dr. Cosby Bell and Dean Rollins to the Virginia Seminary. We can speak of Dr. Bell without reserve, for his going from us is still so poignantly felt. He was truly evangelical in spirit, but he was a liberal in thought. For the men who were trained under him, he translated this evangelical spirit of personal religion into the categories of modern thinking.

That is a task, however, that is never finished. If Virginia Churchmanship is to be true to evangelicalism as a living spirit and not as a static theology, then we must be ever pressing on to realize its purpose in the changing forms of thought of each succeeding generation. We can ask for no better interpretation of this progressive adaptation of evangelicalism than Dr. Sparrow's familiar saying which has been adopted as the motto of the Virginia Seminary, "Seek the truth, come whence it may, cost what it will." When we remember that Christ said, "I am the way, the truth and the life" and that He identified Himself with the Spirit of truth, who should progressively guide His disciples into all truth, then for the evangelical there can be no divorcing of devotion to Christ from devotion to truth. For the Christian evangel is truth mediated through personality—"the truth as it is in Jesus."

Moral Earnestness of Purpose.

The second emphasis of Virginia Churchmanship is found in a tone of moral earnestness which has characterized its purpose. We think of Bishop Meade as the personal embodiment of this principle. He was the pioneer in making the influence of the Church felt as a stern challenge to the loose moral habits of his age.

It was a morality that took, at times, a somewhat austere attitude towards the pleasure of life and survived in a diocesan canon which disapproved of "gaming, attendance upon horse racing and theatrical amusements, witnessing immodest and licentious exhibitions or shows, attending public balls" on the part of the communicants of the church. This canon was not repealed until Bishop Gibson's episcopate, when it was recognized that morality was served by condemning not the use, but the abuse of such expressions of social life.

The challenge of our age calls for a no less stern championing of morality as implicit in our personal loyalty to the cause of Christ. If, however, we are to lay hold on that for which we have been laid hold on by Christ Jesus, it is not enough today to interpret morality strictly in terms of personal conduct, and of protests against abuse of the moral code by individuals.

In the contest for good, in our effort to enthrone righteousness in this world, in our pursuit of the ideal of the Kingdom of God, we find ourselves arrayed against a well-organized system of evil which the individual as such is powerless to combat and overcome. While the seat of religious authority for the evangelical is still personal consecration to the will of God, yet this personal devotion to the cause of Christ cannot find adequate expression today save by the individual taking his place as an integral unit in the organized society of the church. For organized evil, such as economic injustice, race prejudice, and international war, can be overcome only by organized good. We cannot clear the social atmosphere of its demoralizing currents save by letting in the positive draught of definitely formed public opinion.

To meet the moral task of our age, then, we need in the church in Virginia, an awakening of the conscience to the social problems of the community. In the absense of such an awakening we have seen the moral leadership pass in no small measure from the church to the various agencies of the community and of the State. While it may be true that the execution of such tasks can often best be performed in our capacity as citizens rather than as churchmen; yet it still remains the primary task of the church to furnish the moral motive and the social passion, to preach the moral and social implications of the Gospel, to lay upon the conscience of the disciples of Christ that the Lord requires of them as the unchanging demand of religion, that they who walk humbly with their God shall do justice and love mercy in all the widening areas of life.

Public Worship and Church Discipline.

We think of Virginia Churchmanship more specifically in terms of an attitude towards public worship and towards church discipline in the larger meaning of that word. If we were forced to choose between the alternatives of being Low Churchmen or High Churchmen, Protestants or Catholics, I have no doubt that Virginia Churchmen would generally prefer to be classified as Low Churchmen and Protestants, but we instinctively dislike such hard and fast classifications, and they do less than justice to our real position.

(1) Use of Ceremonial.

In respect of the use of ceremonial in public worship, the tradition of Virginia Churchmanship has been uncompromisingly in the direction of simplicity. It is true that at times this loyalty to the principle of simplicity in ceremonial has manifested itself chiefly in protests against innovations and elaboration of ceremonial. It is, however, a loyalty based not upon a mere negation, but upon a positive conviction of an ideal in worship. The beauty of Christ's life and teaching is the beauty of simplicity—the sure discrimination between essentials and non-essentials, between "the mint, anise and cummin" and "the weightier matters of the law." The ceremonial of the Jewish temple had made the approach to God intricate and complex. Jesus seemed to sweep all of this aside, and to show men plainly and directly the Father. Therefore, the permanent danger of the elaboration of ceremonial in Christian worship is lest we make the approach to God a mystery to the ordinary man, and thereby defeat the purpose of Christ to reveal to men the naturalness and the simplicity of communion with God. "They that worship the Father shall worship Him in spirit and in truth."

Human nature being what it is in matters ecclesiastical and liturgical, it is always easier to introduce innovations in ceremonial than it is to remove them when once introduced. Hence it is not mere dogged Protestantism, but a recognition of the facts in the case when, as Virginia churchmen, we strive to be loyal to the standard of simplicity in the ceremonial of Christian worship. If in the future we would lay hold on that for which we have been laid hold on by our churchmanship in the past, then we have a positive contribution to make to the whole Church by bearing witness to our conviction of the abiding value of a type of ceremonial in worship which combines reverence with simplicity.

(2) Cooperation With Other Churches.

In respect of the attitude of Virginia Churchmanship towards ecclesiastical discipline in the larger sense of that word, our bias has been in the direction of the liberal emphasis that came to expression with the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. This movement began as a protest against an interpretation of the Church which centered the authority of the Church in one locality, symbolized in one man, and confined the manifestation of the spirit of Christ to one channel of grace. In reality, the movement was a positive witness to the true catholicity of the Christian Church, that God's purpose in Christ is inclusive, not exclusive. "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. And there are diversities of administration, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operation, but it is the same God which worketh all in all."

Never has a great word been more abused than this word Catholic. Its root meaning is universal. To qualify its inclusiveness with a divisive adjective like Roman-Catholic or Anglo-Catholic is to convert a positive into a negative. The affirmation of the Catholic Church in the creed will be satisfied with nothing less than man as man—"till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

In the past, the loyalty of Virginia churchmen to this broader conception of the Church, has too often found expression chiefly as a party protest against another party within our own Church. If, in the future, we are to lay hold on that for which we have been laid hold on by Christ Jesus, we need to carry our convictions more definitely into a positive and constructive program of cooperation with other Christian groups.

By well established tradition in Virginia, it has been our custom to extend the invitation to members of other Christian Churches to receive the Holy Communion with us at the Lord's table, and to invite ordained ministers of other churches to fill our pulpits, and take part in our services on special occasions. I should like to see us go one step further in this direction, and demonstrate our sincere desire for closer union with other churches, by a carefully prepared service of inter-communion under the direction and leadership of our bishops, in cooperation with ministers representing other Christian churches in our midst.

Furthermore, the changed conditions in rural sections of Virginia with improved roads and facilities of communication, would seem to offer the opportunity for more concentration and consolidation of effort. Instead of a clergyman attempting to minister to five or six small and widely scattered congregations, would there not be a great gain in inspiration, and continuity of effort if he could minister to one strong congregation, brought together at a given center? Such a program would involve a principle of comity with ministers of other Christian groups, by which there would be a division of pastoral oversight, and the elimination of unnecessary duplication of effort in the same community. I recognize that there are great practical difficulties and prepudices to be overcome in an experiment of this character, but the Episcopal Church in Virginia is peculiarly fitted to undertake it, both by reason of the influence of its rural parishes and by reason of the heritage of the spirit of cooperation with other Christian churches. Moreover, by such an experiment the church in Virginia could make a contribution to the whole Church in the field of Christian cooperation.

Missionary Idealism.

Virginia Churchmanship, then, has been evangelical at heart; a tone of moral earnestness has characterized its purpose; it has stood for reverence with simplicity in the ceremonial of worship, and has recognized the manifestation of the same spirit of God in diversities of administration and orders of ministry. The crowning note in Virginia Churchmanship, however, has been its devotion to, and its enthusiasm for the mission of Christ to all the world. From the Virginia Seminary have gone forth the pioneers and the founders of nearly every foreign missionary undertaking of this Church of ours. The idealism of missions, whether it be the ministry to the scattered rural parishes of Virginia or to the neglected folk of the Blue Ridge Mountains, or to the non-Christian civilization of the Far East, has been the inspiration and the driving force of the Virginia parishes whenever they have been keenly alive to the call of Christ.

If, in the future, we are to lay hold on that for which we have been laid hold on by Christ Jesus, then never was there greater need for the Church in Virginia to think of the world as its parish than there is today. It is true that missionary methods demand rethinking and re-shaping in the light of changed conditions, and of increased knowledge, but the world's need of the Gospel of Christ in the solution of its problems was never more urgent. There is no permanent cure for international discord and distrust, save the love of God made manifest in the spirit of brotherhood and the law of service, which Christ has brought to light for the redemption of mankind. We talk of the honor of our country, but what greater honor can our country achieve than to be the servant of humanity in laboring for peace on earth among men of good will.

During the recent years of the depression we Virginia churchmen, with the rest of our countrymen, have yielded to pessimism, have furled our banners and been slowly beating a retreat. We cannot, therefore, better celebrate the Sesquicentennial of the founding of this Diocese than by once again consecrating ourselves to be adventurers for Christ—

> "Flying out the banner! let it float > Skyward and seaward, high and wide."

May I not, then, sum up the challenge of the future to the Church in Virginia in the words with which the great Apostle greeted the unseen days that were ahead, "Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect, but I press on, if so be that I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus."

BOOK REVIEWS

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN ACTION: By Michael Williams. Published by The Macmillan Company. Pp. 358, with Bibliography and Index. Price, $2.50.

The purpose of this book, we are told in the introduction, is, "To describe briefly and accurately the main outlines of the organized system by means of which the Catholic Church carries on its work in the world today." This is a rather large task for a layman to set himself, yet we feel that Mr. Williams has carried it through in an interesting manner to a successful conclusion. In spots it is as thrillingly interesting as one of Richard Halliburton's travel tales, while occasionally the excess of detail, necessary in such a work, becomes a bit wearisome to the non-Roman reader. One is impressed with the author's honesty in stating the case, although one's breath is sometimes taken away by the magnitude of his claims.

Some readers will find the title misleading, as the author confines his study to that portion of the Catholic Church which centers in Rome. This limitation is clearly understood when we read, "Without a Pope there could be no Catholic Church" (Pp. 40, 82). The publishers state that this, "Is a work of exposition, strictly non-controversial," and such it is; for the Roman position is stated so dogmatically that there is (within this book) no room for controversy, all others being dismissed as schismatics and heretics. We read of the condemnation of "the pride of the chief ecclesiastic of Constantinople," while the author evidently revels in the pomp and exalted position of the Roman Pontiff, his gorgeous apparel and the material splendor of the Vatican garden "with its most beautiful collection of orchids in the world—seven hundred varieties" (p. 32). The garb of the Pope, down to his "purple silk slippers embroidered with gold crosses" (p. 67), is described in detail and with obvious pride. "At all his meals the Pontiff, in accord with Vatican etiquette, eats alone, though a few of the more intimate members of his household are usually in the room" (p. 82). We find frequent references to "the Fisherman's ring" and "the throne of the Fisherman," but one can hardly picture the fisherman Simon Peter in such surroundings.

The way the author accepts the authority of his Church is a revelation to Protestants. Here we have an interesting study in "the Western, or Latin, type of mind" (p. 266). Even miracles performed by the relics of modern saints are accepted without question! This book gives such an accurate and complete portrait of "the Catholic Church in action" that if, as we have been told, it was written as propaganda, its very excellence may defeat its puprpose; for we feel confident that any non-Roman reader will be better satisfied with his own Church.

PSYCHOLOGY AND SACRAMENTS: By Frank Craven Carter. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Company. Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Pp. 142, with Index. Price, $1.60.

The author discusses the relation of psychology to the Sacraments of the Church in a very interesting way. He is making an attempt to interpret human experience in relation to "The outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us"; and the emotions these signs touch in the human personality.

The first eighty-one pages are taken with psychological approach to religious consciousness with the following topics well discussed: "The Unveiling of Man," "The Technique of The Unveiling," "Man Taking the Initiative," "God Taking the Intiative"; then, "The Church and the Sacrament of Penance." Here the infallibility of the Church is discussed and its assumed authority to apply penance as a sacrament. The author makes this statement, "Nothing but an infallible Church could be a sacrament; and of the fallibility of the Church, the divisions and misunderstandings are the clearest indications" (p. 83). "Confirmation, Matrimony and Holy Unction" are ably discussed in Chapter VI. The next chapter is perhaps the most interesting, for in it the reader will find a fine interpretation of the psychology of "Baptism, Holy Orders (Ordination) and Holy Communion." The author believes in "The Real Presence." This quotation is suggestive, ". . . . . Modern science has reached as the limit of its analysis of the atom, as 'unknown reality,' a 'mysterious essence.' Hence there seems to be but a step between the present position of science and the position that God's whole method in creation is a sacramental method and in every sacramental object He is giving Himself—a Real Presence is there" (p. 121).

A helpful book for ministers and teachers of religion.

Participants or Parasites?*

By WOLCOTT CUTLER.

Clergyman of the Diocese of Massachusetts.

I SOMETIMES wonder if it ever occurs to certain parishioners of our Church that as a general rule, if they would only put their pledged offerings in their envelopes week by week, they could always afford to support their Church and their Church would never lack support.

In one church known to me where the debts have recently piled up to such an alarming extent that the vestry were obliged this year to dismiss the parish sexton and the organist and choir-master, it has been found that every cent of debt is accounted for by the unpaid pledges of the last few years. No bills would have failed of payment had the systematic offering envelopes only come in as promised. I wonder how people can justify themselves in taking their pledges for the systematic support of their church, local and national, so lightly.

In this particular parish the parishioners are very hard hit by the depression, and some of the families are large, yet the striking feature of the systematic offerings as a whole in that church is that last year 87 sets of envelopes were promptly paid to the last penny; and these offerings amounted to twice as much as any other element in the parish income. Moreover, these 87 regular contributors included at least five families or individuals subsisting on very meagre public aid, ten families with serious sickness or other heavy burdens, and fourteen elderly or invalided persons who cannot find work today. Countless others have had most irregular and independable work this past year; but have not allowed their church support to get behind. These 87 faithful ones realized that unless they did their part each week, they would not have an effective church.

Why could not the other 95 systematic subscribers in the same parish realize that it is their unpaid pledges that today force the parish to give up vital aspects of its reasonable work? For, the other 95 subscribers are not in any more trying or perilous circumstances than the faithful 87. As a matter of fact many of them are blessed with steady jobs, reasonably good health, and not more than one or no dependents. They simply have not gained the sense of personal responsibility nor the habit of regular giving that are required for the keeping alive of any local parish. Such people do not know it, of course, but what they really are religiously is what in the natural world we have to call parasites.

THINKING that perhaps the past year was unduly hard for some of these subscribers who were seriously in arrears, I took the time to trace back their record of envelope payments in a dozen cases year by year for the past seven years to the year before the depression. The subscribers I studied in this way were all old-time or life-long members of this parish and have been all the seven years actively and happily connected with the parish life. Three of them are parish officers.

Here is what I found: Only two of the twelve had paid more than half of their pledges for 1928, when times were better; none had paid in full.

No. 1 pledged all seven years, but only once paid as much as half the year; on the average he paid eleven weeks and owed for forty-one weeks of each year. His pledges appear to amount to a probable one per cent of income. He has no dependents.

No. 2 pledged only three times during the past seven years in 1928, 1929 and 1934, and paid an average of twenty-three weeks on each of those three pledges. His pledges amount to a probable one-third of one per cent (1-300th) of his income. He has no dependents.

No. 3, 1/2%, 5 years average paid, 18 weeks.
No. 4, 1 1/2%, 4 years average paid, 14 weeks.
No. 5, 1 %, 6 years average paid, 15 weeks.
No. 6. 1/2%, 5 years average paid, 6 weeks.
No. 7, 1/2%, 4 years average paid, 4 weeks.
No. 8, 1/2%, 6 years average paid, 11 weeks.
No. 9, 1/3%, 3 years average paid, 25 weeks.
No. 10, 1/2%, 4 years average paid, 3 weeks.
No. 11, 1 %, 5 years average paid, 5 weeks.
No. 12, 1/2%, 4 years average paid, 17 weeks.

In all these cases the subscriber might have been expected to pledge every one of the seven years and to pay fifty-two weeks in each year (or ask to have his pledge reduced or cancelled), but when a subscriber pledged for only three years, I have averaged his payments as for three years only. Otherwise the averages would have been very much lower, in fact for the group for the seven year period, only eight weeks paid per subscriber per year.

I write down these seemingly dry records, because I feel sure that in practically all parish churches today, it is not the depression that is causing our religious work to languish, but rather regular and repeated failure on the part of half our membership to contribute anything to systematic church support, and the additional failure of half of those who pledge to pay more than a few weeks a year of their promised offerings. During boom times, it was usually possible for twenty-five per cent of our membership to carry the other seventy-five per cent on their backs; today we face the necessity of a more honest and democratic Church support—or serious curtailment of all religious and much philanthropic work.

I SIMPLY feel that for us to spend all of our income on emulating the Joneses and none of it or only one-half of one-hundredth of it on furthering the work of our Church is to put God in second or third or fourth place in our lives. The fact that our lips still pronounce His name with enthusiasm cannot mean much to Him so long as our real motives in life are pleasure or safety or popularity or conventional success rather than a sacrificial desire to share with others our good things and our treasured convictions and thus to bring nearer His Kingdom.

If Christian people want to live comfortably or even expensively, I see no reason to object too strongly, provided that they come by their money honestly and fairly and that they share their good things and their serious loyalties with a suffering and needy world. I simply maintain that a person who gives away less than one-tenth of his income is neither generous nor Christian; and a person who neglects to set aside at least a third of that tenth for the Church's work in the world, is neither Christian nor religious.

Fortunately it is our poorest people who are the most generous and conscientious in these matters; and fortunately, also, there are in each community a small number of saints who give much more than a tenth to the Lord's work. Otherwise, the depression would have closed as many churches as it has banks and factories.

What the Lord always needs and what I believe He asks of every follower every week of his life is a regular and generous share of every income from four dollars a week up. I presume that in the Lord's eyes four cents out of a four dollar income looks bigger than four dollars out of a forty dollar income. In either case we may doubt whether lip-service is accepted as a satisfactory substitute for the unstinted generosity of a loving and dutiful heart.

Accomplishment

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,

Bishop of Washington.

Bishop Freeman.

ALL great men and women have been dominated by some supreme ideal or some lofty conception of the purpose of life; even the occult enters into this conception, as in the case of Napoleon, who unfailingly believed in the star of his destiny.

To many of us life is a purposeless thing, it begins seemingly nowhere and it ends nowhere. Again, the plan or scheme of things seem so chaotic to our vision that its time-tables, its regulations and its routes, are confused and confusing. Very frequently we are discovered by others, and a talent or genius that we least suspected is called into being. To discover a genius is greater than to discover a River of Doubt.

At this time of the year tens of thousands of youths are emerging from their schoolrooms, graduating into the larger field of human service and endeavor. We often wonder, as we greet them, if they know where they are going or what they are going to do. Many of them seem to have absorbed the modern maxim: "We don't know where we are going, but let us get there as quickly as possible." To a more mature and reflective mind, life does seem to have some plan, and even its failures and disappointments constitute no small part in the outworking of a purpose that oftentimes is beyond our comprehension.

Jesus lived but three and thirty years; His whole life, judged by human standards, was one of disappointment, failure and ultimate defeat. Condemned and pilloried by His own kinsmen, without honor in His own country, He was regarded by His contemporaries as a disturber of the peace, a destroyer of ancient customs, and an innovator whom they would not tolerate. To the churchmen of His day He was an intruder, whose insolence and interference they could not abide. Notwithstanding every obstacle He set His face to go up to Jerusalem and to lay the plans of His kingdom, whose scope was universal and whose influence was not to be bounded by time or place. At the close of His career, while He stood under the shadow of a cross, He declared: "I have glorified Thee on the earth." It was His final testimony concerning the efficiency of His life's mission.

Only three years of comparatively obscure public life and yet, by His own testimony, confirmed by the judgment of subsequent history, He had wrought out a system whose influence was to touch every land and to affect all forms of human life the world over. If Caesar Augustus could say, "I found Rome brick and left it marble," then Jesus could say, "I found human life without the consciousness of the divine and without the sense of destiny, and I have given it the realization of its God-likeness, and I have filled it with the pulsings of eternity."

WHEN Cecil Rhodes was dying, his latest words were, "So much to do, so little done." It was the expression of one who in the ripeness and fullness of years was conscious of unfulfillment. Not so Jesus. His was the realization of one who, even on the cross, could say concerning His life's task, "It is finished." Obviously, He realized that He was working solely and supremely in conformity with the divine will. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me," was the inspiration of His life.

Does not much of our life's service miscarry because it is seemingly unrelated to God's infinite plan? The Westminster confession, in its opening sentence, is in consonance with the word of Christ: "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and enjoy Him forever." Mr. Elihu Root once said: "Life is not in length of days; to have done something that will last, to weave a thread into the fabric that shall endure for ages, that is life."

We believe this to be true, and because it is true, it is a sad commentary upon so-called misspent and wasted lives.

To many of us, who are seeking at this time to disclose to our vision life's larger plan, there is found in the present world chaos the evidence of something that in its outworking is not fortuitous nor governed by chance. To be able to see, even in part, the scheme or plan of things, and then to fit ourselves to further it, means to ally ourselves with Him in whose hand are the issues of life. It's a great thing to be able to say: "I have glorified Thee on the earth."

vacation, we recommend an honest effort to attend church away from home. We ourselves have been astonished at the fine services we have found in such frankly pleasure resorts as Atlantic City. In one parish in Maine only used as a summer chapel we were introduced to some beautiful hymns which we had never heard, but which now have become favorites, while at another summer chapel we also had the pleasure of witnessing the best children's service it has ever been our pleasure to attend.

Summer church attendance at places other than our own home church will broaden our whole interest in church worship and we will probably hear a sermon that will make us enjoy our holiday more than we otherwise would.

But let none of us take summer as a completely slack season in church membership. It can be used, and the Forward Movement shows us one way, f deeper religious experience and for an enjoyable season of real worship.

COMMUNION.

Who walks within the cloisters of the night,
And views on high the maze of whirling spheres,
Stands in the presence of a holy light
That sanctifies the moments of his years.
He drinks the juice immortal suns have pressed
From clusters of the vintages of space,
He eats the bread the centuries have blessed,
And given unto brothers of the race.

The night stands as a venerable priest
Before an altar rich in candle blaze,
And he who kneels in sacramental feast
Is he who finds the centre of the maze.
When men with stars commune they understand
In part, the great creation of His hand.

Jefferson Davis: Leader of a Lost Cause

By CHARLES W. LOWRY,

Professor in The Virginia Theological Seminary.

DAVIS kept Bragg on and drew him to his bosom out of a mistaken loyalty and because his faith in his own opinions was stronger than his capacity for the assimilation of stubborn and irreducible facts. Also Bragg flattered him at a time when the people were beginning to lose faith in him and in his administration and when his heart was sore. Davis quarreled with Joseph E. Johnston and stuck to his guns, though the strife was rending asunder the fabric of the Confederacy. He declined to re-appoint him, even after Hood had been discredited; and when the popular clamor could no longer be resisted, he arranged for Lee to make the appointment.* Finally, Davis failed the Confederacy at the point of possibly her greatest need: the creation of a Generalissimo of all her forces; and he did so out of an over-weening confidence in his own military ability and because of his basic incapacity for the costliest self-renunciation. The experience of the North and of the Allies in the World Dar, culminating in the appointment of Marshal Foch as Generalissimo of the combined Allied Armies demonstrates conclusively the follow of such an omission.

It may seem that I have dwelled too exclusively and sharply on the defects of Jefferson Davis. Let me, however, recall to your minds my purpose and the presuppositions from which I began. I set out from the point no doubt usually reached about this time by the speakers you have had before on Jefferson Davis, namely, his indubitable excellences of character and mind and elements of real greatness. I then asked and have tried to answer the question: why notwithstanding did he fail and with him the Confederate cause? Such a question is not futile and is not ungracious. The answer must be of large intrinsic interest to you as it is to me. From the defects of great men as well as from their virtues, we can derive instruction and inspiration. And it is a mistake to suppose that we honor the memory of a beloved leader by an exaggerated hero-worship or the elevation of affection above truth. The leader that is worthy of our homage and love and that has demonstrated by his devotion that worthiness, has nothing to fear, and we have nothing to fear, from the most unswerving fidelity to historic truth. The results will create no exception to the law: know the truth and the truth shall make you free.

BUT I would not end on a negative note. In spite his ultimate failure, Jefferson Davis' achievement was great. Let us not forget, to quote Eckenrode once more, "the much that he laboriously and bravely accomplished . . . the story of a national patching-out seldom equaled; of turning a mob into an army; of raking a country without gunneries for arms and equipment; of building home-made warships out of scrap iron and of buying a navy in Europe sub rosa; of making some sort of transportation system out of a series of one-horse railroads; of improvising administrative departments without buildings and officials; of conducting a great war on fiat currency; of getting food and clothing for soldiers by impressment and taxes in kind; of manufacturing munitions without chemicals; of so juggling as to have efficient rule without fatally violating states' rights; of making bricks without straw." And all this he achieved in face of tremendous obstacles, not the least of which was personal criticism and opposition. It is hard for us to realize today the real situation in the South politically. Remember the South was fighting in the name of states' rights. Yet in order to carry on the war with any efficiency, these rights had systematically to be infringed upon. This was the hard and ironic dilemma upon which David found himself impaled. In consequence he had the Confederate Vice-President, Alexander H. Stephens, arrayed against him in bitter and out-spoken opposition for practically the whole duration of the war. "In the worst crises of the Civil War, Stephens wasted his time in denouncing the constitutional violations of a government whose existence depended wholly on the bayonets of the protecting army." Governors Vance of North Carolina and Brown of Georgia were little less unreasonable, and they had it in their power effectually to block the enforcement of the President's policies within their respective states. There was absolutely no censorship of the press, and from an early time influential newspapers, like the Richmond Examiner and the Charleston Mercury, were much in opposition to the government. Added to all this was poor health, the oppression of chronic neuralgic headaches, which sent the President to bed periodically, and the experience of a terrible tragedy in April, 1864, when his son, Joseph Emory, died as the result of a fall from the balcony of the White House to the pavement below. In the face of everything Davis carried on with a courage that has rarely been equaled and with a will of iron. Lastly, his patronage of Lee and Jackson in the early days when both were unpopular and his introduction of conscription, for the first time in American history and in the most individualistic section of the American community, deserve to be specially recorded and emphasized.

Truly here is a man who, if he missed being a giant, wrought honorably and well and fought like a hero to the bitter end. No one could have met with more fortitude and indomitableness of spirit the challenge and the odds of an Herculean task, or have given himself with a more utter measure of devotion. And when the facts have been duly weighed, it may be doubted whether anyone else would have done better in his place. For all these things Jefferson Davis deserves, as he has received, the affection and homage of the Southern people. And it is fitting that we should pause today and render to his name and memory our tribute of honour and gratitude.

*Johnston hated Davis and was at least as much to blame as he for the quarrel; but this does not affect my point.

The One and Only Health Center in All This Region.

A recent letter from Dr. Grafton Burke at the Hudson Stuck Hospital, Alaska, revealed something of his distress at current lack of adequate support. He wrote:

"It is profoundly distracting to throw everything one has of strength, training, sympathy, into a problem such as this hospital presents, twenty-four hours a day, and then to find that the people of the Church at home, whom you have been representing in an outpost like this, are not supplying the money necessary to keep the work going, even after economies have been made in every direction.

"This problem of caring for the sick and suffering is attacked at the direct command of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Here is this staff of nine, interested, capable, consecrated, on tne go night and day with resolute courage and dauntless energy for prosecuting the Master's command at a remote station, the one and only health center for the helpless sick, in all this region.

"This business of guarding health, it seems to me, has developed into a tragedy of good intention. Surely, surely, there are well clad, well housed, well fed, humans enough to feed and heal the less fortunate."

Just Lassies in Their Teens.

During the great typhoon of September, 1934, the Bishop Poole Girls' High School of Osaka, Japan, was blown down. A number of the girls were killed and others injured. One group of four were in a room by themselves when the crash came. Three of them were pinned down under the huge beams, but the fourth, though badly hurt, was not held underneath. She tried to free them, but could do nothing, so she prayed and then they all sang, "Jesus Lover of My Soul" as long as the three lived. They died crushed to death, and when rescuers came, hearing the hymn, only the one was left alive, and from her they heard the story. As a result of this, though the school is not yet rebuilt, and they are using all sorts of shifts for school rooms, there have been a flood of applications for entrance at the beginning of the school year, April 1.

The Age-Old Spirit of Japan—Christ-Filled.

The gale grew stronger yet,
Until it seemed
The very mountains would be blown
And scattered like the chaff;
The air was filled with flying death
That roared and howled
Like fiends from hell.
Then here and there, amid the din,
A building crashed,
Some victim shrieked for aid.
And in that school-room
Sat a group of little girls,
Just lassies in their teens.

They dared not flee;
Some sat, with terror dumb;
One prayed; none spoke
Or shrieked aloud.
The beams above them
Creaked and swayed;
A window crashed;
They gasped in sudden fear.
Then all were still again,
They could but wait and pray,
They were but little girls,
Just lassies in their teens.

Then came the crash;
Beneath that pile of wood and tile
And broken glass
They lay.
Three groaned in agony,
Their bodies, bruised and crushed,
Pinned down beneath the wreck.
One, wounded, but still free,
Looked 'round for aid,
But none was near.
She tried to free
Her prostrate comrades.
But what use?

Her puny arms
Could never move the beams
That crushed the limbs
Of those beneath.
And so she bowed her head
In prayer.
'Twas all that lay
Within her power to do
For those in pain,
For she was but a little girl,
Just a lassie in her teens.

The storm raged on;
Would rescue never come?
It seemed an age;
Did no one care?

But what was that?
It rose above that roaring hell
From out that charnel house
Of agony and death
In one clear treble note,

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high."

Another and another joined,
As those who lay in agony
Forgot their pain
And lifted up their hearts
To God.

"All my trust on Thee is stayed;
All my help from Thee I bring;
Cover my defenseless head
With the shadow of Thy wing."

O God, How long
Till rescue come?
One voice faded out
And ceased,
The lips grew still.
Her comrades choked,
Gasped and then sang on While tears ran down
And mingled with their blood.
Another . . . . .
Then another voice grew still,
But one was left

When rescue came,
Just one little girl,
A lassie in her teens.
Men marvelled at it all,
But some were wise and knew
'Twas but the age-old spirit of Japan,
Christ-filled,
That made them strong,
Though they were but a band of little girls,
Just lassies in their teens.

CHURCH WORK AMONG NEGROES.

I. History of Race in American Slavery.

If America be considered in its widest sense as including both continents and the Indies, the introduction of the Negroes was the result of the kind-heartedness of Las Casas, the Spanish priest, to Haiti, who thought that by introducing slaves from Africa he could alleviate the sufferings of the native Indians, who were rapidly dying out under the cruelties of the Spaniards. The Negroes, he argued, could stand hard labor in a tropical climate better than the Indians. But he never thought of the fact that it would cause such untold suffering to the Negroes who would be transported from their African homes under the fearful conditions we can find pictured in Mary Johnston's novel, "Slave Ship", not to speak of how the slaves were often recruited in Africa.

In Africa people became slaves in three ways, the first and smallest of which was as malefactors. All criminals were sold as slaves. The second was as tribute or currency, i. e., each African king of any importance had sovereignty over a number of villages who paid him tribute in slaves, which were the money of the country and could be exchanged at the coast for what was called "trade goods," or cloth and other importations from civilized countries. The third way was as prisoners of war. These were often also the cause of war or slave raids, wherein a village would be surrounded at night and all the sick and old killed and all able-bodied carried off as slaves.

A great trade in slaves grew up in English ships after 1619, when they were first brought to Virginia. It is of interest to know that in the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson had a clause denouncing King George for forcing slavery on the colonies. This was dropped. New England ships later developed a great trade of going to the West Indies and there buying rum, carrying the rum to Africa and exchanging it for slaves, bringing the slaves to the Southern States and selling them for money, then going to the Indies and buying more rum.

As early as the beginning of the nineteenth century there were movements in the South towards freeing the slaves. In 1830, there was a bill introduced into the Virginia Legislature looking towards the gradual freeing of the slaves in that state. It might have passed by a small majority, but its backers, desiring a larger majority, decided to wait until the next year, that it might have a more popular backing and be better known. But in the following year abolition societies were formed advocating the freeing of slaves by violence, so that the bill was not brought up again.

It is also of interest to know that as originally planned by Oglethorpe, Georgia was to have slavery outlawed.

Southern slavery was a bad thing for the Negro, but it was worse for the whites, as it had a tendency to make them look down on manual labor. Its worst effect on the Negro was what is known as slave psychology. For having to depend on his master for everything the slave formed the habit of saying what he thought would please his master, instead of telling the truth. This we call "lying", especially if the person doing it profits by it. As the slave had only his cleverness, but no force or money, his wits were sharpened to get things for himself to which he was not entitled. This we call "cheating." Again, the slave saw his master eating better food than he and wearing better clothes. The only way he saw to get these for himself was by what he called "taking", but which we call "stealing". These traits are common to all peoples who live under the shadow of a much more prosperous race, like the Armenians and the Russian poor farmer. So when we find the Negro lying, cheating and stealing, we may know that it is one of the scars he bears from his two and a half centuries of slavery.

II. Up From Slavery.

Before the War Between the States, many Southern people hesitated to free their selves for fear of what would happen to them, the slaves, when free. After the war many refused to accept freedom and stayed on with their former masters' families, while the master paid wages as the only difference. One such recently died at the age of ninety-eight years and left all her savings to educate the sons of her master for the ministry.

In the sixties there were about four and a half billion Negroes in the country, about four million of whom were slaves. More than nine-tenths of the total lived in the South. After the war there came the Reconstruction period, of which the kindest thing we can say is that a number of people who did not know anything about the Negroes, undertook to guide them, with terrible results that set back their race a great deal, so that we can say their real progress begins in about 1870, though statistics begin in 1866. Thus, then in the sixty-four years from 1866 to 1930, the Negroes that owned their own homes grew until for every Negro that owned a home then, there are seventeen, and for every dollar owned by Negroes in accumulated wealth, Negroes now own $130.

Again progress in education in the same time has been marvelous; one in every ten could read then, but eight in every ten can read now, and for every one then in public schools there are now thirteen. A more remarkable showing yet is made by them when we consider the forty years from 1890 to 1930. For every Negro dentist then, they now have seventeen, and whereas there were then no Negro trained nurses, there are now 5,000.

Many of us, however, have not realized that the old-time Negro with his faults and weaknesses is rapidly becoming a thing of the past, just as the illiteracy of our poorest is rapidly becoming but a memory. The old Negro used to look to the white for everything, for the simple reason that he had nowhere else to look in times of slavery. But there is arising a new Negro who is proud of his race and the great strides that they have made. He is honest, industrious and self-respecting. Not having known slavery, he is forming the habit of putting away money for hard times, and in many cases will not give way to temptation to lie, cheat or steal any quicker than a white man of his own economic strata. Furthermore, he looks to his own people to help him when he is sick or in trouble. As an example of this we mention a Negro tramp who was given a night's lodging in the local jail. He fell sick and a local Negro welfare paid a nurse to care for him. The Negro of slavery was loyal to his master. This new Negro is loyal to his white friends, but he is also loyal to his race. Though the South has many of the old type, this new type is rapidly taking the lead among them. Though there are radicals among the Negroes as well as in other races and groups, and this element is making great demands for social equality among them, yet the radicals are in the minority, the great majority being firm conservatives. Of this larger group we speak, therefore, when we say that: He does not want social equality with the whites. He claims truly that we do not have it among the whites. Nor does he want it in his own race. He is not an African, but an American, and loyal to its institutions and the bitter foe of all who would tear down American institutions. He is law-abiding and doing his best to guide the ignorant and lawless of his own race into the right paths. He needs the sympathy and cooperation of the whites and we believe that some day we will be even more proud of what he shall accomplish than we are of what he has already done.

III. Our Church and the Negro.

The Episcopal Church was the only Church that did not split on the color line at the time of the War Between the States. With its Prayer Book Service, many people are under the impression that there are no Negro Episcopalians. But the 1926 Government Religious Census tells us that we are the seventh largest Negro Church in the country. Furthermore, the largest Negro congregation in the South is the Episcopal Church of St. Agnes in Miami. In the Diocese of South Florida, we have the largest proportion of Negroes in population that are members of our Church in the South, one-fourth of our total communicant list being Negroes. The reason for this is that many West Indian Negroes who have been brought up in the Church of England have come to Florida and naturally turn to Mother Church as their Church home.

While the parochial work of our Negro congregations is well worthy of notice, the most spectacular work of our Church for their race is that of the American Church Institute for Negroes. This is a corporation that was organized in 1906 by the Church "to promote the cause of education of the Negroes in the Southern States in connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church." It has under it one theological seminary, one college, one hospital and training school for nurses and eight high schools in which 3,700 are enrolled in regular term and about the same number in summer schools and farmer conferences, so that each year we give training to about 9,000 Negroes.

The college gives training to teachers for Negro schools and all train for spiritual leadership in their race.

There is another type of work which our Church promotes greatly even in places where we have no Negro communicants. It is that of promoting Negro welfare through promotion of the Urban League, a welfare organization, among the Negroes themselves in larger places, and in promoting volunteer welfare associations among their race in smaller places.

These organizations strive to get the best methods from their white friends and have cooperated with the whites in public relief measures of all kinds, such as flour and cloth distribution, unemployment relief, etc., and have also done much in alleviation of suffering among the poor through moneys collected, and even better, by volunteer services given by their members to people unable to pay regular helpers.

Thus we see the Mother Church calls under her wing her children of other races, not only in far off places, but also close at home, in the name of Him who made all peoples throughout the world.

FORWARD TOGETHER.

"Forward Together" is not only a slogan, but a movement of the youth of the Episcopal Church. Conceived in the National Commission meeting of young people, which was held in Chicago, May 21-23, plans are being made to unite with the youth of the Church in an effort to go "Forward Together" under the Forward Movement.

A Call to the Youth of the Church with practical suggestions as to how to respond to that call has gone out from the National Commission meeting.

Every province was represented at this meeting.

Mr. Charles Wood of Province III was elected Chairman of the Commission for 1935-36, and Miss Pauline Hartlieb of Province II, Secretary-Treasurer.

The Executive Committee is composed of the Rev. Ernest E. Piper, Chairman; Mr. Woods, Miss Lyons, Miss Hartlieb and Miss Fischer.

Perhaps the most important thing accomplished during this three-day Conference was the opening of channels through which the work of the young people of the Church can go forward.

An invitation from the Diocese of California to hold a National Young People's Conference in San Francisco in 1938 during the World's Fair was extended by Mr. Gilbert Hooper, representative of Province VIII. This question of a National Conference will be discussed in the 1936 meeting of the Commission.

A meeting of the National Commission will be held again in 1936, time and place to be decided upon.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE MEETING OF THE SYNOD OF THE PROVINCE OF THE SOUTHWEST.

In view of the fact that the House of Bishops is to meet in Houston in the early part of November, it has been decided by the President of the Province of the Southwest, after taking counsel with the other Bishops of the Province, to postpone the meeting of the Synod (which is usually held in the month of October), until the early spring of 1936.

The Bishop of West Missouri, the Rt. Rev. Robert Nelson Spencer, D. D., has issued a very cordial invitation for the Synod to meet in Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Kansas City, Mo., in the early spring of 1936.

FOURTH NATIVE JAPANESE ELEVATED TO ANGLICAN EPISCOPATE.

At the eighteenth triennial General Synod of the Nippon Seikokwai (Holy Catholic Church in Japan), held early in May, in Sendai, the Rev. Prof. Paul Shinji Sasaki, Professor of Liturgics and Applied Theology, Central Theological College, Tokyo, was elected second Bishop of the Diocese of Mid-Japan. The bishop-elect becomes the fourth native of Japan to be elevated to the Anglican episcopate. The Diocese of Mid-Japan has been a missionary district of the Church of England in Canada since its foundation thirty years ago, and the Rt. Rev. H. J. Hamilton, D. D., who resigned and left Japan last year was its first bishop. Prof. Sasaki succeeds Bishop Hamilton. The Canadian Church will continue to subsidize the missionary work of the diocese, which includes several prefectures stretching through the central part of the Empire from the Pacific Ocean on the East to the Japan Sea on the West.

Prof. Sasaki is to be consecrated on St. James' Day, July 25, at one of the churches in Nagoya, see city of the diocese. Prof. Sasaki was born in Tokyo, March 11, 1885, and is a graduate of the Azabu Middle School and the former S. P. G. Theological School. During 1922 and 1923 he studied at the Society of the Sacred Mission, Kelham, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and at Westcott House, Cambridge, England. Besides being a member of the theological school faculty, Prof. Sasaki has been rector of Meijiro Church, Tokyo, for the past seventeen years, except during his absence in England. During the school year of 1920-21, he was head of the Department of Religions of St. Paul's University, Tokyo, and university chaplain. He was ordained deacon at St. Andrew's Church, Tokyo, on December 21, 1912, and priest at the same church on April 25, 1917, by the Rt. Rev. Cecil Boutflower, D. D., then Bishop of South Tokyo. Prof. Sasaki was easily the most favored candidate for the election as new Bishop of Mid-Japan. A friend long resident in Japan writes of him: "He is a saint, a wonderful pastor, a very telling preacher, and absolutely devout. They loved him at Kelham."

The new bishop will have under his care twenty-seven established parishes: a foreign staff, including six clergy, one layman and thirteen women workers; a Japanese staff of nineteen clergy, five chatechists and seven women workers; twelve Church schools, and the New Life Hospital for tubercular patients at Obuse. Included in the Diocese of Mid-Japan is the Karuzizawa Church, used by both Japanese and English-speaking Churchmen. Recent statistics of the Nippon Seikokwai show approximately 4,000 baptized members of the Church in Mid-Japan and an equal number of Church school pupils.

The Canadian Church is making history in its willingness to continue the support of its bishopric when the bishop is Japanese.

RURAL WORK CONFERENCE TO BE HELD JULY 1-12.

The Episcopal Conference on Rural Church Work will be held this summer as usual, in connection with the Rural Leadership Summer School of the University of Wisconsin, July 1 to 12.

Despite the loss of its secretary for rural work, the National Council's Social Service Department is to continue this project. The executive secretary, the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, will serve as leader and chaplain. The Rt. Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, Bishop of Mississippi, and Honorary President of the Rural Workers' Fellowship, will preach the annual conference sermon at Grace Church, Madison, Wisconsin, on Sunday, July 7.

Each day will begin with a celebration of the Holy Communion in St. Andrew's Church. After breakfast, members of the group will attend the special lectures provided by the university. Then all groups will meet for the daily assembly, at which Dr. Don D. Loscohier, Professor of Economics at the University, will lecture on Trends Toward Security.

Thereafter the Episcopal group will gather for its own noon-day conference. The general theme for these daily conferences will be Rural Church Methods. The following subjects will be presented by clergy who have shown special skill in dealing with them:

Religious Education in Rural Church School, by the Rev. Vernon C. McMaster, of the National Council staff; Preparing For Spiritual Adulthood, by the Rev. Peter E. Spehr, of Nebraska; A Survey of a Local Trade Area, by the Rev. Earl T. Kneebone, of South Dakota; Rural and Urban Church Relationship, by the Rev. John R. Pick-ells, of Illinois; Values and Risks in Using Lay Readers, by the Rev. Val. H. Sessions, of Mississippi; and Rising Tides of Rural Secularism, by the Rev. R. H. Mize, Jr. Mr. Barnes has a conference on The Rural Parish and Its Community.

The conference is planned especially for the rural clergy, all diocesan rural workers, both laymen and woman, all officials in organizations charged with the work of the rural church. The clergy and laymen of the conference will be housed together in one of the fraternity houses. It is expected that their expense for room and board during the entire period will be $24.75. Further details may be secured by writting to the Department at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY FINALS.

Fork Union graduated the largest class in its history. There were thirty-five graduates in the Academic Department, twenty-three in the Commercial Department, and eleven in the post-graduate department, a total of sixty-nine.

On Founder's Day, Dr. Wicker, the President, and Colonel Perkins, the headmaster of the academic department, delivered addresses on the Founder, Dr. William E. Hatcher.

The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Dr. Ernest F. Campbell of the Rivermont Avenue Church, Lynchburg, Va., and at the commencement exercises on Monday morning the address to the graduating class was delivered by Dr. P. Roland Wagner of Norfolk, Va., who took as his theme, "The Chemistry of Character."

The enrollment for next session is twice as large as it was a year ago, and a new dormitory is being erected to care for this increase.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. G. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Frederick D. Goodwin, D. D., Coadjutor.

English Visitors in Richmond.

On May 28, Canon Stacy Waddy, secretary of the S. P. G. in London, and Sir Edward Midwinter were the guests of Bishop Tucker at a luncheon in the Jefferson Hotel. Other guests included Bishop Goodwin, the Rev. Messrs. G. M. Brydon, B. D. Tucker, John Scott, W. Leigh Ribble, C. W. F. Smith, and the Ven. A. V. Colston, and Mr. Lewis Williams. Mr. Colston recalled the fact that his first charge in America was as a chaplain to an English colony in Iowa under the auspices of the S. P. G.

Although the Church in Virginia was instrumental in helping to establish the S. P. G., rather than being sustained by that venerable society, there has always been a warm gratitude in this State for the great work the Society did to further the interests of the Church in America during the Colonial period, and it was a pleasure to have these representatives of the S. P. G. visit this old diocese.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D. Bishop.

Christ and St. Luke's Church, Norfolk.

The already announced consolidation of Christ Church, St. Luke's, and St. Andrew's, the three churches in the Ghent section of Norfolk, became effective on June 1. On that morning the vestry met and made the following elections:

Rector, the Rev. Taylor Willis, formerly rector of St. Luke's; Associate rector, the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, D. D., formerly rector of St. Andrew's.

The central plan of worship of the consolidated church is the former Christ Church building, which is under the ministry of Mr. Willis. The St. Luke's property is abandoned and will be disposed of. Mr. Willis will not occupy the Christ Church rectory, which will be annexed to the parish house and used in connection therewith. St. Andrew's and its Church schools will continue in operation under the ministry of Dr. Jones.

The first services of the consolidated church were held in the Christ Church building on Sunday, June 2. The Rev. Norman E. Taylor, Executive Secretary of the diocese, was celebrant at the 7:30 A. M. Holy Communion. At 11 A. M. Holy Communion was celebrated, and the congregation filled the 900 seats in the church and compelled the use of chairs at the rear of the Selden Memorial Chapel for additional worshippers, of whom about 350 communicated at this service. The Rt. Rev. Arthur C. Thomson, D. D., was the celebrant. The ancient Communion silver of Christ Church was used at this celebration, the several pieces of which date from 1700 to 1762.

Especial distinction attached to this service by reason of the fact that the sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, and President of the National Council. Bishop Cook took occasion to refer to the Christ Church building as being known through the Church as one of the gems of Gothic architecture in America. The increased opportunity for service in the cause of the faith offered by the consolidation was the theme of Bishop Cook's sermon, and his text, from 1 Tim. 3:15, was: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth." Preceding the sermon, Mr. Willis called upon the congregation for support in his new and broadened field, and promised his full loyalty to the consolidated church.

"I am following a long line of Christian and devoted servants here," Mr. Willis said, referring to the former rectors of Christ Church, "and their devotion is of great help to me. In return for their loyalty and fellowship, my pledge will be absolute loyalty to the general church, and absolute loyalty to your diocese and mine. My wish will be to make a permanent place for myself in the hearts of you all."

Mr. Willis then announced that services in future would be conducted at Christ and St. Luke's Church, and at St. Andrew's Church, according to the usual schedule, and that services at St. Luke's would be discontinued.

The fine choir of boys and men trained and directed by Mr. George M. Vail, rendered music of atype and quality befitting this great occasion. Mr. Vail is a well-known composer of sacred music as well as a distinguished choirmaster.

This triple merger for the complete relief of an over-churched territory sets a precedent and points the way. It was accomplished only through much travail and by dint of perseverance, patience, prayer and self-sacrifice. But it is believed to be the most constructive piece of statesmanship that has ever been accomplished in the Virgina dioceses.

105th Anniversary of Founding of Zion Church: Reredos Dedicated.

Zion Church, Douglaston, of which the Rev. Lester Leake Riley is rector, commemorated the one hundred and fifth anniversary of its founding by a festival service on Sunday morning, June 16, at eleven o'clock.

The occasion is made of distinctive interest this year by the dedication of a beautiful, wood-carved, polychromed reredos, designed and sculptured by Trygve Hammer of Douglaston, and presented to Zion Church by a committee of friends and neighbors.

The clergy participating in the service, in addition to Bishop Creighton and the rector, included the Rev. Herbert J. Leake, of St. Petersburg, Fla., who read the lesson, and the Rev. Dr. Edgar L. Sanford of Oneonta, who was rector of Zion Church from 1890 to 1892, and preached the sermon of the occasion on "Memories of Zion Church."

New Rector Spent Ten Years in Iraq.

The Rev. John B. Panfil, for the past ten years the head of the Archbishop of Canterbury's mission in Mosul, Iraq, has recently taken charge of Holy Cross Parish of the Polish National Catholic Church at 432 Wilkinson Street, Syracuse. In doing so, Fr. Panfil has in no way resigned his ministry in the Episcopal Church. He was urged to take this position by the Rev. Dr. Robert F. Law, Advisory Commissioner on Ecclesiastical Relations. Fr. Panfil left Iraq only because he was driven out by the Arabs in the recent persecution of the Christians during which three thousand Christians were massacred. He stood by his flock at the risk of his life, and actually lost all his material possessions.

Brenaman Memorial Plot.

Mr. Bert F. Brenaman, a loyal and devout churchman and a prominent funeral director of Syracuse, has purchased a large plot in Hillcrest Cemetery. I shall quote Mr. Brenaman's words: "During these trying times many people have become somewhat dependent through no fault of their own but due to circumstances beyond control. Because of these unusual conditions and because we as Episcopalians want to do our part, that no member of the Protestant Episcopal Church be buried in Potter's Field, we have carefully selected a section in beautiful Hillcrest Park Cemetery to be known as 'Brenaman Memorial Plot.'

"When circumstances are such that a communicant of your Church passes away or loses a loved one in their family and there are no funds with which to purchase a grave, we will give them a grave in the Brenaman Memorial section, the only expense being the cost of opening the grave."

Mr. Bresee was the recipient of a purse containing a generous amount and also received a new set of vestments.

Rt. Rev. J. DeWolf Perry, D. D., Bishop

Old Home Day at St. Thomas'.

St. Thomas' Church, Providence, a mission in the northern section of the city, attended largely by mill folk, set about beautifying its grounds and buildings this spring. There was need, for there was no grass to mention in the sandy soil, and the buildings falling into disrepair, hadn't been painted for many years. It interested industrialists, philanthropists and garden lovers in and out of the Episcopal Church. A United States Senator also gave liberally to the cause, and Italian merchants in the neighborhood contributed their mites. A swarm of volunteers operated wheel-barrows and shovels sent up every day from neighboring mills after working hours, and many cubic yards of loam were unloaded and lawn seeded. A parishioner, who conducts a coal and ice business, loaned a truck for two Saturdays to haul away the excavated sand.

As soon as the grass was up and shrubs planted, another squad of volunteers, skilled in carpentry, gathered every afternoon after work, tore off rotten boards from church, parish house and rectory and replaced them with new. And now the entire plant is being planted. On Sunday, June 23, all the old St. Thomas' folk within reach are expected to attend an Old Home Day Service and inspect the work.

Broadcast Under Auspices Girls' Friendly Society.

A radio talk on "A New Deal for the Home and the Forgotten Child," was broadcast by Mrs. Charles Townsend, President of The Girls' Friendly Society in the Diocese of Rhode Island, over Station WEAN, May 28, at 9:30 A. M.

"The home and the child have both, to some extent, been forgotten in our extreme emphasis on new methods and new programs, our standardizing of studies, athletics, and social clubs," said Mrs. Townsend. "The tendency is evident to make these good things ends in themselves and to lose sight of the home and the child. The Girls' Friendly Society, after fifty years of continuous life and experience, claims for itself a technique and a spirit, due to its underlying claims for itself, that furnish for its members one remedy for this situation. . . . The associates and members of The Girls' Friendly Society realize in actual experience that only on the fundamental principles of the well-rounded Christian life, which must include recreation, service, and worship, can there be a new deal for the home and the forgotten child."

Mrs. Townsend's talk was one of a series of broadcasts on the subject sponsored by the Rhode Island Congress of Parents and Teachers, in which specialists on child study and representatives of organizations dealing with young people were invited to speak. Station WEAN covers the State of Rhode Island and is part of the New England network. The Parent-Teachers' hour, which is held once a week, began in February and will continue through June.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, D. D., Bishop.

Commencement at St. Augustine's.

The sixty-eighth annual commencement exercises at St. Augustine's College, Raleigh, were again graced by the presence of three bishops. Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, D. D., Bishop of North Carolina, presented the principal speaker, and Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, pronounced the benediction. The commencement speaker was Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware and President of the National Council.

"The Wage, the Work and the Master" was the subject of Bishop Cook's beautiful and inspiring address, as he described these three forces as the great motives of life. That all men may have the right to the vocation for which each is fitted, and along with it a just compensation to assure economic independence, "our economic system cries for adjustment", said the Bishop. The compensation is necessary, for "no one who must be a beggar, whatever his work, can command the respect of the community which is due every man making a contribution to its life. The wage is necessary to bring independence. But the wage is not the most important item. If the job is worth while, the work is more important than the fee. In some vocations, like teaching, the ministry, and social service, the joys of the work are recognized as part of the compensation. "Those to whom the fee is paramount should avoid such vocations," he warned. "The highest motive," Bishop Cook concluded, "is loyalty to the Master. The figure of Jesus stands high above that of any other historical character in that He has inspired loyalty and devotion in the lives of millions of His followers through the centuries, with a power that is unique."

Degrees were conferred by Rev. Edgar H. Goold, president of the college, on twenty-seven graduates of the college department. Diplomas were conferred on three graduates of the Bishop Tuttle School, six graduates of St. Agnes' Training School for Nurses, and sixteen graduates of the college preparatory department.

The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Rev. D. LeRoy Ferguson, rector of St. Cyprian's Church, Boston, Mass., and member of the class of 1900. Another member of the class of 1900 was among those receiving the B. A. degree. Miss Artemisia Bowden, who finished the normal department thirty-five years ago, and now president of St. Philip's Junior College, San Antonio, Texas., returned to St. Augustine's this school year and took her degree in course. Another graduate was an alumni of St. Philip's.

Dr. Robert W. Patton, Director of the American Church Institute for Negroes, was present on the stage. St. Augustine's, an "institute school", is the only full four-year college for Negroes under the auspices of the Church. Under the able presidency of the Rev. Edgar H. Goold, within the five years since the first degrees were granted, St. Augustine's has earned recognition far and wide for its merits. Founded in 1854, as a high school, a normal school, a collegiate institute, and finally as a college, it occupies a secure place in the regard of the thousands who have learned of its work and service.

English Churchmen Visit Raleigh.

The Rev. Canon Stacy Waddy, D. D., and Captain Sir Edward Midwinter, K. B. E., distinguished London Churchmen, were recent visitors in Raleigh at the invitation of the Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, Bishop of North Carolina, and were entertained by clergy and laity of the Episcopal Church at a luncheon at the Sir Walter Hotel May 30, after a trip to the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill and Duke University. Earlier in the day, Canon Waddy celebrated the Holy Communion at Christ Church at 7:30 o'clock in the morning. Both the guests spoke at the luncheon in their honor, which was a most representative gathering, including eighty-three Churchmen, one governor, two Supreme Court judges, four university and college professors, about thirty-five clergymen and numerous substantial business men.

The visitors are secretary and director of archives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the famous missionary organization of the Church of England that received its charter from King William III and has been in continuous and active existence since 1701.

A feature of Sir Edward's talk was the reading of letters from the Carolina mission workers taken from the archives of the Society in which they described in graphic fashion the hardships encountered in their labors in the new land. The speaker observed that, although their lot was not pleasant by any means, that they planted the seeds of the Church that have since flourished as a ever-expanding and living memorial to their tribulations and sacrifices.

Canon Waddy, an attractive speaker with a ready store of sharp wit and humor, told of the widespread work of the Society that reaches into practically every nook and corner of the world. He described the Society as the crystallization of the English Church conscience, and declared that its work was heartily endorsed and promoted by all classes in the British Empire.

Prior to the luncheon, Canon Waddy and Sir Edward, accompanied by members of the clergy and laymen, visited the Hall of History, where they placed a wreath over the picture of the late Ambassador Walter Hines Page, who served with distinction at the Court of St. James, and they went to Cary, where they visited the room in which Mr. Page was born, with Canon Waddy commemorating the occasion with a prayer.

The thirtieth annual session of the Council of Colored Churchmen met at St. Augustine's Church, Savannah, May 14-15. The session opened with Evening Prayer, followed by Bishop Reese's annual address.

The Woman's Auxiliary met in connection with the Council. A Corporate Communion of the Auxiliary took place on the morning of the fifteenth, the Rev. J. Clyde Perry, rector of St. Athanasius' Church, Brunswick, being the celebrant.

In the absence of the Bishop, Archdeacon Brown, vicar of St. Augustine's Church, presided throughout the session. The Council decided to hold its sessions in the future, before the meeting of the Diocesan Convention. It also decided that in the future the sessions shall be of two full days' duration. The Diocesan Convention, by resolution, appointed a committee to confer with a similar committee from the Council of Colored Churchmen (which committee was appointed) relative to the establishing of a closer relationship between the two bodies.

St. Matthias' Church.

(The William A. Simpson Memorial.)

Fourteen years ago the Vestry of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, was left $15,000 for the purpose of building a church or chapel in the Diocese of Maryland, as a memorial to Mr. William A. Simpson. This money has been held by them in trust pending the time when a strategic point for forward work in the diocese would be open. Recently their attention was drawn to such a point at St. Matthias' Church, one of the diocesan missions.

St. Matthias' Church on Belair Road was started twenty-six years ago, when a small group of Church people felt the need of a place to worship. A small frame building was erected and under the guardianship of several churches in Baltimore, the services were held each Sunday. In 1929 the Rev. James A. Mitchell, then rector of the Church of the Messiah, Baltimore, asked the Bishop whether they might not take St. Matthias' as a Chapel. It was granted, and two years later, after successful work by the Rev. Lewis O. Heck, who was a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary, it was made a diocesan mission with a resident priest in charge of the work.

Since then the Church School has nearly trippled in attendance, the communicants have more than doubled, and the income has increased from $877.62 in 1929 to $2,635.04 in 1934.

The need for a new church was quite obvious, and when it was presented to the Vestry of the Church of the Ascension and Prince of Peace (Ascension had in the interim combined with the Church of the Prince of Peace), they felt that this was a strategic point in the diocese to erect a church as a memorial to Mr. William A. Simpson.

Plans for a group of buildings have been drawn up by Mr. Henry S. T. White, of Mottu & White, who is a vestryman of Memorial Church. The design will be that of the English Tudor period, and the plans provide for a church building, a parish house, a rectory, and an administrative building. As soon as the working drawings are completed and the contracts awarded, the first unit, which is to be the church, will be erected.

Coming at a time when there has been a general curtailment of new church buildings, this project is welcomed. Some of the work will be done by members of St. Matthias' congregation, who are in various building trades.

The Rev. C. Randolph Mengers, who has been the priest-in-charge, will continue as vicar.

The Woman's Council.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Council of the Diocese of Maryland was held May 22, in the Pro-Cathedral.

The Council was opened with the Holy Communion. Bishop Helfenstein was the celebrant.

The business meeting was opened by the Bishop. A letter was read from Mrs. Knox, the retiring Chairman of the Council, who could not be present owing to a serious automobile accident.

Mrs. Roger A. Walke was asked by the Bishop to take charge of the meeting. The following reports were then read. Girls' Friendly, Miss Helen Diggs; Daughters of the King, Mrs.

Bingley; Church Periodical Club, Miss Miller; Church Mission of Help, Miss Clarke; Altar Guild, Miss Priscilla Howard; Bishop's Guild, Mrs. Bruin; Educational Department, Miss Sturgis; Religious Drama, Mrs. Boynton; Social Service, Mrs. Hartman K. Harrison; Supply Department, Mrs. C. Ellis Ellicott, Jr.; Surgical Dressings, Mrs. Tyler. Mrs. Tyler also told of the Women's Board of the Church Home and begged cooperation and help for the little shop the Board is maintaining in the Hospital. Church Pantry, Mrs. Gordon Johnston; Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. Shoemaker. Mrs. Moore, President of the Province of Washington, was then introduced and told of the various Conferences that are to be held this summer. She urged that as many as possible go to the Blue Mountain Conference. Mrs. John M. Nelson, treasurer of the United Thank Offering, reported a collection for the half year of $3,589.68.

The Rev. Dr. Hart of Washington gave an interesting account of the Forward Movement. He stressed the getting together behind the ideals of the Forward Movement of all Church people, for in unity is our greatest strength, and begged for a large Corporate Communion on Whitsunday, saying that it was only when the disciples were together in the upper room that they received the gift of the Holy Spirit.

The Bishop announced the appointment of Mrs. Roger A. Walke to succeed Mrs. Knox as Chairman of the Woman's Council, and Mrs. John M. Nelson as Treasurer of the U. T. O.

Quoting from a letter written by one of the guests from another diocese, "Went to Baltimore yesterday to the annual meeting of the Woman's Council. About 200 women were there listening to the corking reports of work done. They do not have everything under the Auxiliary and the Council is a clearing house for all the organizations. Lots of young women giving the reports."

Inspiring Confirmation Service in Penitentiary.

Bishop Walter Mitchell, of Arizona, the Dean, clergy and choir of Trinity Cathedral, Phoenix, traveled seventy miles to the State Penitentiary at Florence on Sunday afternoon, May 12, to hold a special service. A young man, Richard Burrows, was convicted about five years ago and given a life sentence for the murder of the driver of an automobile in which he was riding. Through these years the clergy and the Bishop have kept in touch with him, and the occasion of the service was his presentation for confirmation.

The service took place in the great assembly hall of the prison, with over 400 men and women in attendance. Several solos and anthems were rendered by the members of the choir, and then the candidate was presented for confirmation by Dean Lane. Following the laying on of hands, Bishop Mitchell made a splendid address, both on the significance of the occasion and on the practice of the religious life. On the Bishop's invitation over one hundred Prayer Books and Hymnals were taken by the prisoners for their own use.

The chaplain of the prison, who is the pastor of the Methodist Church in Florence, has invited the choir to come for a service in the fall, and it is probable that the choir of Trinity Cathedral and the clergy will follow this opening by holding services several times a year at least.

"THAT THEY MIGHT HAVE LIFE."

Rev. W. L. Kinsolving.

"Whither-soever Thou goest I will go!"
Cried the young Scribe with fiery zeal to Christ.
"Foxes have holes and birds of air their tryst;
No home have I, the Son of Man, to show."
"Suffer me first to bury my own sire,"
Another cries. But Jesus doth reply:
"They who are dead perform such work, not I
Who live. But thou, Come, go with Me, nor tire!"
Then, when the little boat was on the sea,
A storm arose and waves menaced their lives.
"Save, Lord, we perish!" crieth one who strives
To calm his soul, who dreads death's mystery;
Christ calmed the sea. Thus three times answered fears
With zest for life and action—not with tears!

II.

And we who say we strive to follow Him,
Can we go with Him Who hath no abode,
In lonely exile stride where He hath strode?
Or was our wish to go but sudden whim?

Have we dead hopes to linger o'er at home?
And shall we spend our lives in listless woe?
More dead ourselves than others seeming so?
Can we like Christ live out 'neath Heaven's blue dome?

Are we afraid, when perils rush like waves
About the tiny shell wherein we float:
Our lives are grimly tossed like that small boat—
How little faith we have in Him Who saves!
Rebuke the winds, O Christ, rebuke our fear;
And make us see the glorious sun appear!

The Success of Failure.

"My life has been a failure." Such is the wail of many a man the springtime of whose life gave brilliant promise. We step forth in youth with ambition beating high, the horizon aflame with hope. But how often the sun goes down behind clouds of defeat.

The story of human life is the story of disappointment—dreams unfulfilled, ideals unrealized, goals unattained. If life is a garden, then we stand many times among withered flowers. If life is a book, then the word failure must be written over many a chapter.

Seldom, if ever, in human history have there been so many haunted by the shadow of failure. Numberless people all over the land could echo the words of the disciples, "We have toiled all the night and have taken nothing." Through the long weary hours of the night Peter and his fellow fishermen had labored, and labored in vain. No wonder they were dispirited and downcast.

I look about me day by day and see the men and women who have striven and sacrificed, but in the eyes of the world have not succeeded. It is not to be wondered that they become wistful at times and question if it is worth while to go on trying. And a wild longing rises up within me to say some word that will be helpful and encouraging, that will be as a cup of strength to some fainting spirit.

The success of failure! The Bible is full of the story of conspicuous failures. That is what the eleventh chapter of Hebrews sings. Somebody has called it the most audacious of all poems because it is the epic of failure. It is written in the honor of heroes and heroines all of whom at last were foiled and fell by the wayside. "These all died in faith," we read, "not having received." They dreamed, but they never accomplished. They were tortured, mocked, scourged, imprisoned, stoned, sawn asunder, slain with the sword." An epic of failure, of splendid failure! For it was said of them that they were men "of whom the world was not worthy."

How full history is of the story of noble failure, of the names of the men who did not do what they set out to do. There was Hannibal at the mention of whose name how many a schoolboy's heart flushes warm with interest. Splendid failure, so splendid that, while his name abides, we have about all of us forgotten the name of his conqueror. And there was Leonidas, who died at his post at Thermopylae and whose matchless sacrifice will forever awaken enthusiasm. His conqueror, too, we have about forgotten. And there was old Socrates telling Athens the truth and doomed to drink poison for it; and Savonarola, the brave spirit who faced all Florence and dared to tell it of its evil, and hanged in chains and burned for it; and Dante, an exile for conscience sake from his native land.

And then in the procession that seems to pass before me of those whom the world called failures, and of whom the world was not worthy, rides Robert E. Lee. That scene enacted amid the Virginia hills on the ninth day of April, 1865, revealed what the world had seldom witnessed before—a vanquished leader still idolized by his men. When he rode on his horse, Traveler, from the McLean house into the Confederate lines and among the soldiers we are told "in an instant they were about him, bareheaded, with tear-wet faces; thronging him, kissing his hands, his boots, his saddle; and cheering him amid their tears, shouting his name to the very skies. He said: 'Men, we have fought through the war together. I have done my best for you. My heart is too full to say more'."

So grandly Lee moved in the hour of defeat and in the after years that there is in the recollection of his surrender at Appomattox nothing of humiliation for the South, but much to bring to the hearts of her people the glow of grateful pride in and for the sons she has brought forth. The place of his surrender a shrine, an altar on which the South laid its last living and heroic sacrifice.

And after Appomattox came Lexington where he stooped from former greatness to do the work that some men would call small, and did it grandly. He could neither avert defeat nor prevent the injustices of reconstruction. But he could do more. It was his noble bearing of both that caused the South to suffer and be strong. Had Robert E. Lee, in whom the South trusted, been other than pure gold, would the South have amerged from that trial as by fire purified Apparently he toiled all night and caught nothing. But what a splendid failure!

Most splendid failure of all—Jesus failed. "He came to His own and His own received Him not." Instead He was betrayed, denied and deserted. Magnificent failure! For we know today that lonely failure on Calvary's Cross was only seeming failure.

And what was true of Jesus was also true of His disciples. They all came to a bad end. All, but one, died an unnatural death. They were young men, with all the dreams and ambitions of youth, but their voices were choked by sword or flame before their message was half told. They would have said, "We have toiled all the night and have taken nothing." Glorious failure!

What great comforters these failures, so-called, have been to humanity! In our days of defeat and cloud and pain it is not the victories and successes of men that most cheer and brace us for life's hard experiences. It is far more apt to be the word of some dying patriot, like Samuel Davis, the young Tennessee hero, who when offered pardon on the scaffold if he would reveal the source of the dispatches found on him, said, "I would sooner die a thousand deaths." Or the word of some saint or martyr like John Brown's wife. It was during the persecution of the Covenanters in Scotland. Cloverhouse blew her husband's head off before her very eyes. "What do you think of him now?" he asked, pointing to the decapitated body. And she replied, "I always thought well of him, but I never thought so well of him as at this moment."

When the heart fails and the spirit flags, we think of these and others like them and the clouds lift from the gloomy horizon and the path shines out clear before us and our hearts become once more sure of God and a strange power comes into us that holds us bravely to our tasks.—From an article by Dr. H. A. Porter, in Christian Index.

The Holy Spirit.

The Holy Spirit is God immanent in His world in the most intimate relation with man in whom we live and move and have being. This concept of God begins with the creation when "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," and the prophets viewed the "stormy winds" as the breath of God and all the agents and activities of nature as the manifestion of His immediate presence and power. The Holy Spirit was given to Jesus without measure in whom dwell the fulness of God bodily and He imparted this gift to His disciples and this was the great event and blessing of Pentecost. The Holy Spirit, then, is God in us filling us with His life and moving us to do His will.

The great prayer of the Christian Church through the ages has been for a deeper breath of the Holy Spirit and this is the appeal of our preaching and prayers and hymns. When we feel that our hearts and whole personality are more fully cleansed and vitalized and spiritualized we attribute this to the Holy Spirit dwelling in us. Times of revival are the "outpouring of the Spirit," and spiritual deadness is due to the absence of the Spirit or to our lost sensitivity to His presence.

We should use every means to obtain this blessing. The great means is the sincere and earnest desire to have God in us quickening all our life, and such a desire is a condition of receptivity for which God is waiting and which He will satisfy. There is enough of His Holy Breath to fill all souls as there is enough air to fill all lungs. It was this desire that brought the people to that Pentecostal service and gave Christianity such a powerful impetus and momentum in the beginning, and we can have the same outpouring today according to our desire. The Lenten season especially has this in view and we should see and seize it as our day of opportunity.—Selected.

FOR OTHERS' SAKE.

Lillian G. Stafford.

This morning, Heartache stood beside my path,
And said, "I've come to walk with you today".
I looked upon her form and found her real,
No shadow to be gayly laughed away;
And so I answered, "You may walk with me,
But only on my terms: We'll march along
As if to music, with our heads held high,
With smiling faces, and a bit of song;
You must not lag, nor bow your head and weep,
Lest others pasing us should know 'tis you;
I would not that one life should sadder be
For having met us when you walk with me.

"But GOD will know and understand. He, too,
Will walk beside me, closer still than you."

"Thy Kingdom Come, O Lord."

Everybody with even a vestige of a brain is giving thought to the plight in which the world finds itself. Most thinking halts halfway, at the barriers of politics, economics of sociology. Those who think things through know that the goal we all seek lies farther on, in the realm of personal character and standards. Things will never be right until individual men and women are right.

Suppose we just imagine that, by some supernatural wave of religious conviction, the world were swept forward into an acceptance of Christian standards of life, the standards of Jesus.

Then greed, and the disparity of possessions which it represents, would disappear from society: for there are no avaricious citizens of the Kingdom of God.

Poverty would vanish, for in the Brotherhood of Jesus nobody is permitted to lack while others have plenty.

Oppression and injustice would be eliminated, for righteousness is the Way of Christ.

Little children would be delivered from everything that blights souls, from foul motion pictures, the saloon and child labor, for the sway of the Saviour cherishes the little ones.

War would be no more; for the Prince of Peace would reign.

All Christians would be one body, bent on doing the Will and winning the world.

In short, all that is wrong would be made right, under the domain of the Divine compulsion: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."—William T. Ellis.

RELEASE.

Monica Williams.

The seed we sow along the furrowed row—
And leave forgotten in the friendly earth,
Will quietly, through the rain and sunshine, grow
And prove to us God's law of priceless worth.

The thoughts we sow in love and friendly deed—
And leave with God—not praise of man to seek,
Will through God's Grace in bounteous life proceed,
Like seeds from which, in kind, God's mercies speak.

For law is life, and through all nature lives—
In never changing, never wavering love,
And brings to self the life, it truly gives,
In kind, the same—in measure far above.

But listen, lest we fail to understand—
We cannot hold the tiny things that grow,
For Faith is but release through heart and hand,
The things we want we must, in love, let go.

For life is loss, then truly greater gain
Will follow, through the darkness and the light,
The seed forgotten, does its life retain,
And God its glories will bring forth to sight.

A Christian Land.

A missionary, who had seen thirty years of service, and was on her third furlough, was asked by a lady if the United States really seemed like a Christian land to her. She replied: "The contrast with a heathen land is thrilling. The longer I am here the more I realize the difference between it and a heathen land. Undoubtedly, there are great evils here, but for all that the moral tone is high, and there is an atmosphere of true religion. I felt the difference as soon as I landed, and it has grown upon me every day."—The Christian Herald.

The Labor of the Hen.

What strange, inconsistent, fiercely loyal, fanatically zealous people were the Pharisees! If an egg was layed on the Sabbath, it could not be eaten because the labor of the hen was a profanation of the Sabbath. The Pharisees were fond of saying: "When two who sit together are not talking of the law, the seat is a seat of mockers." Again: "'Woe unto him who, when walking by the way and meditating upon the law, should pause to say, 'How lovely is that tree!' or 'How beautiful is that newly ploughed field!' Such a one has forfeited his life." How difficult it was for Jesus to bring the abundant life to the Pharisees! It is for you and me to see to it that our life is not so narrow, hide bound, bigoted and reactionary that there is no room for Jesus, with His winsomeness and grace, and the magic charm of His personality, to enter in, bringing with Him the abundant life.—Southern Christian Advocate.

A BLIND MAN.

St. Luke 18, v. 35-43.

Monica Williams.

A blind man sat by the side of the road
As Jesus came that way,
And cried aloud in pleading voice
To the Lord, his God, that day.

And many there were who heard him call,
And bade him hold his peace:
But Jesus answered, "What wilt thou?"
To this beggar, who sought release.

His eyes were blind and his heart was sore
In the bonds of his sorrowing load.
But he heard the steps of the throng that pressed
On the dusty Jericho road.

And he cried aloud to his Lord that day;
When they told him Jesus passed.
And the Saviour paused, and sight restored
For in Faith had the beggar asked.

And Oh, dear Saviour, we are blind
Though our eyes see the light of day
We are blind to the truths of life that lead
Unto Thee, in Thy Loving Way.

May we not hear as the blind man heard
And ask, when we fail to see
For the Saviour's call is waiting for all—
"What wilt thou, I should do unto thee?"

THOSE RECTORY CHILDREN.

Chapter XXII.

A Spring Hunt.

M. L. G.

Four miles beyond the Far Ridge, where Little River joins the Whitewater, the hills shelve steeply down, until pine, birch and soak are roughly reflected, as if in a mirror of beaten bronze. But around a bend of the mingled streams there is a quiet place, crescent-shaped, thinly wooded, and where the water touches the land in gentler ripples. Here on a sunny August morning five riders drew rein.

Here was Mr. Craig, soon to return to China, "lean and keen", as Father said, the best of company, the most friendly of companions; there was Father himself, quiet and yet eager, for it had been long since he had had a whole week ahead of him free of responsibility. There were Ham and Pat and David, brimming with excitement, finding fun in everything, even in their stiffness from the long ride.

"I'll be chief cook," announced Mr. Craig, after the horses had been taken care of. "I learned in China to make a fire from just about nothing. Here I'm pretty luxurious, with wood all about, and matches."

"But everything to cook with is on the wagon," said Ham.

"They'll be along presently. I'll get my fire going. Didn't Alice say there was a spring somewhere near?"

"Let's go find it!" David cried.

"Keep together, boys, until you learn the lay of the land. Nothing to get water in, until the wagon comes, so just explore and tell us what you find," said Father.

"I have my compass," said Pat, as they started off. "Can't get lost with this."

"Let's cut sticks, like Alpine climbers. There sure are hills enough," suggested Ham, as they went along through the woods.

The sticks were soon found and cut, with Ham's big pocket knife, to the right size and smoothness.

"They help a lot," said Ham, who was inclined to stoutness; "whew, this is a steep hill!"

"Do you find springs at the top of hills?" asked David, doubtfully.

"I shouldn't think so," Pat answered. "But let's climb this one, anyway, and get a look around."

But the top was too thickly wooded for them to see far. Brown pine needles covered the ground; there was little undergrowth. The trees stood so near together that the sunlight came only in long shafts through the branches.. The air was spicy with pine.

Ham threw himself on the ground. "I feel like a nap already. You fellows go find the spring and then come back here for me."

"No, sirree!" David said, prodding him with his staff, "Father said we mustn't be separated. Let's run down the hill on the other side."

"Not much other side to it, just a little way down, then a higher climb," answered Pat. "I think we'd better go back and try again, keeping on the level ground. We really should be finding that spring. Let's see, which way did we come?"

"Now's the time for your compass," suggested Ham, as the three peered about through the many aisles between the pines, all so alike. "We can't go by the sun, it's nearly overhead."

Pat drew out the compass, and they all studied the tiny trembling needle.

"Well, there's north all right. The only trouble is—did we come north or south to get here?"

None of them knew.

"Let's think it out," said David, "and then we'll have the best thoughts of all of us to go by."

"All right, old thought-box," answered Ham. "My best thought is a little nap, then we'll wake refreshed and find our way out in a jiffy."

"Mine is to go each in a different direction and look the ground over, then come back and decide which found the best," Pat said, locking the compass in its case.

"But that would mean separating. Suppose we could not find the meeting-place?" David objected. "Mine is to mark a tree—I can tie my handkerchief around this small limb—and go all together in a circle, only as far as we can see the tree. If we don't see some clearing we can try it with some other center."

"That's pretty good. Only we don't need a whole circle, for it's just plain mountain over that way, so that can't be right."

A half hour of following this plan led them to a somewhat more open spot, but there was nothing familiar about it.

"Listen!" said Pat, suddenly. "There's something ringing."

"Oh, a cow-bell! Don't you see the cows on that next slope! That must mean a farmhouse." Ham was delighted. "I bet Mrs. Farmer will give us a glass of milk all round and hitch up the horses to get us back!" He set out toward the cows, followed by the other two.

But the cows had nothing to tell them, nor could any house be seen from the unfenced ground where they grazed.

"Here's a time when climbing a hill may do some good," said Pat. "This one has only a few trees, and it will do as a lookout. Come on, boys!"

"'Jack and Jill went up the hill
To fetch a pail of water'," grunted Ham, as he came up with the others at the summit. "Wish we'd have just half their luck."

"Let's wish for the first half, then; not the tumbling down and breaking our crowns!" answered Pat.

"Isn't that white line the road, 'way off there?" asked David, shading his eyes. "Here, Pat, give me a lift up this tree, then I can see better."

From the tree David plainly saw the strip of road, winding among the hills.

"Now's the time for my compass," said Pat. "Let's see—the road lies south—southeast. We'll make a beeline for that point, and surely once on the road we'll find our way back."

It was a long, hot mile to the roadway. Poor Ham begged for a pause and rest under every convenent tree, but the others were determined. At last they pushed through the briary undergrowth and gained the dusty roadway. Ham sank down, nursing his scratches.

"Wouldn't a drink from that spring we didn't find taste good right now!" he sighed.

"There's a wagon comng!" shouted David.

They waited in such patience as they could until the wagon drew near. Then David shouted again.

"Why, it's Miss Alice's 'Lijah, and Uncle Danger! It's the wagon that brought our tent, and all!"

Sure enough, 'Lijah and Uncle Danger, having brought supplies for the camping party, were returning home. They gladly took the tired boys in and turned around to carry them back to camp.

"You-all's scratch up enough ter bin in a battle," commented 'Lijah, mildly.

"'Tain't no mor'n a mile back to whar your Papa at," added Uncle Danger. "Jes' wait till you gits dar and had some'n to eat, and some good col' water."

"Oh, water," groaned Ham, from the bottom of the wagon. "There's no water, that's what we were to do, find the spring."

"Don't you min' 'bout dat," Uncle Danger answered, "Lijah knowed whar de spring at, an' we fix up de tent long o' yo' Papa an' de missionary gemman."

"That all sounds fine," Pat said, "but I don't feel so proud of us."

"I am," Ham answered. "I'm proud we got back any way at all. I never thought we would, one time back there."

"And next time we'll do better," added David. "You just have to learn about camping. We've learned not to go along without thinking. And won't that dinner taste good!"

The Furry Cat.

A curio store in Jackson Hole, Wyoming, was saved from robbery by a gentle old cat who little knew he had prevented a theft of many dollars' worth of furs.

"Old Tom" is yellow and white and has a bad habit (for which he has been well spatted) of sleeping on the fur tables. There are bear and fox skins, but his favorite place is the middle of a very handsome coyote skin displayed on a table near a sunny window. Tom's markings are almost identical with the coyote, the colors blending so well that you can scarcely distinguish one fur from another, and more than one startled customer has shrieked, "Oh, look! That coyote is alive! It moved, I know it did!"

On this particular day Tom had been outside busy with mouse interests and had not been present when two nervous customers had been especially interested in furs, but Tom's master had not been able to make a sale. The men promised to return next day and make a purchase. Truly, they did return, but it was early morning before anyone was astir.

They entered by the window. The moon shone brightly, making the shop as light as day. The thieves had two sacks into which they stuffed all the best furs. One of the thieves reached for the coyote skin. His heart leaped into his throat. The coyote was warm and alive! It grabbed his thumb with sharp teeth and commenced a throaty rumble. The man let out a yell that was heard a block away! Too late he realized it was not a dead animal come to life but an old cat wanting to play! The robbers fled through the window, leaving the sacks behind them as the night watchman rattled the door.—Our Dumb Animals.

When the Twins Changed Jobs.

"Girl's don't have to work much," grumbled Bobby, as he sat down on a chair in the kitchen and watched Mother shaping the biscuit to put in the biscuit pan. "I wish I didn't have to work any harder than Beth does."

"How funny," said Mother, laughing. "Beth was saying only a few minutes ago that she wished she did not have to work any harder than you do. She is dusting the living room. Call her to come here and we will talk things over."

Beth came quickly when Bobby called and never stopping Mother said, "You know when Daddy sold the business and came out here to the old farm that had been grandfather's we all agreed to help all we could. Now I find that you both feel that you have to work too hard. Bobby wishes he could do Beth's work, and Beth feels sure she would not mind doing Bobby's, so I am going to propose that for a week you change work."

"Oh, goody!" cried both twins, jumping up and dancing around the kitchen. Both were thinking what a good time they would have instead of hard work.

"Very well," said Mother. "Beth, you may go out and report to Daddy, after you have filled the woodbox. You know Bobby has to keep that filled. It is baking day, and I must have plenty of wood."

"That is easy," thought Beth. Just to pick up wood and put it in the basket. She carried the basket to the woodshed and filled it. How heavy it was! She had to take out half the wood before she could carry it. Over and over she made the trip to the woodshed and back to the woodbox, but at last it was filled.

"Now," said Mother, "Daddy wants you to help him cultivate."

Beth had always wanted to help Daddy and she did not mind the work as she went up and down the rows of cabbages. She loved the fresh air and the sunshine. Suddenly she heard the horn, two long blows and a short one. That was her call. She hurried to the house and Mother was waiting. "See the woodbox," she said. "It is almost empty. It takes a great deal of wood to do my baking, with two stoves going."

By the time the woodbox was filled Beth was tired. When she went back to Daddy cultivating wasn't fun any more. The sun was hot and her arms ached. It seemed to her as if dinner time would never come. She thought of Bobby and wondered if he would ever want to change back to his work again.

But Bobby had his troubles, too. While Beth was filling the woodbox he was making the beds, and picking up and dusting the bedrooms. Mother said they must be all tidy and that there must not be a bit of dust left. Then there was so much picking up to do. Everything in his room was in the chair as he had left it the night before, and there was his bookcase. He had hunted for a book last night and emptied a lot of them onto the floor. Now they had to be put back in even rows. He was still at work when Mother called.

"Aren't you through yet, Bobby?" she said. "There is the living room to dust, and I simply must have help in the kitchen. Beth would have been through long before this."

Bobby tried to hurry, but his fingers seemed all thumbs.

As they sat down to dinner, Mother said, "As Bobby did not get around to help me this morning, I shall have to do some baking this afternoon. So I will not be through in time to go to town with you, Daddy."

"Oh, I cannot go to town," said Daddy. "Beth is so slow in her work I will have to work all the afternoon. Come, Beth, hurry dinner, so we can get back to work."

"But I need some more wood in the woodbox. It is only half full," said Mother, so Beth went back to filling the woodbox.

Bobby found himself before a sink filled with dishes. Mother helped him clear away the table and put the food in the proper place, then she said, "Now while you wash the dishes I will do my mending, then when you have finished we will start cooking again. I need you to beat cake, and do a lot of things."

Poor Bobby, it seemed to him that he never would finish the dishes, but at last they were done. Then while Beth toiled in the sun, Bobby whipped cream, and beat eggs, and cut up apples and did a hundred and one things, then came supper and after that dishes. Two tired little children sat on the porch after supper with Daddy and Mother.

"I am so tired," said Mother. "Bobby doesn't begin to be as helpful as Beth and I had so much more to do."

"I am tired, too," said Daddy, "so tired I can hardly keep awake. Beth isn't nearly as good help as Bobby. I am so tired I think I shall have to take a vacation tomorrow and go on a picnic."

Mother began to laugh. "You have spoiled everything, Daddy," she said. Then she turned to the children. "We did make you both work harder than usual, today," she said, "so you would both get a good idea as to the work the other did. But you both worked so hard that by keeping at it all day we were able to get tomorrow's work done as well so we would be able to go on a picnic to the seashore. Beth could have told you, Bobby, that I never make her clean upstairs and downstairs on the same day, and I always wash my cooking dishes as I go along and do not leave them to be washed later. And, Beth, if you look on the floor of the kitchen closet you will find some of the largest sticks from the woodbox, which really did not need filling the last time."

"And," said Daddy, "Bobby could tell you that I never make him cultivate a whole day. I always see he has plenty of time for play. But how do you feel about the work. Do you still want to change work with each other?"

"No," shouted both the twins in unison. And Bobby added, "We'll never say the other doesn't have to work hard again."

"Then," said Daddy, "suppose after the picnic tomorrow, each of you take your own work again. Mother has her work and I have mine, but we know that one is just as important as the other, and we never feel that one works harder than the other does. We know both are enough to keep us busy."

"And Bobby and I have our work, too," said Beth slowly, "just as important as your work and Mother's. Even if we are going on a picnic tomorrow I am going to do my share of the work before we start. I will make the beds and help pack the luncheon."

"And I," said Bobby, "will help feed the hens, and fill the woodbox for supper, and help Daddy with the rest of the work. After this I will do my own work, not that belonging to someone else. I have learned my lesson all right."

"Then," said Daddy, "today's work has not been in vain. I know that after today's experience we will all work together and if we do, we can have plenty of good times as well."—Perley R. Wade, in Advance.

"How Long?"

"How long is it," asked an old Mohammedan in Bengal, "since Jesus died for sinful people? Look at me; I am old, I have prayed, given alms, gone to holy shrines, fasted, and all is useless. Where have you been all this time?"

That cry was echoed from the icy shores of the farthest northwest territory. "You have been many moons in this land," said an old Eskimo to the Bishop of Selkirk. "Did you know this good news then? Since you were a boy? And your father knew? Then why did you not come sooner?"

It was heard in the snow heights of the Andes. "How is it," asked a Peruvian, "that during all these years of my life I have never heard before that Jesus spoke these precious words?"

It was repeated in the streets of Casablanca, North Africa. "Why," cried a Moor to a Bible seller, "have you not run everywhere with this Book? Why do so many of my people know nothing of the Jesus whom it proclaims? Why have you hoarded it to yourselves? Shame on you!"

In the South Sea Islands an old man said, "Can it be that the people in England have had this gospel of peace for many years and have never sent it to us till now? O that they had sent it sooner!"—Exchange.

VACATION TIME.

Maude F. Mumma.

O let me live where the cool winds blow,
Where the ripe fruits hang in the orchard low;
Where the robin sings and the bluebird calls,
Where the day enchants and the night enthralls.

O let me live by the cooling stream,
Where the gray trout plays in the sunlight's gleam,
Where the days and hours pas sidly by,
In vacation time, what care have I?

O let me live in the mountain height,
Where the rugged peaks stand in matchless might;
Where the eagle soars and the wild goats roam,
And the topmost crag is the vulture's home.

Or let me live where the ocean roars,
Where the breakers rash and the seagull soars;
Where the spray falls far from the treacherous waves,
And the shells lie thick in the ocean caves.

All this, I say, is the life for me,
Where the heart is pure and the spirit free;
Where I find in rugged stone and clod,
A sweet communion with my God.

A TRIBUTE.

At the meeting of the Council of the Diocese of Virginia recently held in St. George's Church, Fredericksburg, the following tribute was paid by Bishop Tucker to the ministry of the REV. S. S. WARE, born February 3, 1851. Died November 2, 1934:

"Mr. Ware was a typical representative of that older generation of Virginia clergymen whose character, piety and pastoral activity helped to make the Episcopal Church in Virginia a powerful influence for good. We should not only reverence their memory; but in this age when the importance of pastoral work is often overlooked, and when interest in general social problems sometimes leaves but little time for the development of personal religion, I think that the younger clergy would do well to give heed to the example of men like Mr. Ware."

SHOULD

Missionaries Have a Living Wage?

. . . The answer is, "Yes, of course." The laborer is worthy of his hire.

SHALL

Missionaries Have a Living Wage?

. . . The answer of the Episcopal Church in recent times is "NO."

Decreased giving has resulted in salary cut piled on salary cut, mission workers of every kind being the victims; missionaries in domestic and in foreign fields, as well as those other missionaries who do the routine and necessary work at headquarters offices.

Mission workers have never been overpaid. With the successive reductions which they have patiently suffered, in the face of increased and increasing living costs, they are now so underpaid that an average Churchman, with an average income for these times, if he has an average conscience, finds difficulty in looking a missionary in the eye.

THE CHALLENGE is "First Aid"

General Convention, you recall, adopted an EMERGENCY SCHEDULE of $2,313,115 with the positive statement that it was an insufficient sum. An additional sum of $385,885, The Challenge, was necessary to maintain the Church's work even on its tragically curtailed plane.

Income in sight provides only for the Emergency Schedule.

But The Challenge will make possible a partial restoration of the damage already done.

If the Church will meet the Emergency Schedule AND The Challenge, at least a part of reductions in missionary salaries can be restored. In addition The Challenge will make possible limited restoration of vital work in places where restoration must be prompt or permanent damage will be done.

Are you interested? Then do what you can to meet The Challenge.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

"A native of India said, 'Christians should be huts with lights shining through the door'."

Only those who have promise of the life that is to come have promise of the life that now is.

In the last analysis, you have but one enemy—yourself.

"Thou shalt have no other gods before Me," is the sole sure basis of all morality.

"Without the Way there is no going,
Without the Truth there is no knowing,
Without the Life there is no living."

"Many persons are members of the church as an organization who are not members of the church as an organism."—Rev. Will H. Houghton.

Education is not always wisdom, but when it is, it is worth any price.

He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. Out of sticks and stones and clods of earth God will speak our guidance, if we will apply our ears. In every wind is a warning, if we will stop and heed it. The whole world is vocal to the heart of faith, the life of humble obedience.

"I saw Tomorrow marching by
On the little children's feet;
Within their forms and faces read
Her prophecy complete."

"Grant us Thy peace; fill us with truth and love—
The peace, the truth, the love that never fail
To meet our every need, to lift us higher,
Heedless of storm or error's blinding hail,
Until we reach the long-sought, sun-crowned crest."

Circumstances have rarely favored great men. A lowly beginning is no bar to a great career. The boy who works his way through college may have a hard time, but he will learn how to work his way in life.—Marden.

I should never have made my success in life if I had not bestowed upon the least thing I have ever undertaken the same attention and care that I have bestowed upon the greatest.—Charles Dickens.

If all the missions in the world were closed tomorrow, they would be opened up again the next day after by men and women who feel the urge of Christ's spirit to go with the good news to the ends of the earth.—Morrow.

When Jesus came to that last hour in the Garden of Gethsemane, the writer says that He went a little farther and fell on the ground and prayed: "Not what I will, but what Thou wilt." No wonder He could go to the cross! No wonder He could go face the Chief Priest and Pilate and Herod unafraid! No wonder He could die to save our souls! No wonder He could conquer the grave! He went a little farther in His prayer-life, in His giving, and in His love. Today we need to take that same spirit and go a little farther in prayer, in giving, and in love.

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Neglect of House Property.

Mr. Editor:

In your issue of June 1 (p. 4 a) you quote an English Bishop as saying, "The Church considers it as much a sin to . . . neglect house property as to commit adultery".

We should all enlist in the battle againts the slum: but the conflict is not likely to be won by false and hysterical statements of this description—far more likely to encourage adultery than to terminate bad housing. The neglect of house property is always a relative thing, often, no doubt, sinful: sometimes obviously not. There is also a border-line, where it becomes a matter of opinion whether or not a house is fit for habitation. To say that it is as bad to neglect house property as it is to commit adultery is equivalent to saying that it is no worse to commit adultery than to neglect house property. To say that the Church considers this to be the case is plainly false.

Adultery, in its narrowest and undisputed sense, is the carnal knowledge of a married woman by a man other than her husband. It is this that was categorically forbidden in the Mosaic decalogue, which the "Church considers" an embodiment of the divine law. It is a definite act. Either it has been performed or it has not. It does not vary, as questions of housing do, with changes of building standards, new discoveries in sanitation, the means at the disposal of owners, the carelessness of tenants, &c., &c.

The Forward Movement Comes of Age.

When at the last General Convention The Forward Movement was born, it was received in different quarters with different attitudes. To some it was just another name. To others it was an ideal impossible of accomplishment. To many it was one of those fine things that would sooner or later be lost in the fog of indifference as the "Church Wide Endeavor" had been lost.

The Holy Spirit seems to have guided the whole movement so far. For a leader the ideal Henry Wise Hobson was selected. The able assistance of Bishop Maxon plus the enthusiasm and deep spiritual life of the other members guided what looked like an indefinite idealism into a program for revitalization of the spiritual life of the Church that now seems not only possible of accomplishment, but which seems probable. The Forward Movement at its last meeting in Chattanooga has come of age and is ready for work.

"What is The Forward Movement?" Even clergy are asking that question. After one conference a layman said, "Isn't The Forward Movement simply directing us and asking us to do that which we should have done all along?" And the answer to that question in the affirmative is correct. For nineteen hundred years we have been supposed disciples of Our Lord. Many have been such in actuality, but the majority never have. In this age, an age peculiar because of its consciousness of its own development, we have the privilege, if we are true to our calling as Christian, to really effect the destination of the human race. But a deep and real discipleship must be achieved before the Church can exert such influence.

Naturally it was not easy for the Commission in its earlier meetings to state a definite program in definite language. After all people were clamoring, as they clamored to Our Lord. "Show us a sign," they said. But if easy and catch-phrase methods only were needed, the Commission realized that the whole program would be only on the surface.

So, after months of committees working at great sacrifice of time and effort, and after many prayers and a renewing of prayer life on the part of the members of the Commission, as we say in our heading, The Forward Movement has come of age and is now ready for real work.

But if the Commission is ready, before its impetus can be felt, it must have something else ready and that is the Church as a whole.

Too often in our individualistic Church we have had fine commissions and fine spirit only to find that the clergy were indifferent to whether they were to be a part of something great or not. We can only pray and hope that in this age so mixed up in its ideals, and so shattered in its hopes, there will be a brave list of laymen and laywomen as well as clergy ready to accept even at a great sacrifice plans and ideals that can mean bringing the strength back to the world that so badly needs it.

The first thing we should have, and it is something that the Commission urges on us all, is a great period of self-examination. How many parishes are afraid to face the truth about themselves? We will never know, but we do know that church after church has no reason to know its own problems, for those problems have never been discovered. Some churches are merely acting as preservatives for a Christianity that long ago lost its radiance. Others are dead, for they have had nothing to challenge their people with and have had no vision of what program should be followed even within "one mile of the altar." Others are diseased with the worst of spiritual diseases, selfishness. Surely some examination—we do not like the word "survey"—should be undertaken to determine what is wrong with the parishes.

But individuals need self-examination also! And this must be a constant examination. It is not enough to find out that something is wrong with us. We must in addition find out the remedy and that can only come when we are brave enough to face the facts of our own sins and weaknesses corporately and individually.

A group of Negro physicians in a Southern city had no means of clinical work for years. The result was they were behindhand in knowledge of modern medical care and their patients and the general health condition of the city suffered as a consequence. A brave Negro leader examined with honesty the whole question and urged his fellow physicians to go back to school and work in a student clinic. His fellow physicians refused to go back to school. They would be the laughing stock of their patients they said. The result was their people lost confidence in them and went to the white practitioners, and the cause of Negro leadership and Negro education was set back for years.

Our clergy and our laymen are being called back to school and to the clinic for further study and for deeper spiritual knowledge. Will we refuse? Will we say that we have nothing to learn?

Effect of Emergency Schedule.

The Spirit of Missions.

In Alaska the only way that the work could be adjusted to the limitations of the Emergency Schedule was by planning to close, during the summer of 1935, the school for Indian boys and girls of the Lower Yukon at Christ Church Mission, Anvik. This school, which was established nearly fifty years ago by the Rev. John W. Chapman, has been a vital factor in the success of the Church's Mission in the territory all around Anvik. In Latin America, particularly in some of our West Indian jurisdictions, the necessary adjustments could only be made through further reductions in salaries.

The Challenge.

Religious Herald, May 30, 1935.

The Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Virginia does not cover the entire State, but it does cover a goodly portion of it, including the City of Richmond, and represents a large number of strong and admirable churches, in whose membership is found a notable number of our wealthy people. For weeks past public notice has been given of an organized effort to raise among these churches the sum of $25,000 to be used for certain diocesan purposes. All good people of whatever name or communion will wish the leaders in this movement the utmost success. We are a little discouraged, however, in a general way by the fact that it seems necessary for a great Christian body, with a membership preeminently strong and resourceful, to take such extraordinary pains in perfecting its organization and preparing its appeal for a sum of money to be devoted to admirable uses fully approved, when there is reason to suppose that included in their membership are men and women, not a few, who might each provide the money without inconvenience. We wonder if one result of the financial stringency which has characterized the past four or five years is to be found in the absence which begins to be noticed of any great gifts among our evangelical people to their education, missionary and benevolent causes. It disheartens us a little to see what extraordinary preliminary organization and effort seems to be necessary in the judgment of our Episcopal friends as they go forth to raise the comparatively small sum of $25,000 for a recognized and fully approved denominational purpose.

We Need God in Summer.

The Canadian Churchman, May 30, 1935.

The human heart needs God in the summer quite as much as in the winter. Of course, the heart of man can seek and find God anywhere, but those who find God in the great out of doors are usually found in their place in His House on Sunday. Then, too, each of us is to work for God in the summer as well as in the winter. This, like the worship, can be done anywhere, at any time, by a prayer, a word for Christ and the Christian life we lead day by day. Yet, here also the one who serves Christ conscientiously and whole-heartedly will not forget the assembling of the faithful together on the Sunday as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews urges the Christians of long ago.

When the Churchman from the city neglects the church in his summer home, it is a fairly sure sign that he is not the Christian he ought to be.

Mr. Baldwin's Speech.

Church of England Newspaper, May 31, 1935.

The most moving passage in Mr. Baldwin's speech was that in which he told the House that:

"I have been made almost physically sick to think that I and my friends and the statesmen in every country in Europe, two thousand years after our Lord was crucified, should be spending our time thinking how we can get the mangled bodies of children to the hospitals and how we can keep the poison gas from going down the throats of the people."

Is not this another challenge to the Church of Christ? The Convocations of Canterbury and York are to meet next week. Will they have anything to say on the subject?

Godparents.

Church of England Newspaper.

Referring to the duties of the laity at the St. David's Diocesan Conference at Carmarthen last week, the Archbishop of Wales said there was hardly one more important than that of godparents, who gave pledge to the Church that the baptized child would be so trained and instructed that eventually it would be a good citizen of the spiritual commonwealth.

"Of what sort the future members of the Church will be depends on their proper upbringing," he said. "Today the call has come to the church of the parish to make godparenthood a corporate function. Hitherto the responsibility of finding godparents has been thrown on the father and mother of the child. With the weakening of family life and the ominous secularism of the world the ancient institution of godparenthood needs to be revitalized."

Success of the League and of Mr. Eden.

The Church of England Newspaper, May 31, 1935.

Once again the League of Nations has more than justified itself. Whatever may be the ultimate outcome of the dispute between Italy and Abyssinia, it is clear that if it had not been for the patient efforts of the League Council the situation today would have been extremely grave. By common consent this success is acknowledged to be due in no small measure to the statesmanlike tact of Mr. Eden, Lord Privy Seal. In the House of Commons on Monday, Mr. Eden said it was satisfactory that both parties have renewed their assurances to proceed to an agreed demarcation of the frontier as soon as their present differences have been settled. Of vital importance is the fact that both countries have accepted the cooperation of the League in seeking a settlement.

Mr. Eden paid a merited tribute to Italy. He said: "But for the spirit of conciliation displayed by the Italian Government and its Representative at Geneva (Baron Aloisi), together with the invaluable cooperation of the French Foreign Minister (M. Laval), the progress which we are now able to record could not have been realized."

Our answer will depend upon how deeply we want to know God through Jesus Christ, and upon our answer will rest the question of whether this people will be the generation to lead the world out of its sins and problems or whether we shall have to wait for another generation to be called by God for this task.

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

Pioneers of the Spirit

We look upon the pioneers as belonging to a past generation in the Nation's history. The frontiers of the wilderness have been pushed further and further back until the Pacific Ocean was reached and this particular adventure came to an end. Another form of pioneering has been going on, which has to do with the physical universe, and there is no prospect of its coming to an end, in spite of the large increase in the size of the two hundred inch telescope, now being constructed. But the most wonderful and thrilling adventure of any, open to those who wish to test the most magnificent possibilities of the human spirit, lie in the direction of the spiritual universe.

The Larger Outlook.

There has been a great enlargement of the human spirit on the intellectual side in its conquest of Nature, and the consequent control and utilization of her laws and forces. But it is in an entirely different sphere that the human spirit will find the opportunity for its most magnificent achievements and that is, as has already been said, in the spiritual universe. It is here that the human spirit finds its true home and the resources needed for its full and proper development. Human progress, during the last few generations, has been entirely too one-sided. The material side of life has usurped the supreme place in man's attention and undertakings, while the spiritual side has been forced more or less into the background. The present condition of human affairs is the result. And if there is to be any genuine recovery, not merely of prosperity, but of a kind of human welfare, which is based upon character and a desire for mutual service, it can only be brought about by the spirit of man seeking for inspiration from its Creator.

The Renaissance in Its Relation to the Reformation.

The great intellectual awakening, the Renaissance, which brought the Middles Ages to an end, was quickly followed by the Reformation, which represented a spiritual awakening. This showed that man's nature cannot be enlarged and set free on its intellectual side, without its spiritual side being influenced as well. What happened then is about to happen again. We have witnessed a great intellectual awakening which has resulted in the enlargement of our knowledge of Nature, her laws and forces; an awakening which has represented an adventure of the human spirit on its intellectual side. Now, we are ready for a great advance on the spiritual side of man's nature in the discovery of the higher laws, which enable him to make himself at home in the spiritual world and utilize its resources for the benefit of humanity.

Two Great Achievements.

Two of the greatest achievements which have chiefly benefited mankind in the recent past have been the electric light and electric power, both of which have been made available in our homes and in a general way. These gifts and blessings brought to all of us by the discoveries of Natural Science, suggest to our minds that what is most needed now to make life what it ought to be, is spiritual illumination and spiritual power. These transcendent gifts and blessings are not beyond our reach nor do they need centuries of time or even generations for their discovery. They are within our reach now, and only need faith and earnest seeking to make them available. It is here that pioneers of the spirit may find an opportunity to become benefactors of the human race. Just as there has been given to us, by Edison and others, light without, so God can and will give us light within, and more light than we have ever had before. It is not God's Will that we should any longer remain in the twilight of uncertainty as to what course mankind should pursue.

Christ the Light of the World.

Christ said when He was here on earth:—"I am the Light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." And this will be proved to be absolutely true, if we will but follow Him and expect that the light will shine upon our path. This is just as true of mankind as a whole. If the world will turn to Christ, enough light will be forthcoming to make the path of the future clear and distinct for the nations to follow. But there must be pioneers; adventurers who are pursuaded that more light will be given, if it is only earnestly sought for, with the full belief that a New Day is at hand.

The Gift of Spiritual Power.

The same may be said of spiritual power. Light and power are closely related in the physical world and are both derived from that mysterious something we call electricity, which God has given to us as part of our natural inheritance. We believe that spiritual power is just as much God's gift to us as the other, and just as much intended for us as part of our rightful inheritance, though it belongs to the spiritual rather than to the natural side of our life. What greater gift could there be, or one more to be desired, than that of spiritual power? Who can tell, or even imagine, the possibilities which are open to us through the possession of it? We have not yet reached the full measure our or manhood or womanhood until we have acquired it and have learned to use it for the benefit of the world around us. Life, indeed, becomes a wonderful thing as we open the windows of the mind and soul to contemplate what the world would be like if all Christians were but using this power from heaven to make this earth what God intended it to be and what it surely will be, when the Spirit of Christ finds its full and complete expression in the lives of His followers.

Before Thee, Lord, we stand,
As Elijah did of old,
Awaiting Thy command,
Watching Thy Will unfold.

Thy sons shall surely know
The secrets of Thy Love,
What Thou hast to bestow
From treasures stored above.

Then shall we see arise
An Order bright and new,
The earthly Paradise,
The prophets had in view.

Power---Our Need

By LEWIS B. FRANKLIN, D. C. L.,

Vice-President and Treasurer of The National Council.

POWER! That is the need of the Church, and that power is ours if we will receive it, and use it.

There is, however, a definite condition upon which this power can be retained by us. Behind an enormous mass of concrete, damming the course of a mighty river, lies a lake of water, calm and serene, powerless. A gate is opened, the water flows downward through the pen-stock into the turbine. In an instant, power flows through the wires, our homes and streets are lighted, our factories are made productive. Use has made the placid lake a great source of energy.

So it is with God's power. It is promised to us in unlimited measure. The gift of Pentecost is ours, but only if we will use it.

"Ye shall be witnesses of me." Here is our job as Christian people. Here is how his power is to be used. As we have known the redeeming love of God in our own lives, so to make that love known to others.

How can we do this? The way is easy—the doing of it calls for continuous watchfulness and courage.

First of all in our homes. The influence of a Christian home can scarcely be estimated. A home in which the gifts of a loving father are recognized at mealtime, where his word is read daily, where his influence is never absent.

What a world of opportunity there is to apply this almighty power of God in our business life! Through my twenty years' experience in Wall Street, I am not ignorant as to business and I am firmly convinced that our present and world-wide economic depression is directly due to a disregard of God's law. Enmity and jealousy between nations and races, a scramble on the part of everyone to enjoy a higher scale of living than we had earned, an intense desire to put pleasure before duty, excitement before contentment, luxury before stability; these are the causes that led to the mad speculation of a few years ago, speculation not only in the stock market, but in commodities, in factory production, and in merchandising, a speculation which inevitably brought in its wake misery and want. Oh! that the Christian leaders of our business world had then in the time of prosperity been on their knees asking to be shown God's will. Were they there? No! They were too "tired" on Sunday after their strenuous week of striving for unearned profits; they must recruit their strength on the golf course.

Yes, the active and temporarily successful business man said to himself like the fool of whom Jesus spoke, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry" (Luke 12: 19). He had forgotten God, and the business fool of yesterday forgot God's law, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you."

Today many of these business men are back in God's house asking Him to help them in time of need. Yes! We need God's help in our business world in time of stress, but we need it even more in time of prosperity.

AT THE THRESHOLD of the world of our homes and our business lies the community in which we dwell. Thousands upon thousands all around us without the knowledge of the love of God. Our local mission field, white unto the harvest, and we the laborers, chosen of God, imbued with His power; will we use that power to bring them to Christ, or will we fail in courage and thus lose the power?

And then in the great mission fields beyond; the Negro, the Indian, the lonely dwellers in rural areas, all waiting for our help. And beyond the limits of America, teeming millions in Japan, in China, in India, and in Africa who have never heard of the Saviour's redeeming love, who know no god but gods of fear, who are ravaged by disease. Here our Church through its army of 2,500 missionaries is at work. Surely here is an outlet for that power we have received, an outlet through intelligent prayer based on information as to the need, and what our Church is doing to meet that need, an outlet through sacrificial giving that we may share with these children of God, be they yellow, brown or black, some of the blessings which He has so abundantly bestowed upon us. For some of us personal service in the ranks of the missionary army. Here, then, is our beloved Church—His Church—splendidly organized, well equipped, well officered, going through the routine of training for a task of immeasurable magniture and world-wide scope, the task of turning this world into the Kingdom of God, and never putting into the task itself more than a fraction of its power. "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God." What a parody. Two-thirds of the privates absent without leave, many of the others content to stay on the parade grounds under the careful tutelage of officers no more daring, while in the world beyond the battle rages with the enemy gaining ground.

Out from the sheltered camp let us put our training to the test! Let us use that Pentecostal power of God lest we lose it. Power—that is the need of the Church today—Power and the will to use it. And in the courageous use of God's power in home, in community, in politics, in business, and in the mission fields, we will provide an irresistible attraction for those who today see little in the Church which compels them to active service, adequate giving, and regular worship.

This is the task to which our Forward Movement calls us, but the Forward Movement must not stop with prayer and instruction. It must be imbued with action and with power, and power is developed by use.

THE MAP.

Philip Wendell Crannell, in The Word and Way.

Is there a world-map hanging on my wall,
Or, better, in my spirit's inmost hall?
Does the round globe weigh on my yearning heart,
In its remotest region, nearest part?

Daily do I the well-known outlines scan,
India, South America, Japan?
On some great town do I my finger lay.
"This shall belong to Jesus Christ some day!"

And where dense, struggling, toiling millions dwell:
"Of Thee, Oh Christ, help me these folks to tell!"
Or seeing some vast land still plunged in deepest night:
"Dear Jesus, flood this darkness with Thy light!"

When the whole panorama lies unfurled:
"Help me to love, as Thou dost love, the world!"
Without a map like that, how can I be
At one with Him who died on Calvary?

Saints' Days

By WILLIAM E. CALLENDER,
Chaplain, U. S. Public Health Service.

Saint Barnabas' Day, June 17.

WHEN writing an article on a Saint's Day, it is advisable to give an outline of the life of the Saint whose day we celebrate. Barnabas was the surname of Joses, a Levite of the country of Cyprus. Now, as Barnabas was a Levite, the Apostolic succession was in his person grafted upon the Mosaic Priesthood, so that in him, and others of the line of Levi, then became identified and perpetuated with the Christian Ministry. Like Saint Paul, he was not of the Twelve, but was numbered among the number of the Apostles. In 1549 the title given to this Day was "Saint Barnabe, Apostle." The addition of the words "the Apostle" is unusual and was doubtless intended to mark the fact that Holy Scripture thus designated him. The name "Barnabas" translated "Son of Consolation" (Acts 4:36), would be better rendered "Son of Exhortation or of Prophecy." Barnabas is first mentioned as having sold his property and laid the proceeds at the apostles' feet (Acts 6:37). He next appears as introducing Saint Paul after conversion to the other apostles (Acts 9:27). For one year he was in residence with Saint Paul at Antioch (Acts 11:22-26); he then paid a visit to Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30). We next find his ordination along with Saint Paul (Acts 13:23). He now commences his missionary journey with Saint Paul to Cyprus and other cities of Asia (Acts 13:14). Disputes are not of modern origin and we now find Sts. Paul and Barnabas being sent by the Church at Antioch to Jerusalem to consult on the question of the necessity of circumcision. Following this visit to Jerusalem we find a separation taking place between Barnabas and Paul, Barnabas and Mark going to Cyprus and Paul and Silas going to Syria and Cilicia. Scripture gives no further account of Barnabas, save incidental allusions (1 Cor. 9:6 and Gal. 11: 1, 9, 13). We learn in later accounts that Barnbas studied under Gamaliel along with Saint Paul and suffered martyrdom in Salamis, Cyprus. His body was discovered in the reign of the Emperor Zeno and was removed to Constantinople, a stately church being erected over his remains and dedicated to his honour. Barnabas was said to be the founder and first Bishop of the Church at Milan. The observance of Saint Barbas' Day cannot be traced beyond the seventh century. The Festival of Saint Barnabas was anciently a great feast amongst the English people, according to the old style it was the longest day, hence the old rhyme:

"Barnaby Bright, Barnaby Bright,
The longest day and the shortest night."

Tradition tells us that Saint Barnabas was a man of the most comely countenance, of a noble presence and commanding in his deportment. He is generally pictured as carrying the Gospel in his hand. In most of the Greek paintings he is represented as having grey hair and a grey beard. The old collect for Saint Barnabus' Day read as follows:—"We beseech Thee, O Lord, let the praying of Thy blessed Apostle Saint Barnabas commend Thy Church, and let him stand as mediator (Intervenor) for it, as he illuminated it by his teaching and suffering." How much more beautiful is the collect used today, when you compare it with the old one. It is a beautiful comment on his endowments and on his fidelity in using all his talents for his Master's honour. This collect for today should be to us of vital importance as we plead, "Leave us not, we beseech Thee, destitute of Thy manifold gifts, nor yet of grace to use them always to Thy honour and glory."

WHEN one begins to study the lives of the saints together with those days, which are termed "Saints' Days or Holy Days", there is a fascination which becomes intensified as we learn about them and also when we find the reason for the commemoration of those who have passed from the Church Militant to the Church Expectant, and finally reach the Church Triumphant, not only those of other days long since passed, but those near and dear to us whom we have loved, but lost a while. It is well to notice that the Church has congratulated her saints and martyrs not on the mere fact of being born into this world, but on their passing through this life and leaving behind loving memories of the good which they accomplished. This Feast Day, which is kept in memory of The Nativity of St. John the Baptist is, if we except the Nativity of Jesus Christ, the only one kept in memory of a man being born into the world. Naturally we keep the Feast of The Nativity of Jesus Christ, but we do not count Him amongst the number of the glorious army of Martyrs. He was more than a Martyr. The early Church also commemorated the beheading of St. John the Baptist. The commemoration of St. John the Baptist is considerably more ancient (his birth). In the Church of England the death of St. John the Baptist is noted as a Black Letter Day in the Calendar. It is of interest to note that the association of this day with mid-summer has connected his words with the observance, "He must increase, but I must decrease." The twenty-fourth of June and the twenty-fifth of December marking the shortening or lengthening of days. According to Rabbinical tradition, St. John the Baptist, the last of the prophets and the forerunner of Christ, was born at Hebron in the beginning of the second half of the year 749 A. U. S. Turning to the first chapter of the Gospel according to Saint Luke one finds practically complete details of his life. In his thirtieth year he commenced his public life in the Wilderness of Judea, the wild district which lies between Kedron and the Dead Sea. His life, appearance, costume and habits recalled to the people that which they had heard and read of the ancient prophets, more especially Elijah. Aside from his preaching, the leading event in his life was the baptism of our Blessed Lord. He was beheaded in the reign of Herod Antipas. Outside of the Bible narrative, there is practically nothing to be learned. The Apocryphal writings contain some legends of obviously fictitious character.

The collect for today dates from 1549. In 1662 the word "Repentance" was used in place of the word "Pennance." In the Sarum Missal we read, "Direct the ways of all the faithful into the way of eternal life." Saint John the Baptist came to prepare the way by preaching repentance, and as we would follow his doctrine and holy life we must today repent as in the past, seeking as in our prayer that grace which alone can help. Maybe repentance is an old-fashioned doctrine, but we must remember that "without repentance there is no remission of sins." It is impossible to come into touch without sorrow for our sins and the determination by Divine help "to avoid those things which are displeasing in His sight." Saint John, ascetic though he may have been, gives us a wonderful example of faithfulness in his preaching.

Meeting of the Forward Movement Commission

By C. P. MOREHOUSE.

Increased attendance at churches throughout the country at Easter and Whitsunday—perhaps the largest in the history of the Church—was reported at the meeting of members and associates of the Forward Movement Commission, held on Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga, Tennessee, June 12-14. It was felt that this was a direct and most encouraging result of the Forward Movement.

In the opening session, following a celebration of the Holy Communion in St. Paul's Church, each member reported his activities on behalf of the Movement since the February meeting. As a result of these activities, the Forward Movement has been presented at more than half of the diocesan conventions, and at many conferences of the clergy and laity from coast to coast. Over two million pieces of literature have been distributed, including the three Bible reading pamphlets, Discipleship, Disciples of the Living Christ, and Follow On, and the leaflet on the Episcopal Church. If these publications have not yet succeeded in arousing the Church to a new and deeper spiritual life, at least they have caused the Church to "stir in her sleep, and show signs of awakening," it was felt.

In view of the enthusiastic reception of this literature, the Commission decided to continue the policy of circulating leaflets for the guidance of a year-round program of daily Bible reading and meditation. To this end a pamphlet will be prepared for fall publication and use during October and November, built around the missionary motif. Then, beginning with the first Sunday in Advent, there will be issued a series of leaflets, to be circulated on a subscription basis, containing seasonal Bible readings and meditations.

Negro Work.

The Negro work of the Church received careful attention from the Commission. It was felt that one great weakness of this work is the lack of training and leadership on the part of the Negro clergy. Accordingly, it was proposed that a graduate school for the Negro clergy offering conferences similar to those given at the College of Preachers, be held at a suitable center under the auspices of the Forward Movement. This was approved in principle, as was also the recommendation that one or more student chaplaincies under National Church auspices be established at leading Negro secular universities, both to minister to Church students and to discover and foster vocations to Holy Orders. A committee was asked to confer with Bishop Bartlett, who has been conducting a survey of the Negro work, and the committee of the National Council dealing with this subject, in order to work out practical ways to carry out these recommendations.

The Forward Movement itself will be carried to the Negro clergy and parishes by a colored representative of the Commission in a series of personal visitations, some of which may take the form of teaching and preaching missions. A conference of Negro clergy on the Forward Movement will be held in Galveston, Texas, July 16-18.

Conference Courses.

It was announced that one course for use at summer schools and other conferences is now ready, on the subject of The Rector and Parish Administration. Others in preparation will deal with The Spiritual Preparation of the Priest, and The Place of Prayer and Meditation in the Life of the Clergy and Laity. These courses may be obtained in mimeographed form from the headquarters of the Forward Movement in Cincinnati.

Church Literature.

In addition to the Bible reading leaflets, the Commission adopted the following recommendations with reference to Church literature:

(1) A supplementary pamphlet of leaders' helps for the Book of Acts, as contained in the Follow On leaflet, will be published immediately for use during the summer. This is done in response to a request from members of the Woman's Auxiliary and others.

(2) Certain books were highly commended, and the publication committee asked to try to arrange for inexpensive special editions of them, and recommended them as widely as possible throughout the Church.

(3) The publication committee was directed to confer with the Department of Religious Education with a view to publishing literature for children in the spirit of the Forward Movement.

Young People.

Bishop Quin of Texas read to the Commission a statement from the conference of young people recently held in Chicago, asking practical guidance and an opportunity to take an active part in the leadership of the Church, which was received with great interest and sympathy. In the spirit of this statement the Commission took the following steps:

(1) A resolution was adopted heartily endorsing this statement and assuring the young people of the sympathy and full support of the Forward Movement Commission, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Forward Movement Commission has listened with the deepest sympathy to the appeal directed to us by the recent conference of our Young People's Federation; That we value this communication so highly as to commend it to the attention of the whole Church and our leaders; and that as a first response to this appeal we resolve to elect to the associate membership of our Commission a young man and a young woman to work actively with us, and that we recommend similar inclusion of such young people in the counsels and work of all parishes and dioceses."

(2) The committee on courses was asked to prepare a course for young people on the aims of the Forward Movement, particularly in relation to youth.

(3) The executive committee was asked to appoint two leaders from among the young people themselves as associate members of the Commission.

Missionary Education.

The Commission voted its appreciation of the renewed efforts of the National Council to make wider use of missionaries on furlough as speakers, and offered to help in this endeavor in any way it can.

Broadcasting.

A letter was read from the Rev. Dr. G. Warfield Hobbs, executive secretary of the National Council, Department of Publicity, offering them dates in the 1935-36 broadcasting schedule of the Episcopal Church of the Air. It was voted to express the appreciation of the Commission to Dr. Hobbs for his assistance and to accept the dates offered. Arrangements for speakers for these broadcasts will be announced as the details are completed. In addition, there will be two dates during the summer of 1936.

The Commission also voted to use local radio stations as widely as possible, and especially to have

More of Charity

By JAMES E. FREEMAN, D. D.,
Bishop of Washington.

Bishop Freeman.

GOD hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean." This was the statement of one whose narrow provincialism and class consciousness had made him arrogant and exclusive. He had been reared in an atmosphere where bigotry and insularity were its chosen watchwords. In a strange vision he had learned a new lesson, and one that was to change the whole course of his life. Henceforth he was to appraise all men by a newer and better standard.

As we survey life today we are sometimes amazed and appalled by the narrowness and limitations of human judgment. Men and women grow up under influences that restrict their vision to a small area and as they mature they set up criteria of judgment that segregate their fellows into certain groups and classes, labeling the one group with a badge of approval and distinction, and another with the mark of disfavor and disapproval. Hence it is that, even in the free airs of our boasted liberty-loving America, we create classifications that produce cleavages and superstitions between one group and another. It is difficult to survive the conceits and prejudices of early environment and training. Possibly of all the bigotries in which we indulge, that which concerns religion is the most marked and conspicuous. There is something about our religious beliefs and their expression that has a tendency to make us narrow and restricted in our views and appraisal of those, who are not of our household and who do not subscribe to our ways. It is strange and anomalous that, in the exercise of that which should render us generous and charitable, we should a form of bias and prejudice wholly inconsistent with its profession.

"O the rarity of Christian charity, under the sun."

Even in the beginnings of the early Church, at its very inception and among its chosen exponents, the spirit of bigotry was prevalent. It took many and severe shocks to change these conditions and to make these men see the broader and finer vision of their great Master. Then followed an expansion and growth, marked by generosity and comprehensiveness, such as the world has rarely witnessed. It was only when the larger and more inclusive understanding of Christ's program was practiced that the Church was set on its way to the attainment of its high ends. Repeatedly, when clouds have obscured a vision of Him who came proclaiming the universality of human salvation, has His mighty cause been halted and His claims lost their appeal. There have been times when intolerance and bitter controversy have superseded the essential virtues and high claims of His Kingdom, creating divisions in the ranks of His followers and impeding the progress of His redemptive work. We call such periods, "dark ages," and so they were.

We are entering upon a new age today, and let us hope a better and a happier one. We are being compelled to appraise in more generous and consistent terms, those who may not be of our particular brand of profession and practice and yet who by the excellence of their faith and works are worthy of our praise and fellowship. Said the great Apostle, St. Paul, "though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing." Such an expression of Christian charity is called for today. Religious rivalries and contentions can have no place in a consistent following of Him whose comprehending love recognized elements of such immortal worth in the weakest, and sometimes the most erring of men, that He declared: "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

In the complexity of our life, with all the limitations under which the most favored or unfavored live, and in a world that is distracted by changing ideas and ideals, it behooves us to broaden our vision and to recognize that there is such a thing as unity in diversity. We may with all loyalty and devotion follow our preferred and traditional ways; we may find in our more closely-knit group or fellowship the satisfaction and exhilaration that we need for our spiritual well-being and development, but this does not preclude the recognition in others who differ from us and are not of our persuasion of their place of high distinction as disciples of Him whom they devoutly reverence and serve.

Women's Meetings.

The representation of Churchwomen as associate members of the Commission was completed by the election of Mrs. Edward Ingersoll of Philadelphia, and it was voted to hold a meeting between the women members and the executive committee in the early fall, the time and place to be set later.

The Bible Anniversary.

Attention was called to the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the first printed Bible in English, and it was voted to cooperate with this anniversary, and also with the Woman's Auxiliary in the observance of Armistice Day as a day of penitence and prayer.

Austin J. Lindstrom of Evanston, Ill., was nominated to the presidency of the House of Deputies as a member of the Commission to take the place of Joseph A. Rushton, resigned.

Prayers for Children's Use

By THOMAS F. OPIE, D. D.,

Rector of St. Bartholomew's Parish, Olney, Maryland.

ALMOST the only prayer at all suitable for the child-mind, with the exception of the Lord's Prayer (to which, indeed, the child must gradually grow, in appreciation)—almost the only "child's prayer" familiar to the average praying child, is the well-known verse:—

"Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to take."

This prayer is not all that it should be, from the standpoint of wholesome psychology, since it puts the idea of death in the mind of the little pray-er, and has a tendency to instill fear. It is also rather limited in its scope. And yet, very few parents or teachers seem to have at hand substitute or alternate prayers, suitable to teach to children—very small children, who are just beginning to unfold mentally.

In a book by the Rev. Walter Franklin Prince, Ph. D., "The Case of Patience Worth," there are a number of suggested prayers, easily learned and highly suitable for very young children. Here is one:—

"Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child;
Make me gentle as Thou art—
Come and live within my heart."

Dr. Prince himself criticizes this verse, because it "suggests that quiescent harmlessness is the acme of spiritual attainment." He further intimates that a literal-minded child might have a "wondering uneasiness" as to just how Jesus could get into his heart, to live there—something of a poser for parents or teachers, by way of explaining a spiritual reality in terms comprehensible to the infant mind.

In quoting the following prayer, the author says, "This may stand as representative of forms that fail, if only for the reason that they pretend to be poety—but lack the lilt and metrical evenness which are pleasing to childhood. Here it is:—

"Heavenly Father, please to bless me;
Help me a good child to be.
Make me love my blessed Saviour
And do all that will please Thee."

Admittedly, this is not excellent verse—but it may suit those who are not too critical. Dr. Prince admits that, in his appraisal of the prayer, he may be a bit "hypercritical"; and adds, "Very well; it may be that we shall eventually find a prayer to which even the hypercritical cannot reasonably object."

Another:—

"This night, my God, for Jesus' sake,
Thy blessing give to me;
Pardon my sins—and may I wake
A better child to be."

It is suggested that this possibly contains too much "dogma" and that "it is psychologically more healthful for a small child to pray that he be kept good than that his sins be pardoned and that he may do less evil." Here is a good point for psychology—and a true one, I think.

One verse from a well-known hymn for children is quoted, but Dr. Prince thinks that possibly here "the thought is narrowed too much to mere safety from that danger during sleep, which, as a rule is negligible." This is the verse, familiar to most readers of this article:—

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me;
Bless Thy little lamb tonight;
Through the darkness be Thou near me—
Keep me safe till morning light."

It is a truism that many small children are "afraid of the dark"—and it might not be altogether wholesome to drill "Through the darkness" into the already disturbed minds of a certain type of very small boys and girls. All parents should know enough "child psychology" to lead them aright in matters of this sort—but do they?

Here is a very simple prayer—a positive prayer, translated from the German:—

"I am a child—
My heart pure from sin;
No one but Jesus
May enter therein."

Of this prayer, the author holds that "the form of words should rather suggest to the child that he is by his own choice doing that which is right, because it is fit and beautiful—and hence to be done naturally, with no occasion to give one's self special credit for doing it." This writer, however, holds that it is wholesome and proper for even a little boy or girl to assert for itself a positive conviction—and this is perfectly possible, is it not?—in the right use of this brief verse. Perhaps it would prove psychologically helpful for all of us to be more affirmative in our private devotions. Listen to Paul: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." That sort of thing, innocent of boast or hypocrisy, engenders confidence and also spiritual power.

Here follows the prayer which Dr. Prince thinks meets a number of conditions or requirements which ought to characterize a universally used child's prayer:—

"I, Thy child forever, play
About Thy knees at close of day;
Within Thy arms I now shall creep
And learn Thy wisdom while I sleep."

The author cites nine points in favor of this (almost) ideal prayer for infants: It is brief; it is smooth and lilting, duplicating, "Now I lay me", in this regard. Its language is "brought to the level of the child's understanding"—and, what is much to the point, "when the child grows up to be a man of religious conviction," he will not "outgrow" the thought expressed here. The language, thinks Dr. Prince—and who will gainsay it?—is simple and at the same time, "quietly dignified." It is "pictorial—in terms familiar to the child"—and "there is not in it a single phrase capable of producing a morbid effect upon the mind of the most imaginative or nervous child." It is "soothing and restful" and calculated to bring about "speedy and sound slumber." Quoting again, "If either 'forever' or 'wisdom' prevents the child from getting the full thought, he gets enough of the thought not to confuse his understanding. His mind may stop short, but it is not muddled. At least he is 'Thy child' and at least he may 'learn Thy'—something that God can teach, which is called 'wisdom'. Really, adults know not much more!"

News from the Front

Sheba's Ancient Empire.

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, January 31, 1935.

At last! I have managed to get some postal views of this Land of Sheba to send to you—to supplement my rather "lame" descriptions of scenes and "life as is" here.

Wish you could have been with me the other day, when I attended the festival of "Temkat"—held at sunrise in a beautiful natural amphitheatre covering an area of some fifteen or twenty acres. I was told that it is in commemoration of and symbolical of the the baptism of Christ—although some folks maintain that it is merely a form of rebaptism. The roads leading to the amphitheatre were lined with soldiers and jammed with the enormous crowds all bound in the same direction—everyone in gala attire with snow-white "shammas"—a large scarf in which Ethiopians, both male and female, very gracefully drape themselves. This is the only time of the year when the "shammas" are "snow white"—please believe me. Inside the amphitheatre there were a dozen or so large white tents in which reproductions of the Ark of the Covenant (brought in procession from the "Holy of Holies" of various churches) were housed. The Ethiopian branch of the Coptic Church claims to possess the original Ark of the Covenant containing the tablets of Moses, but the priests are very vague as to its whereabouts—some say that it is in Saint George Cathedral here in Addis Ababa, while others maintain that it is in one of their churches at Axum—the capital city of the Queen of Sheba—founded in the day of Abraham and now known as the "Holy City of Ethiopia." Axum was captured by Ptolemy in 300 B. C., and he set up enormous obelisks there several dozen of which are still standing. Axum is a three weeks' "trek" from Addis Ababa, but if I linger in this land long enough I hope to make the "jaunt." Legend says that the Ark was brought to Axum by Menelik the First, the son of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, when for some reason he fled from Jerusalem, pursued by the soldiers of "Old King Sol". Near Axum I am told there is a mountain with an enormous rift from top to bottom—the story goes that Menelik, closely pursued by the legions of Solomon offered up a prayer for deliverance—God caused the mountain to open for him to pass through—the pursuing soldiers followed him and, when all were within the chasm and Menelik safely out, the gracious God caused it to close again, this destroying them. But here! I must get back to the "Temkat" celebration. Inside the enclosure there were thousands and thousands of people—officials, priests, soldiers, and the "populace". The Emperor and his attendant court of officials, gorgeously arrayed and shaded by magnificent state umbrellas, arrived promptly at sunrise and proceeded in procession across a stream to an improvised altar on the opposite side. Several hundred priests (this country is "priest-ridden", too), in beautifully embroidered robes, carrying sacred books beautifully bound, gold and silver jeweled crosses and other emblems, swinging incense burners, slowly circled the altar three times, chanting (so I was told) the Psalms of David all the while. The "Abuna" (Pope of the Ethiopian Coptic Church and All Powerful) proceeded to the Emperor and presented various sacred volumes and emblems for the Imperial kiss. Water from the nearby stream, carried in lovely jeweled containers, was then carried in procession three times around the altar and with much chanting and ceremony blessed by the Abuna, who then sprinkled the Emperor and surrounding officials, after which the thousands of participants trooped forward for the baptism ceremony. This continued for hours, but while going on sacred dances were performed by the priests—the same dances and the same chants that were performed before the Ark of the Covenant in the days of Moses. It was one of the most artistic performances I have ever witnessed—truly inspiring—the music was lovely—several weird stringed instruments, long horns or "trumpets", the deep dooming of the "negarets" (large drums) apparently of gold some three feet long by eighteen inches in diameter, accompanying the chanting, which really had hypnotic power. I had an almost irresistible desire to join in the chanting and to sway in unison with the dancers. After performing several dances, the priests formed in procession, led by the Arks, heavily draped in brocade, and the Emperor, and slowly wended their way from the amphitheatre to convey the Arks back to the various churches. For days afterwards thousands of people flock to the stream and do their yearly washing. Later in the day the Emperor gave a "gebur" (raw meat feast) for some fifteen thousand persons (alas! no foreigners admitted)—raw meat, still smoking from the animal's heat, "anjera", an evil-tasting sour pancake dipped in red-hot pepper sauce (it would burn the lining out of any civilized mouth), are devoured in huge quantities and "washed down" with still larger quantities of "Tedj" (a strong liquor made from honey and some herb). A few days after Temkat, I motored to the top of Entoto Mountains—a long range circling Addis Abada to the north and rising some three thousand feet above the city—for another religious festival in honor of the birth of the Virgin Mary. Entoto is the site of old Addis Ababa and there are two lovely old Coptic churches there, surrounded by groves of magnificent old trees (the "Copts" always surround their churches by lovely park-like groves). But I know you have enough of religious festivals, so I shall have mercy.

The Italians are busily engaged in their preparations for attacking this ancient Empire—are quite unwilling to meet any efforts at conciliation—they are determined to consummate their steal. The rainy season starts in the middle of May and most people think the Italians will not start their active campaign until the latter part of September or the first of October, when the rains cease. The repudiation of the Versailles Treaty by the Germans may cause Mister Mussolini and other statesmen of his calibre to think twice before engaging in a war in this part of the world. It will not be a walk-over for them; they must travel hundreds of miles over deserts, lava fields, swamps, jungles, and mountains, before they can strike a vital blow. It will take troops at least a year to reach Addis Ababa. Furthermore, they would be faced with an army of more than one million savage men and women—much guerilla fighting. In addition to their human enemies, they would also have as foes the malaria mosquito, poisonous fleas and water reeking with fever germs. They will only win by an enormous expenditure of life and plenty of money. —— ——I hope they get it in the neck.

SAINTS' DAY.

"Few and short the words he speaks;
Plain and straight the good he seeks;
Round his path shall never shine
Festal point nor wondrous sign.

That in duty's homely way
Bravely, firmly; humbly trod,
Man can best prepare for God."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

NECKTIE PARTY.

Young People's Service League Program.

Leader: Our program this evening is on the subject of a Necktie Party, as lynchings have often been called. The incident of the Judge preventing the lynching actually happened in one case and the other incidents have occurred in many places. There are four characters in the pageant. They are all young people in a small town, where great excitement is in the air. John and Bill live there, as does Mary, in whose house the action takes place. Eugene is a friend of Mary, who is visiting in her house. Mary, Eugene and Bill are in the living room talking.

Scene 1.

Mary: I am so glad that you have come, Bill. I was hoping that some of the gang would drop in tonight and meet Eugene.

Eugene: Yes, Mary has talked such a lot about you that I felt that I knew you all before I ever came here. But what is all the excitement about down the street? As I came in town a little while ago, I saw what looked like a pretty good size crowd down by the corner. Are they having an election or something?

Bill: No, last night there was a murder on the outskirts of town. An old farmer, Mr. Raines, who was said to be quite a miser, was killed in his bed. His head was split wide open with an axe.

Mary: How perfectly awful to think of such a thing right here at home.

Eugene: Have they got any idea as to who did it?

Bill: We do not know for sure, but it is thought that old Jim Snow did it. You know him, Mary; he is that old white-haired Negro who lives down by the creek. He was seen this morning with a good deal of money, and just after daybreak someone saw him crossing the field near the house where Mr. Raines lived. The Sheriff and all the Constables are looking for him. Our Constable has sworn in quite a posse to help hunt for him.

John (entering in great haste): Come on you three. They have caught that old Jim Snow and we are going to lynch him.

Mary: Oh, no, please do not go. Bill is that all the evidence they have on him, that he was seen with the money, and seen coming across the field near the place?

Bill: I believe it is. Why?

Mary: Because if it is, I believe he is innocent. I heard my father say last night that he had just paid old Jim fifty dollars for a piece of land. He was wondering whether he would put it in the bank or if he would drink it all up.

John: Oh, he had more than fifty dollars. I know. He is just mean enough to do anything. Come on you two, and help us string him up.

Eugene: I think I will go with you. I would not help in a lynching, but I have read a lot about lynchings, and never seen one. I would like to see the excitement. Let's go.

Mary: I think you are both disgusting. Don't you know that of the whole crowd probably only a dozen or so really want to kill the man, but the larger crowd, the more courage they have that they can do anything they want to. So that by just being there you help them in their crime of mass murder?

Bill: Oh, Mary, you are all excited. It is not murder. It is just showing the world we won't have any murderers left around here.

Mary: If it is not murder, what is it to hang a man who may be innocent? If he is guilty, the law will punish him. Why don't you let the law take its course? Let the law judge him.

John: Oh, don't mind her. Let her rave. Come on, or we will miss the fun.

Mary: Go on, if you will, but I do hope that if there is any shooting, you all get hit, just to teach you a little sense.

(Three boys go out.)

Leader, later: The excitement has died down. The four friends have come, or are coming together to talk over the subject. John and Eugene are talking together. Later they are joined by the others.

Scene 2.

Eugene: Well, it is interesting to have been at a prevented lynching, even if they did not string the old rascal up. But I wonder what became of Bill. He certainly left the house with us.

John: I do not know. But did you ever see a man pull a stunt like Judge Robbins?

Bill (entering): Hello, fellows. How goes it? I see you did not "get your man" you were going after in such a blood-thirsty manner.

John: No, it was rather a tame affair, thanks to the courage of Judge Robbins. I always admired him for his brains before, but now I admire him for his absolute physical courage. The idea of his standing up that way and defying that mob. There must have been a thousand people in the crowd.

Eugene: Yes, and for him to call the Court on the steps and say that any man that stepped across the line he drew was guilty of contempt of court, and for the clerk to take his name, was about as cool a thing as I ever heard of. Then did you see the way that mob melted away? But what became of you, Bill? We lost you in the shuffle.

Bill: I got to thinking of what Mary had said about lynchers really committing murder, and that I would be a lyncher by just being in the mob. So I came back to try and help Mary prevent it.

John: Why, what could you two do?

Bill: We got our heads together and I phoned while she looked up the numbers. First, we got the Sheriff. We found him about fifteen miles from town down by the river; we told him that Jim had been found and was about to be lynched, so he jumped in the car and brought all his men back to town. Then we called Judge Robbins. What he came and did you know. Next we obeyed the Sheriff's order and phoned the Fire Department to turn out, and then we phoned to the City Chief of Police and got him to send out about thirty cops. So there you are.

Eugene: You surely did good work. I wondered who had gotten those extra police and the Fire Department out. It rather makes me ashamed not to have been on the side of Law and Order to hear what you did.

John: Yes, I rather wished I had listened to Mary also.

Mary (entering with evening paper): Well, boys, did you see the news?

John: No; what is it?

Mary: Look here (she shows paper), Old Uncle Jim, whom you were so anxious to lynch, was innocent. It says here that a burglar caught was in process of being questioned when he confessed he had killed Mr. Raines.

Eugene: I sure am glad that we didn't get old Uncle Jim. There ought to be some kind of an organization to prevent lynchings. Some of us do make such fools of ourselves if we get a chance.

Mary: It's funny you should say that, for there is just such a group. It is called the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching. My mother belongs to it, and that is how I got my ideas of what to do to prevent the lynching.

John: Well, all I can say is that I wish them well.

Eugene: Them's my sentiments, too.

Bill: And I am mighty glad I showed how I felt in time to help.

Mary: If you three mean what you say, I wonder if you would be willing to really help in the work of the organization for the association.

John: But are there many cases like this one, where lynchings have been prevented after they really got under way? I read of a lot of lynchings, but I do not remember of any that did not go through once they had gotten started.

Bill: I saw some statistics recently that there are nearly four lynchings that are prevented for every one that actually happens. That was in 1934. What is more, three-fourths of all the lynchings that take place in the United States were of people accused of crimes for which the law does not provide the death penalty.

Eugene: What is the matter with people to want to lynch a man for a crime that is not serious enough for the law to provide the penalty, if he is found guilty? Are they crazy with the heat?

Mary: It would seem that they are. But General Convention in 1934 endorsed the program of the Association, and so did the Woman's Auxiliary of the Dioceses of Alabama and of Florida, and this year the Diocese of South Florida has also done it.

Bill: Well, it looks like a good thing to me. I can't help see why all of them do not do it.

Mary: I believe that eventually all of them will. For the evil of lynching must be put down. And all that believe in keeping the command, "Thou shalt do no murder" must work for it.

BOOK REVIEWS

THE NEW PAGANISM AND OTHER SERMONS: By Willard Edward Biederwolf. Cloth. Pp. 159. Published by The Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, Grand Rapids, Michigan. Price, $1.00.

This book is written with Dr. Biederwolf's well-recognized trenchant penetration. He is equipped to deal with unusual perspicacity in the field of our modern life and manners. He is a fundamentalist and may be expected to look with severe criticism upon our social defects and religious laxity. Truth to tell, though, Dr. Cadman, an acknowledged modernist, has made the same designation of our questionable habits and doings. We are a nation of pagans, by and large. We know what we should do and do it not. We know what we should avoid and we embrace it with affectionate abandon. We run after every swami who comes to our shore with his crystal ball and alluring paraphernalia; we bow at the shrine of ocultism and peer into the future with eager zest by means of cash-demanding devotees of some alien cult. We pride ourselves upon our independence of dogma, church or divine authority. We sail on the tide of fleshly gratification, oblivious of the call of conscience. Henry Mills Alden, in his "God in His World," has characterized us in the memorable sentence, "Men think themselves free when they shape their lives according to a system of their own construction; this is indeed their prison house."

But, thank God, in a nation of pagans, there are not lacking the "salt of the earth" who are saving the nation from putrification by their pious lives, service and influence. This has always been. It always will be. God's own are, as ever, in the minority. But the minority with God is a majority for God. For no one can estimate the power of prayer in sanctified lives; the savoring and vitalizing permeation of dedicated believers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

In commending this, one of Dr. Biederwolf's best works, we must urge that you get the book. It will do you good.

OUTFITTING FOR SPIRITUAL MARRIAGE: By Floyd Van Keuren, D. D., Milwaukee, 1935. Morehouse Publishing Company. Pp. 159 and Appendix. Price, $1.75.

A book like this is to be welcomed. It covers the whole subject of Christian marriage, and covers it in a realistic sympathetic, common-sense and Christian way. It is an ideal book for the clergy to have several copies of; a copy for their own instruction in preparing couples for marriage; copies for lending to engaged couples. It could be used with great advantage in preparing a course of sermons on marriage (and how ignorant are lay people on where the Church stands!) and in providing an opening which may be followed up through the years. A very happy feature is the recommendation of sound books on each problem of getting married and staying married. It can, therefore, be recommended as a dependable book for married couples to own. There is also a brief and very concrete appendix on the etiquette of weddings and the customary arrangements. If the passages here on adult infantilism could be taken to heart, there would be less disillusionment and distress in marriage and fewer divorces.

This is a book for which we have been waiting.

PSYCHOLOGY AND LIFE: By Leslie D. Weatherhead. Pp. 280. Published by The Abingdon Press, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Price, $2.00.

This is the best of Mr. Weatherhead's books, in our opinion. He discusses the relation of religion to medicine and how both can work together for the healing of both the physical and mental illness of individuals. He claims that medicine without religion is limited and religion without the knowledge of mental and psychic functions is equally limited. His plea for a closer cooperation between the physician and the minister is timely and challenging.

Every minister as well as every physician who may read this book, will find interesting and helpful suggestions, which will enable them to lead the sick in body and mind to a more healthful and happier life. The book is a fine discussion of the ministry of healing without falling into the error that pain is either an illusion or the visitation of God for the punishment of sin. The book contains practical methods of restoring the ill to health.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

THE WHITSUNTIDE CONFERENCE OF THE LIBERAL EVANGELICALS.

By Rev. R. L. Bull, Jr., Trinity Church, Boston.

First Speaker Bishop Sherrill.

The third annual Whitsuntide Conference of the Liberal Evangelicals was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, June 10, 11 and 12. The program was opened with a dinner at the Boston City Club, where more than 250 members and friends of the Movement assembled. The Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins, D. D., was the toastmaster and chairman. The first speaker of the evening was the Rt. Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, D. D., Bishop of Massachusetts, who welcomed the visitors in the name of the diocese. He spoke briefly but very impressively on the continuing battle for Truth, in which all are interested. "All truth," he said, "has its source from God. We must emphasize not only things we do not believe, but set forth positive truth. Begin with what you believe and build upon that as a foundation. Our generation is characterized by uncertainty, a lack of faith with everyone disposed to tell us what is wrong. What do we believe? What convictions have we? What are we willing to suffer for. Let us seek to work out a message for a distraught and distressed world. The real secret is to care for the patient. What is it that we care most about? Do we have a passion to win the world for Christ? Do we have a genuine love for God and for man? The real answer to our present troubled condition lies in Jesus Christ. The Word became flesh and dwelt among us and we beheld His glory. Let us seek once more to discover the revelation of God in Christ. Let us make more real our loyalty to Him."

Bishop Lawrence Made Second Address.

The second address was given by Bishop Lawrence, who spoke very simply of the many changes which he had witnessed in his sixty years as a clergyman. He noted a change from the spirit of exclusion to one of inclusion in the Church. He cited May 19, 1874, the date on which the Church Congress began, as one of the turning points which helped to create a spirit of inclusion in the Church. Had the Church Congress been formed ten years earlier, the reformed Episcopal Church would never have started. "The possibility of development of the spirit of inclusion can develop supremely only in an historic Church. It is the duty of the Church to encourage liberty of opinion and expression and to create a body of faith, all the while adhering to fundamental truth, not failing to encourage a large liberalism and large difference in outlook."

Bishop Hobson Spoke.

Bishop Henry Wise Hobson, Chairman of the Forward Movement, spoke at length of the aims and purposes of the Movement. He stressed the fact that this was not a new movement; that it takes its rise from the very beginning of Christianity itself. The Movement, to be a success, must be based upon the same call to discipleship, loyalty and service, which our Lord gave. There must be a forward movement in our own lives.

The Forward Movement is trying to make articulate the needs and aspirations of hundreds of Church people. The pamphlets thus far used were developed from conferences and advice of different groups in the Church. The Liberal Evangelicals and all other groups have a definite part to play. We need especially to stress honesty in politics, Church and business life. We are largely controlled by our own self-interest and must encourage honesty of thought. Let us be willing to face facts, recognizing that our Curch has suffered in the last decade through self-deception. The present plight of our missionary enterprise and the widespread loss of communicants would have been largely avoided had we been willing to face these facts and provide adequate remedies.

A further contribution from the Liberal Evangelicals should be the encouragement of individual initiative, loyalty and leadership in contrast to any form of a dictatorship. The tendency today in all areas is to turn to a dictator, but we must stand for the value of the individual. Many people are calling for a dictator in the Church, demanding a definite plan of action. The Forward Movement does not propose to set forth a definite program. Christ never gave a definite program, but sought, rather, to implant the spirit of God.

Rev. William Adams Brown Made Notable Address.

One of the most notable addresses of the Conference was made by the Rev. William Adams Brown, D. D., of the Union Theological Seminary in New York City. Dr. Brown spoke on Non-Episcopal Orders. He said, in part, that the Church is primarily a spiritual society, not a legal organization. All agree that the Church requires a ministry for the performance of needed spiritual functions. These grow out of the nature of the Church itself. Dr. Brown pointed out that theological and ecclesiastical alternatives do not always syncronize. He said that there were four standards for testing orders: 1. antiquity; 2. continuity (apostolical succession); 3. general acceptance (underlies the Lambeth Quadrilateral); 4. spiritual efficacy. Dr. Brown applied these tests to the various theories of Church orders. Contrary to the general assumption he clearly showed that the case for Episcopacy is not as strong as we believed. By the test of antiquity it fares no better than other forms of Church order derived from the New Testament. By the test of continuity even Roman Catholic scholars admit wide gaps in its development. Moreover, Episcopacy develops certain forms of weakness that other forms of Church administration do not show. No longer is it the sole channel of spiritual grace. This has been abandoned by all scholars, even the Roman Catholics. The real crux of the difficulty lies in the conception of sacraments and the Word of God as something distinct.

He stressed the fact that indiscriminate inter-communion may not be a good thing, but pointed out the significant results achieved by the South India project in which one organic Church is being formed out of several denominations. The experiment began with people living together and sharing each other's daily experiences. The Anglo-Catholics in South India themselves petitioned their Metropolitan to invite all to the Sacrament and he excluded no one.

A closing service was held in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul on Wednesday evening, with the Rev. Harold A. Prichard, D. D., as the preacher.

TWO BUFFALO RANGES TO BE RESTORED TO THE INDIANS.

Two Indian reservations, the Pine Ridge and the Crow in South Dakota, are each to have a buffalo range, according to John Collier, Commissioner of Indian Affairs. "The building of these ranges," he said, "is only one of the features of a new wildlife restoration and conservation program for Indian reservations in the course of planning by the Office of Indian Affairs." Quail, fish, deer, antelope, wild turkey, and partridges will be replenished in those reservations where they have been depleted.

These restorations, it is stated, are expected to heighten the morale of the Indian by giving him the type of life which is his inherent racial heritage. But they are concededly a poor substitute to the Indian for the millions of acres of prairie land, forests, and streams taken from him in earlier days. Solemn treaties to protect the hunting grounds of the Indian were broken by the white man. The last great herd of buffalo was exterminated before 1883.

PENNSYLVANIA

Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Bishop

Merger of Two Central City Churches.

An agreement of association as a substitute for a merger, in which each parish maintains its separate identity, has been effected between historic St. James' Church, Philadelphia, and the Church of St. Luke and The Epiphany, through the medium of which they will pool their leadership and resources in an approach to the problem's solution by means of the "City Church" plan, inaugurated some years ago by St. James' Church.

Announcement that the association had been formed between the two parishes, whose membership includes many of the city's oldest, distinguished and socially prominent families, was made at a largely attended union service of both congregations held yesterday morning in St. James. Prior notice of the agreement of association, its purpose and other details had been sent to the communicant membership of both parishes, but the formal public announcement came as a complete surprise to many of the other worshippers.

Coincident with the announcement, which was made by the Rev. Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, co-rector of St. James' Church, Dr. Newton also announced that he had tendered his resignation to the Vestry of St. James to take effect November 1, and that it had been accepted. Dr. Newton told the assembled congregations he felt he should make public announcement of his resignation at this time, rather than withhold it to a later date, in order to remove any possibility of it being said or even suggested that his action was due to his disapproval of the project on which the two parishes had embarked.

Dr. Newton added that he was not only in full accord with the agreement of association, but that he had participated in the conferences at which the plan was discussed. Until his resignation became effective, Dr. Newton said, he would give his best efforts in cooperation with his brother clergy in carrying out the project. As to his plans after November 1, Dr. Newton said he was not ready at this time to make any announcement.

Members of the clergy staff and the vestries of both parishes were present when the statements announcing the agreement of association in the "City Church" plan, and his own resignation, were made by Dr. Newton. Following the former statement, Dr. Newton laid emphasis upon the fact that the agreement of association entered into did not involve or contemplate a merger of the two parishes.

Apart from their working together for the common objective set forth in the statement, Dr. Newton said, each parish would maintain its separate identity; meet its own financial requirements and manage its own parochial affairs. Religious services will continue to be maintained at St. James, but during the remainder of the summer, and until such time as other plans may be decided upon, the two congregations will worship together on Sundays at 11 A. M. and 4 P. M. in the Church of St. Luke and The Epiphany. The association becomes effective July 1.

The formal statement read by Dr. Newton announcing the agreement of association follows:

"As many of you already know, conversations have been in process between the Vestry of St. James' Church and the Vestry of St. Luke and The Epiphany, with a view to effecting a cooperation in meeting the problem of the central city church. The Vestries have jointly agreed that the human needs of the crowded population in the city's center demand that the forces of religion take action to meet this challenge, and they have decided to take the initiative. They have decided that the only way at present is through a 'City Church', open at all times to all the varied types of human need and appeal, which call for the ministry and service of all who believe in the example and ministry exemplified by Him whom we call our Master.

"With this end in view the Clergy and Vestry of St. James' Church and the Church of St. Luke and The Epiphany, have entered into an association to meet this challenge in human needs and to do together what a single parish working alone cannot do. The association becomes effective on July 1. A more detailed statement has been sent to each of the communicant members of both parishes, which we believe will be carefully read and endorsed."

Public interest in the association entered into between St. James' and St. Luke and The Epiphany, was accentuated, not only by reason of their prominence, but for the additional reason that it is the first time, so far as could be learned, where churches of any communion in this or any other city have entered into such a compact with a similar end in view. Added significance was given by reason of the fact that both parishes within recent years figured in proposed mergers with the Church of the Holy Trinity, both of which failed of consummation.

The "City Church" plan, inaugurated by St. James' Clergy and Vestry, and to which St. Luke and The Epiphany now brings its support, is built upon the conviction that the work and service and worship of a central city church must no longer be conducted along the lines of the ordinary parish church in a residential or suburban neighborhood, ministering chiefly to a selected group of pew-holders or its own communicant membership. The position taken by St. James was: that if a centrally established parish is to do the Church's work it must make itself part of the life of the crowded city center; exhibit and expound Christian life and Christian worship for all the dwellers and workers in that densely populated area and, in addition, there provide a ministry and service as varied as human needs and a worship as beautiful and dignified as worship can be made.

The clergy staff of St. James, comprising the Rev. Dr. John H. Mockridge, co-rector, and the Rev. Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, co-rector (the latter until November 1), and the Rev. Dr. W. G. W. Anthony, their assistant, will also make their headquarters at St. Luke and The Epiphany, where they will have offices along with the Rev. Thomas L. Harris, rector of St. Luke and The Epiphany, and his assistant, the Rev. N. W. Rightmyer.

RHODE ISLAND

Rt. Rev. J. DeWolf Perry, D. D., Bishop

Plan Diocesan-Wide Mission.

The Rt. Rev. James De Wolf Perry, D. D., Presiding Bishop and Bishop of Rhode Island, and a committee of four clergy and one layman, of whom the Rt. Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, D. D., Auxiliary Bishop of Rhode Island, is chairman, are now laying plans for a diocesan-wide mission to be held after months of preparation, probably during the first two weeks of February, 1936. No movement on such a scale for the renewal of spiritual life within the Anglican Communion has ever been carried out before in Rhode Island, and probably not in the United States.

As outlined by the Secretary of Bishop Bennett's central committee, the Rev. Irving A. Evans, rector of Christ Church, Lonsdale, and by Bishop Bennett himself, the mission will include these features:

Twenty-one outstanding missioners of the General Church will be invited to come to the diocese for service, chiefly in the larger parishes, and thirty-four diocesan clergy will be assigned to the smaller parishes and missions. A detachment of the Church Army will be drafted with the expectation that the Evangelistic Secretary, Captain B. Frank Mountford, one of the most noted of all present-day Anglican missioners, will head the detail. All of the missioners will come to Bishop Perry for a three-day retreat before the opening of the mission. And one day before he will call in the diocesan missioners for instruction and spiritual guidance. On the last Sunday afternoon of the mission at four o'clock a diocesan-wide service will be held at the Cathedral. But it is probable that on account of the interest that will have been aroused by that time, similar services will be set for the same hour in Newport and Bristol.

The committee is at work selecting a phrase that will best summarize the spiritual content of the project. Two of especial merit are already being considered: "The Necessity of Christ," offered by the Rev. Charles Townsend, rector of St. Stephen's Church, and "Christ's Answer to Human Needs," suggested by Bishop Bennett.

A tentative plan is to hold a children's mission throughout the diocese simultaneously, but whether it can be put into effect depends upon the committee's ability to obtain clergy trained in the task. There are few competent children's missioners anywhere in the Episcopal field, Bishop Perry recently stated. If such can be obtained, however, the mission for children will be set up and emphasized, with the afternoons devoted to it.

On the central committee, besides Bishop Bennett and the Rev. Mr. Evans, are: the Rev. Charles Townsend, rector of St. Stephen's Church; the Rev. Anthony R. Parshley, rector of St. Michael's Church, Bristol, and Albert E. Thornley, Christ Church Parish, Pawtucket.

Each rector will make his own preparation within his parish, putting most of his time and attention upon teaching. Bishop Perry is emphasizing the teaching side of the diocesan-wide mission. In a recent conference with his clergy the Bishop said:

"We must try to avoid giving the impression that the mission is an opportunity for some voice to be heard for the entertainment and excitement of the people. Let the missioners from outside and inside the diocese be representative of Him who sent forth the Disciples. We should discourage the practice of running round to hear this preacher here and that preacher there. The people should wait for the mission in their own parish. The effect of the adventure should be the deepening of the spiritual life of every baptized person. To this end all the parochial missions held in Rhode Island during the last twenty-five years will contribute.

"As never before, I believe, the State of Rhode Island recognizes such a need as this for spiritual expression and growth.

"The mission is needed to reach individuals. For years we have been thinking of our work in terms of numbers, especially Easter communions and financial supporters. The Forward Movement, with which our adventure is linked, is summoning us back to the individual soul whom we can call by name. We must now concern ourselves with the individual, with a knowledge of his soul, first on the part of the missioner, and second on the part of the rector.

"A conscious need is moving in the minds and hearts of our people in the diocese. Throughout the length and breadth of the land there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with concern merely with this and that financial plan for rehabilitation. What we are all turning to now is the need of the soul. We are asking, 'What is the meaning of life? What has Christianity to offer for a solution'?"

There will be sub-committees on Publicity, Clerical Cooperation, Methods and Assignments, Lay Cooperation, and Finance, with, probably, a member of the central committee heading each. Mr. Albert E. Thornley will organize the laity for visitation under the direction of the various rectors. Finances will be taken care of by the several parish missions and at the final diocesan services.

Each mission will hold a service of Corporate Communion as an aftermath of the diocesan-wide mission.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Conference of The Layman's League.

Under the progressive leadership of the diocesan president, Mr. Crawford Johnson, Jr., the Layman's League held its first annual conference on Saturday, May 25, at the country estate of Mr. Theodore Swann, on the Little Cahaba River, near Birmingham. There were one hundred and fifty-nine members present, representing thirteen branches of the League established to date in Alabama.

After the celebration of the Holy Communion, the president called the meeting to order, and gave a brief address of welcome. He then presented the speakers for the day.

Mr. Eugene Thompson of Washington, D. C., national president, presented the charter of the Diocesan League, with congratulations. He explained the purposes of the organization as an effort to harness the man power of the Church.

Dr. A. R. Bliss of Howard College, Birmingham, answered the question, "Is there a Need for Religion in the Every Day Budget of the Business Man?" He laid special stress on the fact that there is no antagonism between true science and religion.

Dr. Warren G. Kearney of New Orleans, executive vice-president and secretary, outlined the history of the League from its beginning. Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook of the National Commission on Evangelism, who has recently completed three missions of eight days each in the Birmingham District, addressed his remarks chiefly to church wardens and vestrymen, opening up to them the importance and possibilities of their office, urging that care be taken to exercise its functions with greater zeal than usually shown.

Reports from the secretary and treasurer were heard, also reports from each parish branch. A constitution and by-laws were adopted. Mr. Crawford Johnson, Jr., and Mr. W. R. Gignilliat were re-elected diocesan president and secretary, respectively, with Mr. F. B. Neilsen as treasurer. All three are from the Birmingham District. Mr. Harry Bandy of Montgomery was elected vice-president. An executive committee of nine was agreed upon, of whom six were elected, with three to be added later.

There was a pleasant intermission of an hour and a half, for rest and refreshment. A barbecue was prepared on the grounds, and greatly enjoyed. Swimming was to have been a feature, but the water was too cool for comfort, and that in Alabama!

The Rt. Rev. Wm. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop of Alabama, in his closing remarks, expressed pleasure at the growth of the League in the diocese, which so far has enrolled a membership of over four hundred. Gratification was expressed at the fact that this being the first annual conference held in any diocese, it would blaze the way and serve as a model for other conferences throughout the Church. The day's work was completed with prayer at 5:15 P. M.

Neighborhood Evenings.

On Wednesday evenings, beginning June 19, and continuing through August, a series of "Neighborhood Evenings" have been planned by Grace Church. Deaconess Mayer will be in charge of these gatherings. She is being assisted in arranging the program by a committee consisting of Mrs. Howard M. Jefferson, Mrs. Frederick T. Sherwood, Mrs. Henry J. Spencer, Mrs. Howard A. Scholle, Mrs. William LeBrecht and the Misses Jessie Willing, Alice Vaiden, Alicia Henesey and Margaret A. Brougham. After an hour spent in the Close, there will be a program in Grace House, followed by refreshments. The programs will include music of various kinds, a watermelon feast, travelogue with pictures, a trip, an evening of games and group singing.

Chapel Dedicated.

The Chapel of St. Luke the Physician at Seaview Hospital, Staten Island, will be dedicated by Bishop Manning on Sunday, June 23. The chapel is under the direction of the Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society. The chaplain is the Rev. L. M. A. Haughwout.

Choristers' Reunion.

Trinity Church held its thirteenth annual Choristers' Reunion Sunday, June 9. More than one hundred "old boys" again donned their cassocks and surplices and marched with the present choir. The oldest chorister present was Samuel F. Howard (86), of Hartford, Conn., who began singing at Trinity in 1858. Charles A. Barbier, of Glen Ridge, N. J., who hasn't missed an Easter service at Trinity in more than fifty years, was also present. Channing Lefebvre, organist and choirmaster, had charge of the music of the service. A brief address was made by the rector, Dr. Fleming. Following the service, the association held its regular dinner at the Hotel Brevoort.

Closing Service of Choir School.

The Choir School of Grace Church held its annual commencement services on Saturday, June 8, in the library of the school at 88 Fourth Avenue. The Rev. William B. Sperry, vicar of Grace Chapel, made the address. Medals were presented by Harry N. Russell, headmaster, to the heads of each form, and Ernest Mitchell, choirmaster, presented the prize for singing and deportment in the choir. The choir of men and boys sang for the last time until fall on Sunday, June 9.

Finals at St. Christopher's.

The Finals Exercises of the twenty-fourth session of St. Christopher's School took place at the school, June 6 and 7. The Lower School Finals were held on the morning of the sixth. Addresses were made by Miss Jane Henderson, principal of the school; Mr. Vial, director of athletics of the Lower School; the Rev. R. Cary Montague and Dr. Chamberlayne, headmaster of St. Christopher's

Certificates of Distinction and prizes for scholarship and for excellence in religious studies, as well as various special prizes, were awarded.

The session just closed was the first under the able leadership of Miss Jane Henderson, formerly of St. Timothy's School, Catonsville, Maryland. It is the hope of the trustees and of all friends of St. Christopher's that Miss Henderson will continue as head of the Lower School for many, many years to come. Under her wise leadership, the school has taken many definite forward steps.

St. Christopher's Upper School Finals were held on the morning of June 7 and were witnessed by a larger number of patrons and friends of the school than had ever before assembled on a similar occasion.

Annual Birthday Thank Offering Service.

The annual interparochial presentation service of the Birthday Thank Offering was held in St. Paul's Church, Savannah, the Rev. Geoffrey Horsfield, rector, on Whitsunday at the church school hour. The parishes rotate in holding this service. The Rev. Joseph Burton, rector of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, carried the service, and the Rev. Charles C. J. Carpenter, rector of St. John's Church, made the address. Bishop Reese presented the offering and gave the benediction. The junior choirs of all the parishes were present.

As the name of each church school was called, a representative from that school brought his school's offering to the chancel steps and placed it in an alms basin. An open offering was also taken, and both presented at the same time. The amount of the offering is not yet known, all not being in.

The attendance was not nearly so large this year on account of the lateness of Whitsunday. The public schools and church schools had closed for the summer season, and many pupils were out of the city. It is estimated that about 450 attended the services against about 1,200 last year.

Judge George T. Cann, senior warden of St. John's Church, Savannah, Ga., received the honorary degree of doctor of laws from his Alma Mater, the Pennsylvania Military College, on June 10.

June 8 marked the fifty-sixth anniversary of Bishop Reese's ordination to the priesthood, he having been ordained in St. Andrew's Church, Baltimore. Last May 20 was the twenty-seventh anniversary of his consecration, which took place in Christ Church, Savannah, in 1908.

Bishop's Medal.

On Sunday, June 1, Bishop Woodcock confirmed a class at St. Mark's, Louisville, at eleven o'clock and that afternoon preached the baccalaureate sermon for the University of Louisville. Bishop Woodcock gives the University the medal, presented to the member of the graduating class having the highest record of scholarship and service. The Bishop has been giving this medal since 1910 and the early recipients of it became the nucleus of the University honor society, which bears the Bishop's name. The society now has approximately 140 members.

Recently, when a fire occurred in St. Anthony's Roman Catholic Orphanage, St. Mark's opened its doors to the temporarily homeless children.

Fifty-fifth Annual Convention Woman's Auxiliary.

The first of the spring series of diocesan meetings was the fifty-fifth annual convention of the Woman's Auxiliary, held April 30, and May 1 in St. Paul's Parish, Muskegon. There was a Quiet Hour, conducted by the rector, the Rev. John K. Coolidge, followed by a dinner and a service in the church; and on Wednesday there was an early Celebration of the Holy Communion, conducted by the Bishop, with a memorial of deceased members, followed by business sessions during the day. There was an unusually large attendance, eighteen parish auxiliaries being represented by altogether more than 100 delegates; fifteen of the diocesan clergy were also present. Speakers from outside the diocese were Bishop Roberts of South Dakota, Miss Winifred Moore from our Mission in Liberia, and Mrs. Torrence of Detroit.

Presentation Service.

Another gathering was that of the children of the diocese for the annual Presentation Service held in the afternoon of Sunday, May 12, at St. Luke's, Kalamazoo. The weather was unusually and unexpectedly bad, and the attendance was, therefore, smaller than it otherwise would have been. However, the service was very hearty and delightful and the occasion was as enjoyable as it always is. The Bishop was assisted in the service by the Archdeacon and the Rev. Messrs. Simms, Fowkes and McNulty. The offering amounted to $1,746.32, an increase of nearly $200 over 1934. It was announced that the Presentation Service of 1936 would be held in Grand Rapids in order to give the schools in the northern part of the diocese a better opportunity to be present.

Whitsunday Services and Confirmations.

The Forward Movement got somewhere in North Texas on Whitsunday in the parish and adjacent missions of the Rev. P. Walter Henckell, who, during the post-Easter Season, followed suggestions of the National Commission and the District Commission, and put it up to his Vestry in the new St. Mary's Parish, Big Spring, to bring interested persons to hear a series of sermons on Discipleship in the Church of the Living Christ.

A number of baptisms resulted and on Whitsunday morning the Rev. Mr. Henckell presented to Bishop Seaman six candidates at the early Communion service in Trinity Mission, Midland, drove with the Bishop forty miles to the parish church in Big Spring, where eighteen more were confirmed. Out of the twenty-four eighteen were adults.

In Abilene, after another drive of 112 miles east, five adults were presented by the Rev. W. P. Gerhart for confirmation, being his second class this spring.

New Chancellor Elected.

The Executive Council of the diocese, at its last meeting, elected Mr. John C. Spaulding of St. Andrew's Church, Detroit, as Vice-President, succeeding Dr. Lewis H. Paddock, who died recently. Mr. Spaulding was also elected as Chancellor, also succeeding Dr. Paddock in this capacity. Mr. Spaulding is the third Chancellor of the diocese since the inauguration of the office in 1904. It is interesting to note that all three of the Chancellors have been members of the same legal firm of Detroit—Miller, Canfield, Paddock & Stone: Mr. James Cosslett Smith, Dr. Paddock, and Mr. Spaulding.

Mr. Spaulding has been Treasurer of St. Andrew's Church for a number of years. He was prominent in the Church Club during its most active years, once its president; contributed much of his time to the activities of the Young People's Association, and is at the present time the Chairman of the Trustees of the Reinforcement Fund, a member of the Diocesan Convention's Committee on Canons, and the first Lay Delegate to the Synod of the Province of the Mid-West.

Combined Church School Picnic.

The schools of Christ Church Cathedral, Grace Church and St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, combined and held their annual picnics by chartering the steamer "Madisonville" on June 8 for a trip across Lake Pontchartrain to Mandeville. Leaving West End at 8:30 A. M., they arrived at Mandeville at 10:40 A. M., and immediately proceeded to the picnic grounds, about half a mile distant, some by automobiles and others walking, where they found a lovely spot on the lake, provided with many tables and benches amidst a grove of beautiful oak trees. The day was ideal, and there was an immediate rush for the bathhouse, where young and old enjoyed a dip in the waters of the lake and received a good coat of tan sunburn. In the afternoon games were indulged in, the winners of races receiving gifts. One of the most interesting of these was a 100-yard dash for the rectors of the churches named, the Very Rev. William Hamilton Nes, the Rev. D. H. Wattley and the Rev. Charles L. Monroe participating, terminating in a very close finish, and being won by the last named clergyman. Everyone seemed to enjoy the races, and some exciting contests took place. Each person brought his own lunch and ice cream and cakes were furnished by the schools. Returning, the boat left at 6 P. M., arriving at West End about 8:20 P. M., where busses were waiting to convey the children back to their churches. Thus ended a most enjoyable outing, all hoping it would be repeated next year.

THINGS.

By Frances M. Bock.

Lord of my spirit, loose me from
The tyranny of Things!
Let them not tangle in their web
My spirit's fragile wings!

For lovely things and useful Things
And Things that people prize
Weave silken webs to snare our hearts
And blind our spirits' eyes.

To the eternal loveliness
Of living things that grow;
To human loves and loyalties,
And truths we need to know.

Let me keep faith with needful Things.
Give each its rightful care;
Yet softly step among them, lest
They take me in their snare!

For the Southern Churchman.

The Rector Makes a Call.

The rector had been thinking about the Church, and especially about the opportunities it provides for every person, man or woman, boy or girl, to make his or her life richer and deeper and broader. He was thinking just then not of the sacramental life, that "new life" the Prayer Book talks about, but of what the Prayer Book calls "this transitory life."

He was feeling a bit discouraged, because it seemed to him that his people were getting so little in proportion to opportunities offered them. True, they came to church, both to worship and to learn, and they kept up their subscriptions—he had nothing really to complain about—and yet—

It was evening and he was tired. He sat before the fire considering whether to take a nap or put on his coat and go out to call on one of his Church families whom he had not seen for some time, except in church. They were good friends of his and he would enjoy talking this over with them.

To his delight he found the whole family at home, an almost unprecedented event. Father and mother, one daughter and two sons. The father had been on the vestry until rotation of office made him ineligible for the time being. The mother had served in various ways and the young people had grown up in the Church school.

He was welcomed with shouts—"We were just talking about you—" "We have just discovered that we are a perfect Church family—" "We don't mean that the way it sounds—we don't mean we are perfect character—We mean—What do we mean?"

"We mean," the older son explained, "that we are in touch with everything the Church is doing nationally. We aren't missing a trick. It's this way—Dad is helping with the Every Member Canvass—on the committee since last spring as you know. Mother is on a Woman's Auxiliary committee and is working with the Diocesan Church Mission of Help. Mary is trying out some G. F. S. program stuff—"

"It's to work up some ideas for the use of leisure time, so many of the members are still out of work or have shorter hours," Mary explained, and continued her brother's tale—"John is in the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and Jim is treasurer of the Y. P. F., and he and I collect everybody's books and magazines the minute they are read and ship them off for the Church Perodical Club to distribute."

"We read the parish paper," Father continued, as Mary stopped for breath, "and the diocesan paper, and a national Church paper. And we have each stepped up our little contributions for the coming year. Now, aren't we a model lot? Is there anything else we could do, nationally?"

"I've thought of three more," Jim announced before the rector could answer—"Seamen's Institute, and Church Army, and Institute for Negroes—"

"And I've thought of two more," Mother added—"Daughters of the King and Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses. What can we do about them?"

"That's three men's and two women's," John said. "Let's each adopt one and send it a special offering for a dollar a year and stand by to be interested if it ever comes to this parish—would that do?"

"And this is the most interesting of all," said Father. "We thought we'd try all to be home one night a month and each ask two other people to come, so there would be fifteen of us, and have a discussion group, about what the Church is doing everywhere—in foreign lands and in home missions and in social service and religious education and all that—We're going to take turns working up the program—Will you come?"

This was finally too much for the rector, and he woke up to find himself still in his arm chair before the fire. But he kept thinking about his dream and the more he thought, the more reasonable and practical it seemed. After all—why not?—Why shouldn't a Church family be like that?—Anonymous.

A Story About Sir James Barrie.

There has floated out through the press recently a story told by Sir James M. Barrie. He had been making a call on a lovely lady, the Princess Margaret, daughter of the Duke of Kent. This little lady is three years old and he found her admiring a recent gift which had come to her. I imagine he himself had given it to her. But she was engrossed in it and, like a little child captivated by it. In his inimitable way Barrie said to her, "Is it all yours?" And the little lady replied, "It is yours and mine." That is a perfect answer. That is the answer our Lord would have us give to all that life is or will be: its beauty, its freshness, its tasks, its pleasures, its joys—yes, and its sorrow and diappointments. He would have us say, "It is yours and mine." That is the deepest meaning which life can hold for us. It is the inner meaning of the symbol of the "Everlasting Pattern" and what better inspiration could we carry into the New Year, with its secret hours and its hidden days but this—that all things, things earthly and things heavenly, things temporal and things eternal, life and death, sunshine and shadow, eternity and time, are all intertwined for good to those who loved God.

"Because I am aware of the splendor that ties
All the things of the earth with the things of the skies
Here in my body the heavenly heat
Here in my flesh the melodious beat
Of the planets that circle Divinity's feet."

About Dogs in Church.

In the vestry of Badow Church, Derbyshire, England, is an interesting and possibly unique reminder of the old days when the farmers' dogs followed their masters to church. Often they wandered inside, and when the music started the animals would start howling. To clear the building at such times a man was employed to drive the dogs out.

Some quaint records of dogs in church are to be found in old church records. Thus at Great Stoughton, Hunts, the following appears:

1653 Item. Pd. to Wm. Richards for whippinge ye dogs out of church from Michaelmas to Christmas, 1s.
1730 Pd, ye dog whiper, 2s, 6d.

Princely Gift to Hull.

A day or two before Christmas it was announced that Mr. Joseph Rank, a well-known Hull flour miller, had given £300,000 for the benefit of poor persons of good character in Hull. A benevolent trust is to be founded and the income from the capital sum is estimated to produce about £12,000 annually.

Mr. Rank is a well-known Methodist. I understand he has had for several years a large financial interest in the Methodist Times.—Church of England Newspaper, December 28, 1934.

England's Richest Man a Miller Sixty Years.

A man who began business as a miller with one small windmill sixty years ago is now the richest man in England. He is Joseph Rank, formerly of Hull, Yorkshire, and now of Reigate, near London. Today, at eighty-one, he owns the biggest group of flour mills in Great Britain and one of the largest in Europe.

The little windmill with which he started business, at twenty-one, had an output of one and a half sacks of flour an hour when a strong enough wind was blowing, or an average of about thirty sacks a week. But the more than a score of great flour mills that Joseph Rank now controls are capable of producing 173,000 sacks a week, or 8,000,000 sacks a year, sufficient to produce bread for one out of every seven persons in Great Britain. And Mr. Rank himself is the possessor of a fortune estimated at between £20,000,000 and £25,000,000.

There had been only one man in England richer than the "King of Millers," as Joseph Rank is known, for a good many years. That man was Sir John Ellerman, shipping magnate, who died in July. The Ellerman fortune was estimated to be about £30,000,000, but government death duties are expected to reduce that sum by more than £10,000,000.

Joseph Rank thus becomes definitely England's richest man. It may be added that he is also one of its shyest and least given to publicity-seeking. He is, consequently, all but unknown to the general public. If one stopped fifty people one after another in the streets of London and asked each who Joseph Rank is, it is questionable if one of them would be able to tell. In Britain's "Who's Who" there are just three lines about him, doubtless all he would consent to have inserted. And they tell you no more than that he is governing director of Joseph Rank, Ltd., of Hull; that his address is Colley Corner, Reigate—Reigate is in Surrey, not far from London—and that his telephone number is Reigate 138.

How much wealthier Mr. Rank might be than he is, had he not given so much money away, only he knows. Those who know anything about him at all are merely aware that his benefactions have been enormous.

A devout Wesleyan Methodist since boyhood, Mr. Rank has given generously to the church for fifty years. In all, his gifts to the Methodist Church are estimated to have totalled £1,000,000.

Mr. Rank piled up his huge fortune by impassioned hard work, vision and farsightedness, with, as he himself probably would tell you, the help of the Almighty; for he always has been deeply religious. A cousin, who perhaps knows him best, quoted him as having once said, when asked what was his guiding principle in life: "If I take anything to prayer I always succeed. I've never been in difficulty once in my life."

Joseph Rank was born at Hull, in Yorkshire. His father and grandfather had been millers. Joseph began learning the business as soon as he had finished school. When he was twenty-one, with about £250 left him by his father, he bought the first of the many mills he was to own. Its output did not satisfy Joseph Hank.

He took his first step toward progress by acquiring a mill driven by a steam engine. It had new milling improvements, and a capacity of from two to three sacks of flour an hour. He is said to have felt strongly inclined, some time later, to give up milling and become a missionary. But the cousin—also a miller—who related this incident, added that he said to him: "Joe, you are not made for a missionary. If you will buy a rolling mill you will become the greatest miller in Hull."

Joseph Rank followed this advice, built a rolling mill in 1885 and equipped it with the most efficient machinery that had been developed.

The Alexandra Mill, as he called it, had a capacity of some seven sacks an hour.

So he went on, building larger and larger mills, one block of them, the Premier Mills at Silvertown in London, to serve the metropolis; another block, the Ocean Mills, in Liverpool, and a third, the Atlantic Mills, in Cardiff. He kept steadily acquiring and reorganizing others throughout England and Scotland. Fifty years after his start he had built up the vast business that he now controls.

Not only has Mr. Rank known how to make money; he is one of the men to whom wealth seems to come even when they are not seeking it.

During the first part of the World war (which he never believed would break out), Mr. Rank and his wife were interned in Austria. He tried for a while in vain to get back to England. He had good reason for wishing to return. If his subordinates carried out his last instructions his firm would go bankrupt. But he could not get a message through to them.

His firm did not go bankrupt. His lieutenants saw to that, though at first they did not know what to do. They were used to obeying his orders, but they disobeyed them that time.

In the course of the war Joseph Rank went to Lloyd George with a flour scheme, offering his services for nothing.

"I am sorry," said the Prime Minister, "but there is no way of dealing with you except on ordinary business terms."

The scheme was adopted and, against his will, Mr. Rank is said to have made £2,000,000.

When he was a poor youngster in Hull, learning to be a miller, he had attended the Methodist Sunday school. And when his genius for business began to draw in riches like a magnet, and he came south to live in the London suburb named Tooting, he became a Sunday-school superintendent there and a contributor to church funds.

He contributed £10,000 to the Wesleyan Million Guineas Fund, with which the Central Hall in Westminster, among other structures, was built, and he gave £50,000 to the Wesleyan London Mission Fund. Incidentally, he built mission halls in many industrial towns and in the East End of London.

Dr. Robert Bond, secretary to the Methodist Conference, relates of him:

"Some time ago Mr. Rank asked to see the balance sheet for our aged ministers' fund. When he found it was, well, in considerable need, he wrote out a check for £100,000 then and there."

Some years ago a case in the courts brought to light the fact that Mr. Rank had set aside stocks and shares in his firm which would produce £171,000 a year for the Wesleyan Church. But he never parades his philanthropy, and nearly all his gifts are anonymous.

"He never gives irresponsibly, either," one of his friends remarked. "He believes that charity helps most when it encourages people to help themselves."

He still puts in a full office day and has complete control of his business. Also, he retains his simplicity. His home near Reigate, in one of the most beautiful parts of Surrey, is of an inconspicuous suburban kind. The presumption is that he does not spend much on dress.

Mr. Rank has been married twice and has three sons, two of whom are directors of his business.—New York Times.

A PRAYER FOR STRENGTH.

Alice Maude Spokes.

Give me strength, O God, I plead,
I seek not strength to flaunt and lead
O let me guide in humble way
The traveler wearied by dismay!
O give me eyes to guide the blind—
Their weak and faltering steps unbind;
Forgive the guilty one, his wrong—
Place in his heart a morning song.

Submit a task for me to do!
Resolve the false—align the true!
Reflect Your glory like rays of sun
Each day, till shadows of life are gone;
O help me melt the heart of stone
By sunshine of Your love, alone;
And give me strength always to find
A spark of hope in all mankind!

God never calls men and women to do anything that they can do by themselves. The task to which He calls them is greater than their wisdom or strength. His promise is to supply that which is lacking in their resources.—Norman Cox.

LITTLE THINGS.

Charles Ballard.

Our lives are filled with little, precious things:
Hand-clasps, and smiles, and sentences half said:
Quick steps to greet us at a well-known door—
Loves' slightest offerings.

Such gifts would crown us, were there nothing more—
To these the wise heart clings.
Our lives are filled with little, precious things:
They are our daily bread.

"The kingdoms of the earth go by
In the purple and in gold;
They rise, they triumph, and they die,
And all their tale is told.
One Kingdom only is divine,
One banner triumphs still;
Its King a servant, and its sign
A cross upon a hill."

Not with our mortal eyes
Have we beheld the Lord;
Yet ye rejoice to hear His name,
And love Him in His word.
And when we taste His love,
Our joys divinely grow
Unspeakable, like those above
And heaven begins below.

Little Grandma's Adventure.

Little Grandma sat very straight on a low stool knitting. Click, click, went her capable needles. Then the busy click stopped. She held her knitting just so, lest a stitch drop off while she wasn't watching it, and twisted her head stiffly over her shoulder to look at an hour-glass that told the time. Half its sand had run down into the bottom of the glass—yes, more little Grandma calculated hopefully. Three-quarters of it! Quarter of an hour longer and she would be free. She faced about and went on with the gray woollen stocking.

Little Grandma was knitting her stunt—six rows around a stocking every day before she could play. The backboard was why she turned stiffly. Great-Grandmother had strapped a light board across her shoulders to keep her straight, and she had to wear it an hour. All her sisters had worn one and were straight as arrows.

Great-Grandmother was raking red-hot coals out of the brick oven. Early in the morning she built a roaring wood fire inside the oven to heat it, and into the hot, clean oven went juicy raspberry pies.

"Sally," she said, as the iron door of the oven clanged shut, "have you finished your stunt?"

"All but"—she stopped to count—"nine stitches."

"Dew is off the grass," went on Great-Grandmother, beginning to mix caraway-seed cakes, "and when you are through, you may go out into the pasture and pick pennyroyal."

"Oh, goody!" cried little Grandma, and her lagging needles clicked more briskly. "And I'll see Tiny, too!" Tiny was her cosset lamb, though fast outgrowing its name.

The last grain of sand trickled down as little Grandma knit the last stitch. The backboard was unstrapped and she danced away for her sunbonnet. Every summer she gathered pennyroyal, and hung it around the dormer window in the attic to dry for tea next winter.

Little Grandma ran up the lane, squeezed through the bars into the pasture and headed for the brook. In spring it was a rushing torrent, but by mid-summer it wound quietly through the field with hardly a ripple. The bank was high, the grass dry and slippery, and she mostly slid down. Her blue eyes sparkled. "Good as sliding down hill on snowy winters," she laughed.

She crossed the brook on stepping-stones without even wetting her shoes, and scrambled up the steep, slippery bank on the other side where a bed of wild pennyroyal grew along its top.

A fresh breeze blew from the hills, swallows darted and swooped overhead, and bees hummed through the clover. It was pleasant in the upland pasture.

As soon as the cosset lamb saw her, it left the flock of sheep grazing in a far corner of the field and ran to little Grandma. She played with it a while, and then went on picking pennyroyal, the lamb nibbling grass contentedly close by.

The breeze died away and the day grew hot. Moist curls stuck to her forehead, and little Grandma untied the strings of her bonnet and threw it back to cool her face. The basket was full. She knew by the sun, high overhead, it was noon and time to go home. She stood up and faced the hills for a bit of breeze. But there wasn't any.

In a chopping beyond the old stump fence, raspberry bushes grew in a great thicket. Yesterday she and Susan were there berrying. Suddenly she saw bushes waving. But there was no wind to move them. Somebody must be berrying there now and stirring the bushes. Puzzled, she watched. After a while she glimpsed a dark spot among them. Then something big and black lumbered out into plain sight. "A bear!" she breathed. He was eating berries.

She wanted to scream, but nobody could hear, and it would only call the bear's attention to her. Maybe he hadn't seen her yet—he wasn't looking her way. Noiselessly she dropped to the ground.

"He shan't have my lamb," thought little Grandma. She felt for the basket. "The bear shan't have that, either," and seized the handle her groping fingers touched.

"Come, Tiny!" she called softly. The lamb followed obediently.

Little Grandma made herself as flat as possible and inched along to the crest of the bank. Headfirst, she wriggled over the edge. Once below the top, she sat up, put the basket in her lap, and let herself go. If her dress caught, she jerked it loose. She slid full speed down the bank, and plunged right into the water with a great splash. She had happened on the very steepest part of the bank and the deepest place in the brook. Dripping, she got to her feet and splashed on. The water was up to her waist.

The lamb had capered down the bank, and, picking its way further up stream, crossed a shallower part of the brook, leaping from stone to stone, or wading where it must.

When little Grandma reached shore, she climbed straight up before her, water squashing out of her shoes every step. At last she made the top. Over the edge she tumbled onto the level field. The lamb was there before her, for it had skipped up the steep bank as lightly as a mountain goat. Never giving a glance behind, she raced across the pasture, the lamb frolicking around her. It was all play to the lamb. At the pasture bars she stopped long enough to let down the lowest rail, so the lamb could get out, and flew along the line. She burst through the door where the family were at dinner.

"Oh, what has happened!" cried Great-Grandmother, aghast at panting, dripping little Grandma, her face crimson, sunbonnet lost, dress torn in the wild slide down hill, a puddle of water collecting under her feet. The lamb came in with her—it was used to following her all over the house—and stood in its own pool of water that oozed from its white wool.

Little Grandma thrust the basket into Great-Grandmother's hand.

" 'Tisn't much," she gasped. "But some pennyroyal spilled."

"What is the matter?" chorused the startled family.

"A bear! In the ras-bries!" sobbed little Grandma, from her mother's arms. She hadn't cried before, but now she was safe, she did.

There was scraping of chairs as Great-Grandfather and his sons rose hastily.

"Did the bear chase you?" her sisters quavered.

"I don't know," owned little Grandme. "I didn't look."

"You did well to get away so quietly and bring the lamb with you," Great-Grandfather praised her, "though it's likely the bear was so busy with the berries he didn't see you. And he wouldn't have bothered you, anyway."

But he took his gun off the wall.

"Come on, boys! We must drive home the sheep. Can't risk them in the pasture while that bear's around."

With a tweak of a brown curl to show how glad they were little Grandma was all right, her brothers hurried after him to the pasture.

When they reached there the bear was gone. So were the raspberries. Picked clean, and the bushes broken down where he trampled them. Berries were what that bear wanted. He had eaten them all, and did not come again. —Advance.

THOSE RECTORY CHILDREN.

Chapter XXIII.

M. L. G.

"How's that for a pile of wood?"

"And how's this for a string of fish?"

Ham, dusting off his hands after throwing the last armful on the great pile of boughs and twigs, looked across it at Mr. Craig, who held aloft his fish, the reward of three hours' craft and patience.

"Good enough! I'll help you clean them."

"And you have wood there, for a dozen camp-fires. Wish we had a dozen nights coming!"

"So do I, sir. But I was determined to have our last fire a good one."

"And it's cool enough now, as soon as the sun gets low, to enjoy a good blaze. You say you'll help with these fish? Bring a couple of knives to the river-side, Ham. They'll be done in a jiffy. D'you know what I'm going to cook to go with them? Ash-cakes! My old colored Mammy taught me the trick, and if anything's better I don't know what. Hot, you know, with plenty of butter."

They worked busily, in silence.

"You've had it all to yourself, this afternoon, Ham?"

"Pat was sure he'd seen some old apple trees over beyond the hill, and Mr. Duncan and David went with him to bring some back. They'll go well with the fish and ash-cakes roasted."

"Makes me hungry to think of it. What a good time we've had of it, eh, Ham?"

"Every minute of it, Mr. Craig!"

"Wait a bit—you didn't seem so enthusiastic about that spring-hunt the first day?"

"Oh, that! It was just getting too hot to be funny when the wagon showed up. When I think how many times I've been to that spring since!—I could walk there in the dark."

"And what about your discovery of the hornets' nest the next day?"

"Ouch! And David falling into the river from that overhanging limb—it was a mean minute at first, when he didn't come up. And I've grown a crop of blisters, and Pat's wrist is still sprained from the fall he had down the hillside—funny thing, there have been heaps of accidents, but they just make part of the best time I ever had."

"There's a lot in people just being together, sharing their luck. That and good sportsmanship, such as you've shown. You've lost two or three pounds you didn't need, too, Ham."

"And I hope I'll never find them. Here comes the folks! Hey, had any luck?"

"All sorts of luck, (except forgetting to take anything to bring the apples back in. So we stuffed our pockets and here are our hands full. Some would roll off," Mr. Duncan went on, shedding apples from every pocket, "and no hand among us to retrieve them."

"And nobody got after you with a stick?"

"No—we saw where the house had burned long ago. Only ashes and apples to tell the tale."

None of the five had tasted a better supper than they had that night. The sun set early behind the mountains, and though there was a week left of August the mountain air was keen, with a hint of frost. Ham made a noble fire and, after supper, they sat contentedly in its glow, Father and Mr. Craig with their pipes.

"Five weeks from now should see me in Shanghai," said Mr. Craig, thoughtfully. "It will be hot, crowded, noisy, while now it's cool and quiet and with only the good company of friends."

"How can you, Mr. Craig!" exclaimed Pat. "It would be fine if you were just on a trip—but to go away for years again, after just a few months at home —I don't see how you can!"

"Well, old fellow, it seems going away, to you, but to me it is going back. There's my little congregation. There's old Wu, who is waiting for me to baptize him. He's been a catechumen for two years now, and he isn't going to live long, but he wouldn't let anyone else baptize him. There are my old Bible women, who will have gathered a new group for instruction; and there's Shen Tai and my other hospital people. I think I see my way clear to reach out to a new village right away, and others soon. Oh, there's plenty to draw me back, good as the home country is!"

"But don't you get tired, and lonely, and don't you feel awfully far away from home?" asked Ham.

"Tired—well so does Duncan here, and any man who's doing a man's work. Lonely and far away? Well, boys, it's a curious thing, but as one goes along in life, one finds distance, and time, making less difference. This chap—" he put his hand on Father's shoulder —"this chap and I don't worry about either of 'em. I can think of him, and he of me, I hope, at any time, as being just the same. And the thing—The Person—that directs his life directs mine.

"That's the way of it," came in Father's deep voice.

"But suppose," said Pat, hesitating, "suppose one of you were to—to die"

Mr. Craig gave a chuckle.

"I've supposed that, too, Pat. And the plan covers that as well as any other physical separation. I'll come back here in seven years a little more full of wrinkles and taik, and I'll find changes, yes, but none in the hearts of friends. Some may be gone, but that doesn't change them, either." Mr. Craig refilled his small pipe and puffed away cheerfully.

"It's called the Communion of Saints —sinners included," Father said.

"My gracious, I thought the Communion of Saints was something in the Creed!" exclaimed Ham.

"You're right there, too," Mr. Craig said, smiling. "But the Creed and life get mixed up. They just will do it, if you believe in both of 'em."

"Life, and all those things," said David, who had been listening in silence, "they're intrustin'."

They all laughed, and Mr. Craig said, "Surest thing in the world, David." He lay back on one elbow. "Chestnutting around these camp-grounds later on, you boys better get ahead of the squirrels."

"It doesn't seem so far from home any more," said Pat eagerly, "If we can borrow the horses we can come back."

"I think I can see to that." That was Father.

"What's moving, there by the tent?" asked David, suddenly.

They all turned in time to see a lumbering shape, indistinct in the darkness beyond the light of the fire, disappearing within the tent.

"Not tall enough for a man. But he may be on on all fours," whispered Mr. Craig.

Motioning the boys to sit still, the two men went quietly to the tent. Then Mr. Craig turned, and signalled the boys to come. When they reached the tent they found Mr. Craig convulsed with merriment, and Father smiling broadly. They peeped in. There sat a brown bear about half grown, his nose in the sugar-box and his paws smeared with butter, too intent on his feast to notice the slight noises they made.

A real bear! The boys had an instant of fright, but they were reassured by the manner of their elders, and there was something irresistibly funny in the enjoyment of the bear, who was making the best of his opportunity.

"Say, we'll need some breakfast!" whispered Ham, after a moment, as the bear began nosing around for more.

Mr. Craig's laugh rang out at that, and with a startled grunt, the bear turned and fled, leaving wreckage where the food box had been, and buttery foot prints through the tent and along his track to the mountain.

"Well, that was worth a breakfast without butter or sugar!" declared Mr. Craig. "That's a tale to tell my hospital people in China."

Goldilocks the other way 'round," added Father. "He wasn't much more than a cub."

"This was his lucky night, anyway," said Pat. "Good thing we're going tomorrow, so we don't mind losing the stuff."

"He won't come back, will he, Father?" asked David, a little anxiously.

"Craig and I'll sit up awhile. You boys turn in now, we'll put this to rights. If Mr. Bear comes back I'll get Craig to laugh at him. That sent him packing once, we can't do better than try it again!"

White Foaming Waters.

"There!" Andrew's face was white, almost as white as the boy's who lay stretched on the ground before him. "There!—that's as good as I can do." "Feel better?" When the lad before him, repressing a groan, nodded, he continued, "Well just lie still! Don't move. I'll make the cabin ready. Have to leave you alone tonight." The look of utter despair in the eyes of the boy before him caused him to stop. "Hurt much?" he asked.

The other lad, a youth of seventeen, responded, "Some." Then he clenched his teeth and stopped. "All right," he said dully, "All right. I'll have to stay."

Andrew shook his head, puzzled, as he made his way from the bank of the pond towards the cabin a few rods back. He had just returned from the riffles downstream, a scant quarter of a mile from where the waters of the pond leaped, a silver cascade, over the dam. To the riffles he had gone to see if he could coax a few trout out in time for supper. Coming back he had run across Jim Evans, his chum, lying along the trail that led down stream. A rough trail it was, used only as a portage from the main river. How long Jim had lain helpless Andrew could only guess. The leg had been badly swollen. Andrew considered the thrashed path from the shore of the pond to the point where he had found the lad. There was no doubt that James had been delirious. His cries of "Mother! Mother!" even as in his delirium he had dragged himself forward, puzzled Andrew.

"Well," Andrew stepped ahead, "there is only one thing to do, make the cabin comfortable, get the boy in it, and then carry the canoe down the rough, mile-long, portage to the main stream below. In the morning help could be sent from the settlements.

"Funny," Andrew spoke aloud, "how he sort of wilted when I spoke of leaving him alone for the night. I can't stay with him; his leg will need attention; and—" He did not finish. The camp on Beaver Pond was far back in the cut-over woods. Only rarely did visitors come. It might be a week before anyone visited them. Old Billings from his little forest twelve miles to the west might drop in on his way past as he made his weekly trip to the settlements.

Then almost in front of the cabin door a yellow, fluttering paper caught his eye. "A telegram, how did it come!" Then his eyes roving around the clearing noted the wheelmarks, saw the imprint of the horse's hoofs. Andrew leaned over to examine the marks. "Old Billings must have been to town, and the telegram has been sent up by him. It must have come," the marks were not fresh, "sometime shortly afternoon, just after I left."

"Mother." Without meaning to, Andrew was reading the message. "Mother taken sick. Calls for you all the time. Doctor says it is her only chance. Come. Dad."

Andrew stood as though stricken. "Mother—mother calls!" Now he knew! That explained the delirious mutterings of the boy. That explained his attempt to drag himself along the trail, the down trail, the trail that led home.

"Then he saw it all." Why! Old Billings delivered the messages. Then James went out and was standing on that mossy point that commands a view of the lake. Looking for me! That's where he fell."

Andrew mechanically turned to the task of fixing up the bunk. No use—it could not be done. He had staggered as he had carried the lad from the pond's edge to the bed of pine needles where he had tried to set his leg. 'Twould be hard enough to get him back to the cabin, let alone attempt a portage a mile in length, rocky, footing insecure! Why it was impossible.

From afar came a faint, mere echo of a whistle! 'Twas the afternoon train whistling for the siding ten miles away through the tangled woodland. If it were not for the portage; if it were not for that stretch of foaming, rock infested water below the pond, why he could have Jim down to the settlement in no time. The evening train to the city—it could be made.

The cabin was ready. "I'd work like a beaver." He stopped!

The lake where the two had come to spend a week fishing was a mere pond, rather shallow, a beaver pond—Andrew considered.

'Twas risky, yet there was a chance, a slight chance.

All the way back to his injured companion Andrew was undecided. Common sense told him that the thing to do was to get the lad into the cabin, and then summon aid. It would, however, mean a day's delay.

On the pine needles the boy lay. As Andrew watched he saw him trying to prop himself up, and then hunt through one pocket and then another.

"Is it this?" Andrew tried to keep his voice level. He held out the yellow telegram.

The other nodded. Silently the boy reached out his hand and took it. Then tears glistened! "I'll try not to fuss when you carry me." His tone was a matter of fact. "It's tough luck!" He gulped, "Mother—" he did not finish. He turned and looked out over the

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

Church, Fort Thomas, had the largest offering in the section.

On June 2, Blue Grass Sunday Schools sent representatives to Christ Church, Lexington. The Rev. Harry R. Ziegler, of Maysville, spoke of missionary experiences. Christ Church had the largest offering in the diocese.

Paid Off in Full.

Solemn burning of a note for $796.97 was the feature of the service in St. John's Church, Bellevue, Ky., the third Sunday after Easter. For five years the parish has been working to pay it off. A large portion was paid through a bequest two years ago.

A few weeks later the senior boys of the church school decided to do the long-needed painting and varnishing on the inside of the church building. The school superintendent helped and supervised. The rector, the Rev. Neil E. Annable, reports a good job.

Services and Conferences.

Bishop E. V. Shayler preached the sermon at the Convocation of the Municipal University of Omaha at Trinity Cathedral on June 6, and also pronounced the benediction at Doane College, Crete, at the annual exercises on June 3. Doane College is under the joint auspices of the Episcopal and Congregational Churches.

The Mission of St. Stephen's, Ashland, has been taken over by the Rev. Vernon Lane in addition to his work as rector of St. Martin's S. Omaha.

Dr. Fred Clayton, rector of All Saints, was a lecturer on the staff of the South Dakota Summer Conference the second week in June.

Two hundred men are expected to attend Nebraska Summer Conference as the guests of the Nebraska Churchmen's Club on the Sunday preceding the final day of the school. Nationally known leaders are being invited for this function.

The Bishop gave the address through an interpreter to the school for the deaf last week at their closing exercises in Omaha.

A great united service was held on Ascension Day in All Saints' Church, Omaha, marking the dual commemoration of the Church Feast and Memorial Day. The church was filled to capacity, and Rev. Robert Crawford, of St. Barnabas, Omaha, preached the sermon. The Bishop acted as celebrant. All Omaha Episcopal Churches united in this unusual and successful gathering.

Notice is hereby given that on this day, June 11, 1935, acting in accordance with the provisions of Canon 34, Section 1, and with the advice and consent of the clerical members of the Standing Committee, and in the presence of the Rev. Dr. J. Clarence Jones and the Rev. Dr. Frank M. Townley, Presbyters of this diocese, I formally accepted the renunciation of the ministry of this Church made to me in writing by the Rev. Edgar Ethelbert Brice, priest, who is, therefore, released from the obligations of the ministerial office and deprived of the right to exercise the gifts and spiritual authority as a minister of God's Word and Sacraments conferred on him in his ordination; this action being taken for causes which do not affect his moral character.

New Reredos Dedicated at Zion Church, Douglaston.

Zion Church, Douglaston (formerly Little Neck), L. I., celebrated on Trinity Sunday the 105th anniversary of its founding. On June 17, 1830, Wynant Van Zandt, of Little Neck, having built the church, caused it to be formally opened for public worship, and presented it, with the surrounding land for a burial ground, to the congregation. On the occasion of the 105th anniversary, a descendant of the founder, Mary Louise Van Zandt, of Great Neck, unveiled a beautiful new carved wood reredos, decorated in ploychrome, designed and made by Trygve Hammer, of Douglaston, and presented by a committee of friends and neighbors. A dedicatory prayer was said by Bishop Crieghton. The rector is the Rev. Lester Leake Riley.

Cathedral Day in Long Island.

Cathedral Day, the annual festival of the church schools of the diocese was observed on June 1. About six thousand children and their teachers, from a large number of the parishes of the diocese, came to Garden City, formed a parade, and, led by a uniformed brass band, passed in review before the Bishop of the diocese, his suffragans and other diocesan officers, who had taken their position on the steps at the main entrance to the cathedral. An outdoor service was arranged, the assembly being several times larger than the capacity of the church. After the service there was a picnic lunch, then a track meet, baseball games and other athletic contests.

The Rev. Dr. Alfred R. Berkeley of St. John's, Roanoke, was chief counselor, and Mr. Edgar T. Ferrell, Jr., a student at Virginia Seminary, was recreation leader. The Rev. Dr. Carleton Barnwell of St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, was editor-in-chief of a daily paper, "The Log," which kept the members of the conference informed of important occurrences during the session.

At the business meeting officers for the coming year were elected as follows: President, Thomas D. Lewis, Jr., of Amherst; Vice-Presidents, Frances Carpenter and William Rutherfoord of Roanoke; Secretary, Owen Keeler of Bedford, and Treasurer, Anne Marie Bowen of Lynchburg.

There was a fine attendance, total 121, and the members of the conference were most enthusiastic over the spiritual tone of the conference, the impressiveness of the various addresses, and the joy of the social and recreational activities.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman D. D. Bishop.

American Legion Hold Open-Air Service.

Inaugurating Legion "National Church Sunday" as an annual custom for the future, the American Legion held an open-air service at Washington Cathedral on June 16, and at various points throughout the country. National Chaplain, the Rev. Park W. Huntington, Lutheran minister, Wilmington, Del., delivered a stirring sermon, on the text, "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." Bishop James E. Freeman also spoke, and called the Legion to a disinterested service of the whole country. A Roman Catholic priest, the Rev. Richard Fitzgerald, Chaplain of the American Legion in the District of Columbia, offered the invocation, and Rabbi Solomon Fineburg, Mount Vernon, N. Y., National Chaplain of the Jewish War Veterans, read the Scripture. Chaplain Z. Barney Phillips, D. D., of the United States Senate, read the Prayers, and Chaplain James S. Montgomery of the U. S. House of Representatives led in recitation of the Apostles' Creed. The Marine Band and the Cathedral choir furnished inspiring music. The ceremony was broadcast over a coast-to-coast radio hook-up and many Legion posts in Canada, Mexico and the United States listened in.

National Commander Belgrano, an active communicant of the Episcopal Church in California, was unexpectedly detained, but was officially represented by the National Adjutant, Frank E. Samuel, Indianapolis. Canon Raymond L. Wolven of the Cathedral staff was master of ceremonies.

Bishop Freeman read a message from the President of the United States, in part, as follows: "This worthy project advanced by the Legion gives special significance to the day of its first celebration. I believe it was Walter E. Ranger who said, 'All that is best in American life has come through loyalty to hardship.' To this I would add the thought of present-day world needs for assurance of world peace—assurances based on mutual understanding and mutual regard."

Archbishop Michael J. Curley, Roman Archbishop of Baltimore, which embraces the Washington territory, gave his endorsement to the Legion mass service, and appointed Father Fitzgerald to participate. "What our nation needs today more than anything else is not added legislation," said the Archbishop, "but more of Christ in the hearts of the people. The American Legion is to be commended most heartily for this step."

Just before the public service, the Sons of the Legion visited the tomb of Woodrow Wilson and held a brief memorial service in Bethlehem Chapel in the National Cathedral.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

"The truth is never in danger."

The noblest deeds of men are resurrections from the graves of buried hopes.—Selected.

"The search for some complete law of justice between man and man, the search for remedies for social ills, is essentially a search after the Christ."

If you want to be "great" be a "servant", but if you want to be "first", then go deeper still, be a "bond-servant."—Rev. E. Stanley Jones.

There has been no vital faith in Christ, no obedience towards God, that has not involved the sacrifice of self in the service of man. Without vicarious sacrifice, there has been no friendship, no love, no moral helpfulness, no saving of souls.—George Herron.

To love our God with all our strength and will;
To covet nothing, to devise no ill
Against our neighbors; to procure or do
Nothing to others which we would not do
These are His precepts, and, alas, in these
What is so hard but faith can do with ease?

—Henry Vaughan.

Together is another fine word. It emphasizes unity in hard service, as unity in spirit and mind had just been emphasized. Feeling and thinking together does not mean the strongest unity. It is only when people work together, struggle together, suffer together, that they attain the strongest and most enduring unity. Paul knew this well. He loved to speak of his fellow sufferers, his fellow laborers, his fellow prisoners, his fellow soldiers. Those who still strive together in a great cause with one spirit and one soul are one in the noblest and best sense. —Selected.

pond, with its lily pads, its fringe of dead, drowned trees, its beaver huts.

"Would you take a chance to get down in time for the night train?" Andrew kicked at a root.

"Would I!" Hope flashed in the boy's eyes. "Would I! Oh, Andrew, it is not the pain I am dreading, but alone all night waiting, yet wanting to go!" Then the hope died. Before them the trail began, rough, well-nigh impassable.

Andrew spoke briefly. "A chance, a bare chance."

The other nodded. "We will take it," and his face almost glowed. He was looking at the rocky broken stretch of black water, but his eyes were bright, and he was not seeing the water of the stream, was not hearing the murmur of the river. Far beyond that he looked to where one called for him.

The canoe! Jim in it! Andrew had moored in a little cove a few rods below where the water trickled over the falls. He had tethered it securely with a stout rope. It must hold.

The test was coming. On the dam an old beaver dam that made the pond, Andrew pried and pushed. At first the matter-tangled mass held. It would not move. Then one branch, some mud, a gnarled bough, 'twas going. The waters of the pond were swirling past, broadening the break. One more shove at what he took to be the key tree trunk —one heave and the waters roared!

Jumping, slipping, Andrew scrambled across the top of the dam, slid down the bank and rushed to the canoe. He must not wait. The flood of dammed up waters was roaring down the stream, and they must go with the flood.

A slash—the rope parted. Two vigorous shoves and the white foaming water caught the canoe. It leaped like a alive thing.

Was it deep enough! Andrew could do little with the craft save guide it. Such foaming waters, a seething flood, never had he handled a canoe in!

He knew the stream. In memory he called up the location of the rocks. A stroke here, another there—on they rushed.

The main stream came in sight, quiet and tranquil compared to the flood on which they floated.

One more rock—a jagged rock at the junction of the rivers. A quick twist of the dipped paddle!

'Twas Jim lying in the bow who spoke first. Andrew, now they were on the main stream, suddenly felt tired. And so it was Jim who said: "We made it!" There was victory in his voice. Then he closed his eyes. The rythmic swing of the paddle was driving the canoe down to the settlement. He closed his eyes, and Andrew judged that he slept. Only once he stirred, and Andrew thought he heard one word, "mother," above the lap of the waters.—E. G. Wallace, in The Watchman-Examiner.

IMPORTANT

The Southern Churchman Company is engaged in an intensive campaign to extend the circulation of Southern Churchman and thus enable it more effectively to carry out its purpose as an auxiliary to the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and of service to its members.

Within the short period since this campaign has been in effect, the circulation of the paper has more than doubled; a gratifying indication that Church people want the information on religious subjects contained in its weekly issues, and appreciate the service it renders.

If enabled to continue the campaign for a reasonable time, there is every prospect that the increase in subscriptions thus secured will soon put the paper upon a solid financial basis of publication, and ultimately enable it to discharge its indebtedness.

To conduct this campaign requires a large amount of ready cash, and its continuance depends upon our ability to provide the necessary funds.

Southern Churchman resources consist of subscriptions for the paper and advertising. Of subscriptions there is now a large amount due on annual renewals, the immediate paying of which would greatly assist in carrying out our effort to make the paper self-supporting.

We are, therefore, asking these subscribers to let us have their renewal payments as promptly as possible, to the end that there may be no let up in the work of extending the circulation and increasing the usefulness of the paper so auspiciously begun.

The Southern Churchman is not a profit-making enterprise. It is conducted solely for the benefit of its subscribers and the work of the Church.

Keep the good work going.

Staff Work.

The Pulitzer Prize selection of Douglas Southall Freeman's "R. E. Lee" has given to many the opportunity to become interested in military tactics. "We do not need to be war advocates to feel the fascination of such a subject, and the thought comes to many that after subtracting the brutal from the military, as far as tactics are concerned, the whole battle of life is based upon fundamentally the same methods of observation and attack combined with retreat and strategy.

The great weakness in the War Between the States is revealed in what the modern calls "staff work." Lee had very poor staff work and the Northern armies were not much better. It was not a question of personnel, which was good as far as it went, but rather the inadequacy of a staff not large enough and without enough prestige to synchronize the movements of the armies. We could not imagine Foch without his staff and many a failure of genius-inspired plans can be attributed to this weakness.

In the church is this not also the great weakness? We have some of the best laid plans for our work both of a spiritual nature and in the material, but we lack the staff work necessary to carry them out. We suppose that originally it was the task of the National Council to be such a staff, but either through inadequate or insufficient personnel, the church never had as great a confidence in this staff as it should have had. Then also we have great contributions from great groups of people, but instead of being harmonized into a powerful attack with real strategy displayed, these groups often incur enmities with one another until the whole plan of campaign against the evil of the world appears to be but a series of uncoordinated and badly timed melees.

To us the Forward Movement adds the "staff work" that is so badly needed. It is comprehensive enough to represent all schools of thought. It is finding by observation the weaknesses of our own positions as well as those of the enemy. The Commission is composed of men who have won the confidence of their fellow officers, the clergy, as well as those of the privates in the ranks—the laity. They will be able to restore confidence where confidence has been lost. They will be able to present intelligent avenues of attack and they will be able to synchronize efforts of individuals and small groups.

Staff work means studious work. It means constructive discussion rather than detrimental debate. It means visualizing single individual efforts into great plans for cooperative effort. To us, under the Holy Spirit, has come the plan so needed in the Church as a whole, which will mean efficiency of administration and yet the preservation of the spiritual.

Samuel Babcock Booth.

In the death of Bishop Booth of Vermont, we have lost in the Church one who without great publicity, nevertheless had made a contribution which was sorely needed and which will go on inspiring many in the Church to greater and purer living.

Bishop Booth was avowedly an Anglo-Catholic, though he disliked party terms and party politics. He had sympathy with all schools of thought in the Church and his background of theological education at the Seminary in Virginia certainly was preserved in an Evangelical approach to problems. But he was one who in the best sense of the word was eclectic.

To Bishop Booth there was always the problem of teaching and training, but information must be based upon deep personal experience with Our Lord and Saviour. It was characteristic that he was always willing to lead men, even men of complete difference in opinion from himself, and he could surmount prejudice and teach, because he had what he demanded of others—a deep personal experience.

We have few—only too few—leaders in America who could be classified in that long Christian inheritance of saints who knew well the value of the meditative life. But Bishop Booth was one of this great company. He never pushed himself forward and never was the professional mystic, but by the quiet and practical consecration of his own life, he drew men more and more to him so that by the time of his death he was well established as the chief teacher of the value of prayer and meditation in our Church. It was only natural that he should have been chosen to write the text for the course prepared for the Forward Movement on "Prayer and Meditation for Clergy and Laity," and while that course was only half complete at the time of his death, it will be used for it is a masterpiece.

In a Church such as our own with so many different opinions and so many who seem to think that there is no harmony between such schools of thought, Bishop Booth was needed, for he showed that all had something of value and that the value of each type of mind must be sought and learned by the Christian

Church and World Problems as Others See Them

Our Need to Slow Up and Take a Look.

Richmond Christian Advocate.

We need right now in this Nation a little more of the horse and buggy psychology and a little less of the motorcycle racing mania. To slow up and take a look at how fast we were going, and where, may be well worth our while.

We all love our country, and are concerned more for its future than for the fortunes and misfortunes of politicians and parties. Its moral and spiritual welfare means more to us than our gold standard. Our drift has been too far away from the Eternal Verities of God and His moral law that made our fathers great. We need to give more attention to a return to the altar of prayer and the Code of Heaven than to the reign of the Blue Eagle, and the pronouncements of a Richberg. We ought to have inherited from our fathers a fiber and a force that will enable us to fall back on the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule, even if the Supreme Court rules out the gold standard and the New Deal.

We ought to learn that there are things no Government can do for us. The most of any sort of recovery we must do for ourselves. It will take old-fashioned honesty and pluck and push, coupled with faith and hope, to get us through, and all of us working on those lines can save the country without a Blue Eagle flying over us and a code dictator telling us how many onions we can plant in our gardens.

It is a good time for all of us—President, Brain Trust, Congress and the rest—to stop a little high flying, get off our toes a bit and get on our knees some more. We have tried too many substitutes for Fundamental Righteousness and dependence upon the God of our fathers.

Suggestions in Traffic Campaign.

Baptist Standard, Dalas, Texas.

In an effort to lower the rapidly mounting toll of traffic, police Tuesday announced preparation for one innovation and sumbmitted plans for another to Councilmen.

In a car equipped with a loud-speaker, a policeman soon will begin patroling streets and calling attention of motorists to errors and offenses in driving, it was announced by Captain B. B. Smith, head of the traffic division.

The proposed innovation is that police be provided with a few motion picture cameras so pictures may be made of drunken drivers for use in prosecution of cases against them. This suggestion was offered by C. G. Bechenbach, traffic engineer, after he found that in many of the serious accidents one or more of the drivers were under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The plan is said to have been successful in Utah and Michigan.—Dallas News, May 22, 1935.

Remarks: The moving pictures would be interesting. They ought to be taken by all means. Along with them should be pictures of the demolished cars, the doctors who wait on the wounded, the undertakers who bury the dead, the families bereaved of loved ones, those who sold the poison liquor and those who vote for legalizing the business.

Talk of the Week.

Church of England Newspaper, June 7, 1935.

"One With Whom He Had Been Familiar."

There were amusing exchanges at the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland between the Archbishop of Canterbury, who attended as a distinguished visitor, and his brother (the Rev. Dr. Marshall Lang), who is Moderator. The latter welcomed his Grace not only as "one with whom he had been familiar for many years," but as one representing the great sister Church of England.

Much laughter ensued, and also when the Archbishop expressed his satisfaction that the choice of a Moderator this year had fallen upon one "who belonged to a highly respectable family and who had maintained its tradition of respectability and fidelity more closely than an elder brother."

Race Course Service.

Derby Sunday brought the usual enormous crowd—this year estimated at 100,000—to see the course. In the evening a great service was held in the white ring of the paddock, and on this occasion the Bishop of Guildford officiated and preached to as mixed a congregation as he has probably ever experienced. At least 2,000 attended, and the singing was led by the Epsom Parish Church choir, while the Croydon Church Army band played. Since it is likely that many come to such a service who never go to any place of worship as a rule, who can tell the value of the witness of the Church on such an occasion?

Puck Outdone.

Sixpenny telegrams were revived last week amidst a spectacular blaze of publicity. Puck's "girdle round the earth in forty minutes" is a snail's pace compared with the ninety-five seconds taken by the wire sent round the world (34,825 miles) from the Postmaster-General to the Prince of Wales.

The Prince's speech was relayed to twenty-nine cities and towns, and wires from each of them and from about 500 Mayoresses of English towns and wives of Scottish Provosts reached him before the end of the ceremony at the Central Telegraph Office.

A New Version of Hell.

Richmond Christian Advocate, June 6, 1935.

We have no desire to stir up the waning scrap between the fundamentalists and the modernists. We rejoice that there is quiet on the battle front while the contenders seem now to be giving themselves to religious matters. But we cannot let it go by without giving some space to a new theory of Hell that has been advanced by a colored preacher down South.

As he was preaching recently in his own "unctious manner," and swaying his vast crowd with his powerful eloquence, he thus preached in better language than we can report it:

God made the world round like a ball. He put it on an axle with one end on the North Pole and one end on the South Pole and started it running like everything. To keep it greased and running smoothly, He filled the earth with oil for lubrication purposes. But white men, greedy for everything on the earth and in the regions, under the earth, bored holes in the earth and got to stealing the Lord's oil. If they keep on they will draw all the oil out of the earth. Then there will be no oil to grease the axle at the North Pole and the South Pole, and the thing will be running so fast "the whole shebang will be sot on fire, and that will be Hell shore nuff."

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

Some Loose Ends

In carefully reading over my article on the Thousandfold Prayer, in the issue dated June 15th, certain questions have arisen in my mind, which might also occur to others. That God's gift to us of His Son carried with it the gift of all things besides, is just what St. Paul assumes in Rom. 8:32. But there is this necessary qualification that there are many things that are lawful though not expedient for us as the children of God. Our Lord said:—"Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." In seeking the Kingdom of God and His righteousness the higher things of life will seem to be the one thing needful, and material blessings will necessarily sink into a subordinate place, such as will serve best to promote the higher ends of life. The body is the servant of the spirit, not its master.

The Law of Geometrical Progression.

Then a suggestion has been made that to keep on praying to be made a thousandfold more useful than ever before, if measured by the law of geometrical progression would carry us rapidly forward to a staggering amount of figures. I tried in the article above referred to, to explain that the term a thousandfold "must not be regarded as an exact mathematical figure, but as a symbol of greater possibilities of usefulness which lie open to us as instruments in the hands of God for the carrying out of His Will and Purpose." What wonderful uses God can make of us is known only to Him. But some light is thrown upon the matter in the wonderful ascription used by St. Paul, in Eph. 3:20-21. "Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think according to the power that worketh in us, unto Him be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen." Who can measure the "power that worketh in us"? For St. Paul refers to this same power in another place as working in him mightily.

A Turning Point in Human History.

We must remember also, that we are probably living in one of those great turning points of human history in which even a single human life may count for more than the lives of multitudes of others in a more stagnant age. It was said by some of our leading men soon after the close of the Great War, that the next twenty-five years would determine the course of civilization for generations and perhaps for centuries to come. It is certainly not the time to stand on one side and watch the course of events, as if we had no part in them. We may well pray that God will make full use of us in the working out of His Will and Purpose.

God's Opportunity.

It is this attitude of mind and soul which gives God His greatest opportunity for molding human affairs. I trust that the Order of the Thousandfold and its Prayer may be the means of increasing the power and usefulness of the children of God for the building up of His Kingdom, by inspiring them to draw by faith and prayer upon the infinite resources placed at our disposal by our Lord Jesus Christ. There is another inspiring thought which must also be borne in mind that the good which we do enters into the stream of time and is carried onward, multiplying itself as it forms part of the general trend towards the final goal, when God shall be all in all.

A Personal Experience.

As to my own personal experience in the matter, I may say that early in 1917 the Thousandfold idea took form in my mind, and I began praying earnestly for a great increase in my usefulness. This was brought about by the feeling that after the Great War was over, there would be a wonderful opportunity for the Church to build up a new and better order of things. It seemed to me that one ought to prepare one's self to take part, in however humble a way, in bringing about the change so sorely needed. As the years have passed, I have been conscious of a growing realization of the wonderful possibilities which lie before us as followers of Christ. I cannot believe for a moment that God is in any way satisfied with the present condition of the world, nor can I believe that He will hold back any guidance and help needed to bring about a better state of things. What is urgently needed is more faith in God and more courage to attempt great things for Him. It is doing honor to Him to expect that He will do His part, which is infinitely greater than our own, inasmuch as He has infinite resources to draw upon.

God's Mighty Works.

The Word of God is full of great and mighty invitations to His people to trust in Him, and to believe that He will do marvelous works on their behalf. If we could only feel as St. Paul did when he wrote:—"He that spared not His own Son but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" Then we should be as ready as he to make great ventures for the Kingdom of God. At the present time the vision of the greater possibilities of the Christian life seem to be clearer to me than ever before, and I feel that it is my duty to speak out boldly what I think, and to encourage others to believe that we are on the eve of a great awakening, when the New Day will dawn upon us and Christianity will rule the world.

"The Works That I Do Shall Ye Do Also."

What is there I can do
To prove that I am true
And faithful to my Lord
According to His Word?

I can at least believe,
He would not me deceive
By promising great things
Which life so seldom brings.

His promise must be true
That He can great things do
Through me, if I believe
And thus His power receive.

And so I go my way,
And each day humbly pray
That what He said He'd do
May in my life come true.

Self-Support in Missionary Districts

By ROBERT A. MAGILL,

Rector of St. John's Church, Lynchburg, Virginia.

THERE ARE a great many misunderstandings current in the churches today concerning the missionary enterprise. This misunderstanding is the result of a good many factors, perhaps even the series of investigations of missions carried on over the past few years put over-emphasis on certain factors and caused misapprehensions. It is probably true, however, that the greatest difficulty is pure and unadulterated ignorance and nowhere is this more evident than in the lack of appreciation at home of what the mission fields are doing for themselves.

People seem to be startled when told of the extent to which native ministries have been developed and of the increasing number of native bishops being consecrated for work in their own lands. People seem also somewhat amazed when made aware of the progress in self-government made in the Synods and Conventions of foreign missionary districts and are surprised to learn of the activity with which the Christians in missionary districts are pushing new missionary projects financed by themselves. Most of all, perhaps, is the surprise occasioned by the great trides toward self-support which are being achieved.

This question of self-support is an exceedingly vital one from several angles, for in the first place, we have always regarded it as an index of the success of missions and as an indication that the work of the Church was taking full root in the native life of the races ministered to. I believe we rightly regard it as a gauge of the amount of genuine interest on the part of the people to whom our missions are sent—in other words, it helps answer the question, "Do they regard it as a movement of sufficient value, providing institutions worthy of their own sacrificial support?"

For some reason not very much publicity has been given to the fact available concerning this matter of self-support. In 1934 the Treasurer of the American Church Mission in the Missionary District of Shanghai drew up a table comparing the amounts sent from the National Council with the amount raised on the field for the year 1933. These figures were given just a casual circulation but proved to be a startling revelation to most of the people into whose hands they chanced to come. So the Treasurer of the District of Shanghai, Mr. M. P. Walker, was asked to prepare a similar table of comparison for the year 1934, and that has just now come to hand and is published herewith.

The Table speaks forcibly for itself, but perhaps a word ought to be said in explanation of some of the figures listed in this comparison:

> In the first place, it is likely a question will be raised by someone stating that the comparison of the Chinese dollar with the American dollar is not accurate. That is a fact. The exchange rate at the time of this writing being 2.89—but there is no means, with a daily fluctuating rate of exchange, of making an exact comparison. At the same time, it is also true that the relative value of the Chinese dollar to the Chinese people is far in advance of the relative value of the American dollar to the American people and when that is realized and taken into consideration, it makes even more eloquent the comparison as listed in the table.

> For purposes of clarity, the list arranges the related appropriations according to the types of work, the first three items representing the medical work, the next two items, the work of higher education; items 6 to 8 represent secondary education for boys, while 9 and 10 represent secondary education for girls, and the other items are self-explanatory. However, it ought to be noted that the self-supporting parishes of the Church in the District of Shanghair, of which there are five in the City of Shanghai, are not represented in this tabulation at all, because they receive no appropriations from home and are supported solely by their own efforts and their affairs are entirely independent of the Mission Treasurer's office.

The first great step of the Forward Movement must be a call to the people of the Church back to the Bible and their Prayer Books.

The first need on the part of the people of the Church is a fuller and more real conversion to Christ. The second is more, and a more believing, reading of the Bible itself and with it the Prayer Book, the handbook of the Church.—Bishop Manning.

Hoboes, Transients or Human Beings

By RANDOLPH F. BLACKFORD,

Rector, St. James' Church, Leesburg, Florida.

PEOPLE ARE VERY APT to think that transiency is something that has started since the depression. Yet, if we remember that it is simply people traveling without funds to buy supplies, we remember that Babylonia and Egypt were first settled by them. Moses led a group of transients and gave them laws at Sinai. All who came to America and conquered the wilderness were, with very few exceptions, transients. But today there is practically no more wilderness worth conquering, so that we fear that without jobs, and there are practically no jobs, transients are a menace.

For a long time people have been saying, "Why don't we do something about it?" And in recent times there have been three methods of dealing with it.

The first way is to enforce the vagrancy laws and drive out the transient from the community. Let us hope that this method is entirely a thing of the past, for it did not solve the problem; it avoided it.

The second method was what may be called the "back to place of residence" way. It said we should try to find where the transient came from originally and send him there. But this did not work. A man leaves home for a reason, home trouble, economic pressure, or adventure, and until that reason is satisfied he will not stay home, but will leave again. As a system let us hope that it, too, is a thing of the past.

The third method we believe to be the correct one. It says the transient is a Federal charge. The first method considered only the local community and it failed. The second method considered the local community and the transient. It failed. The third considers both and society, and trying to treat causes attempts to turn the transient from a liability into an asset.

So in 1933 the Federal Government entered the picture by setting up the Transient Division of the FERA. The general method today is this: In every State there are Transient Treatment Centers. A person applies to one of these and is classified as "local homeless" or "transient." If a local homeless he is cared for according to old line case work methods with accent on work relief. If he is a transient he is given a night's lodging and three meals and then directed to a Bureau.

Arrived at a Bureau (there are six in Florida), he is classified: unattached woman, family, boy, or unattached man. The first two groups are cared for in Shelters in the Bureau city and given work relief. The other two are sent to camps. Work relief in each case is recompensed by food, clothes, lodging, and a small cash allowance. This starts at one dollar a week. For it the transient works thirty hours a week.

There is one type of transient that excludes himself automatically from the camps. It is the professional hobo who prefers begging to working. Of those who do go to camp careful checkups have shown that there are approximately the same proportion in them as in a like-size community in civil life, of professional men, college graduates, mechanics, unskilled labor, and of men with criminal records.

WHAT CAN our communities do to aid in the objective of getting the transient back to where he should be in society, and that means how can the Church direct their communities to this end? There are three parts to this.

The first is the preventive. Several years ago a young transient stated that in his high school practically every boy had spent several months hitchhiking for the adventure of the thing. We can combat this urge by pointing out the adventures to be had at home. This can be done by speaking with admiration both in public and private of the big men in our home town. Banker, lawyer, merchant chief, minister, teacher, all have interesting and exciting experiences that may attract hero worship away from the gangster and the "lure of the road." Another method is to make sure that our local recreational program is so interesting that they will not want to miss any of it.

The second item of our program deals with therapeutic measures when the transient has "hit the road." It aims to get him to the camps and has two don'ts and two do's.

The don'ts come first.

The first is: Don't give handouts. If we do this, we encourage begging and we and our neighbors may be indicated by secret signs as easy marks. Beggars and lawlessness will thus probably increase.

The second don't is: Don't give rides to hitchhikers, unless you know them. If we do give rides we may be aiding men to run away from responsibility, or we may be aiding a criminal to escape who will respond by taking our car and our life.

And the do's.

Take time to talk to transients on the subject of good citizenship. Some years ago a young clergyman thus engaged an I. W. W. in conversation. Later the transient took his friend to the "jungle" where his companions were spending the night under a culvert. There a heated argument took place as to whether a man could really be a Christian in this modern age. The clergyman, of course, held that it was the only real road to happiness and was eminently practical. Some months later he received a letter from the I. W. W. enclosing his picture and saying, "I want you to know your words that night persuaded me to return to my wife and family. I want to thank you as we are all now very happy."

The other do is: Direct people in need to the regular welfare agencies or to the Bureaus. If we will familiarize ourselves with these we can often put people on the road to the solution of their problems.

Thirdly, what can we do for the transient after he reaches the camp. This problem has four aspects: relations with camp officials, men in camp, men after they leave camp, and the special contribution the Church can bring.

Relations with camp officials come first. Though we are apt to think that the camp staff are well cared for in every respect, they are under a great strain and will appreciate ordinary social contacts and also the chance to give a little publicity to their work through opportunities to speak at civic clubs, and the like. Also their real work is a character-building project that will greatly interest any of our Church organizations. Whatever is to be done for those under their charge should have their full cooperation in order to avoid conflicts in dates and other misunderstandings.

The second section of what we can do deals with the men in camp. When visiting in camp we should take time to be human with the transient himself. But in this contact we should keep three don'ts in mind that may be summarized as follows: Don't Shun, Don't Go Too Far, and Don't Patronize. Each of these needs a little further explanation.

By Don't Shun we mean that the civilian is only too apt to feel that a person who has "gone on the road" has forfeited consideration; the trouble is that the transient is apt to agree with him and consider that he has not only forfeited the respect of the community, but his own self-respect as well. If this is the case, most of the inhibitions of society are apt to have gone with his self-respect. The consequence of this is that he is "fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils."

DON'T GO TOO FAR. In other words we must beware of going to the other extreme and of letting our sympathies run away with us. For we can become so interested in the abnormal that the normal fails to claim our attention. If this takes place we become so absorbed in the present condition of our client that we fail to direct him to what his condition should be, namely, that of a self-respecting, self-supporting, responsible member of society.

The third don't is perhaps the most important of all: Don't patronize. For patronizing will kill any possible good that we might do quicker than any other known method. If there is one thing an American objects to, it is patronage. The result of our thus offending will be that he will avoid everything connected with us.

So much for the attitude of those visiting the camps. The question now arises as to how our community in some concrete way may show its corporate interest in the transients in camp. This can probably best be done by groups going out and putting on shows in the camps, vaudeville, minstrels, or something varied, so as to appeal to the whole group. Laughter is a wonderful cure for the blues, and men in camp need it. Then, too, bringing the transients into athletic competition with the local communities has been tried with happy results in some places. Books, magazines, and cigarettes are effective, not only because the men have no funds with which to buy, but for the thought shown.

There is also the possibility of selecting some of them to invite into our homes. This must be done most carefully as there is great danger in it. Remember that in the camps there are criminals just as there are in our own communities, and they are probably in about the same ratio. Nevertheless, if we can trust ourselves to read character, so that we can pick our man, and select a few to be guests in our homes, it will not only be one of the greatest compliments we can pay them, but it may also be the little extra bit of help that may put them on their feet. It will give them the incentive to merit our trust and belief. We must also remember that many undesirable homes are always open to them, so that we may speak of our Church connections in inviting them.

But what of the man when he leaves the camp? The criticism is often made that these men are not being absorbed back into business, and that no effort is being made to get them jobs. Several things need to be kept in mind.

One is that the local people who are in need of work and have not gone on the road must be cared for first, otherwise local people on relief will leave home and make for the camps, and our problem will become aggravated. So we must give the preference to people who have decided to "take it on the chin," rather than run away from the hard times in their own communities.

Nevertheless, the man who has been on the road and who determines that he will come back and settle down in his old home must not be made to feel a stigma for having sought better times elsewhere to the extent of being deprived of a job he is capable of handling. And, not only this, but when a man moves into our community to settle there from one of the camps we can at least give him an even break as far as jobs are concerned.

We can all probably remember cases of people who have come out of nowhere and made good in our communities in the past, and what has happened can happen again. Then, too, we must honor the man in the camps; he is certainly working for everything he gets and working hard.

Although no publicity is given to it, when we learn that quite a few jobs are being found for men who are in the camps, we cannot but rejoice. They have earned the promotion. But there is one more warning here. We must not let their willingness to work undermine the wage scale. If we do, we are only fostering trouble for the future. And it should come. For, as the Master said, "The laborer is worthy of his hire."

WE HAVE NOW COME to what seems to us to be the most important phase of the subject—the special contribution of the religious forces of the community. Some may doubt that there is a special contribution that the Churches can make. But a little thought will demonstrate that there is one and that it is difficult to over-estimate its importance.

What is the trouble with most of the transients? Is it not that they have lost their grip on things, and have gone out into the world to find it? In a very practical sense they are lost in a most material world. They need something to guide them if they are to find their way back to stability. They are starving for something that they have difficulty in defining even to themselves. This need of theirs we believe can be filled by the religious anchor and motive being brought into their lives. They need to know that the penalty for breaking and the reward for keeping a moral law, such as honesty, is just as inevitable as is the penalty for breaking, and the reward for keeping, a physical law such as gravitation. They also need to know that God and God's Church care for them just as much and as well as they care for themselves.

So the question sifts down to how can we get them this belief and this certainty. To this end we would suggest three things:

First, we must do our best to reach the key men, the officials, directors, staff, and foremen. They are the men to whom the men in camp naturally look for leadership. Their influence is most important. Most of them have received the benefits of religious training and have benefited by it without realizing how much they owe to it. We should thus point out to them how much they can help their clients by supporting a religious program with their example.

Secondly, the Churches of the communities near the camps should send representatives to the camps to invite the transients to their services. They should also be certain that when the invitation is accepted a hearty welcome is waiting for them. In this way the men will be able to have religious opportunities, and to feel that they have friends in town to whom they came come in their difficulties. But they will not be repelled by feeling that religion is being forced down their throats.

The third thing is tersely put in the verse:

> The Gospel to which men will listen
> Is the Gospel according to you.

Unless men see that people who are in the Churches really get something helpful from it, who can blame them for not wanting any of it. Church members are either walking advertisements for their religion, or else they are what used to be called "horrible examples of its effects." We must have a lot of the right kind of religion before we can count on other people wanting any of it.

This right kind of religion, if it really gets into a man, will be something that, because it is in him and a part of him and not superimposed on him from outside, will furnish the greatest incentive and motive power that can be imagined towards our objective—that the tranisent once more should be a self-respecting, self-supporting, responsible member of society.

Saint Peter's Day

(June 29.)

By WILLIAM E. CALLENDER.
Chaplain, U. S. Public Health Service.

THERE IS so much of historical interest in the life of Saint Peter that it is a difficult task to write only about those events which will be of primary interest to the reader, yet being instructive at the same time. The name of Saint Peter is found in two forms, the one "Symeon" and the other "Kephas", as is also found in the Graecizied form of "Kepha" (Aramaic). Although Bethsaida was probably the birthplace of Saint Peter, it appears, if we turn to the Gospel of Saint Mark 1:29, that he and his brother Andrew had a home together at Capernaum. It was to this house at Capernaum that Jesus went, as to a home (Sts. Matthew 8; Mark 1; Luke 4). Saint Peter was undoubtedly married, the Scripture speaking of "Peter's wife's mother." According to an ancient writer, the wife of Saint Peter was the daughter of Aristobulus, brother of Saint Barnabas. Saint Clement of Alexandria relates that upon seeing the wife of Saint Peter going to martyrdom, he, calling her by name, "Bade her to be mindful of the Lord." Tradition states, as do also some of the early fathers, that Saint Peter had two children, one of whom is commemorated on May 31 in the Roman Catholic Church under the name of St. Petronelle; she is also commemorated in France under the name of St. Petronella. After the call of Saint Peter to be with other "Fishers of men", he is said to have gone to Antioch and there to have planted the Christian faith. In the English Church a festival was anciently observed, which was entitled, "The Chair of Saint Peter," and I understand that this commemoration is still observed in the Roman Catholic Church on February 22, in commemoration of the Apostle's primacy over the Church at Antioch. From the time of his call Saint Peter has a place in the most important events of the Gospel narrative. Saint Peter with his two former partners (Sts. James and John) formed an Apostolic Triumvirate and to whom, with Saint Andrew, the great prophecy of the last days was given by our Lord (Mark 3:3-13). The most important incident which is recorded of him between his call and crucifixion is that which happened at Cesarea Philippi (Matthew 16; Mark 8; Luke 9). There can be no doubt that Saint Peter was the foremost amongst the disciples, this primacy being because of the force of character which was his. He gave the answers to the question of Jesus, "Thou art the Christ"; "To whom shall we go?" "Thou hast the words of eternal life." He stood out amongst the disciples as a "Special Preacher". He was the only disciple to whom after the resurrection our Lord sent a special messenger and message. The collect for today is from the Sarum Missal, 1549. The observance of this day is traceable back to the fourth century. It is of interest to note the use in both the old and the new collects of the word "Pastor"; this provides an opportunity for remembrance in prayer of ministries which are not technically episcopal, an opportunity rare in the Book of Common Prayer from the absence of its need prior to 1549, and an absence of realization of the need in 1662.

The collect for today has been adapted for use in the Office of the Consecration of Bishops. It will be well to compare the words in the Sarum Collect, "To follow in all things the teaching of those by whom it took the beginning of religion," and the words which we today use, "Make, we beseech Thee, all Bishops and Pastors to preach Thy Holy Word," not the words of men but the words of God. To Saint Peter were given many and wonderful gifts, and these gifts were to be used to "feed the flock entrusted to his care." The same command is given to Bishops and Pastors of today. What are the people doing? What have they to follow? Is the teaching of today in so many pulpits of such a nature that the hearers will have something definite to follow? Is it not true that there are too many "ifs and ands" which do not compel a wholehearted following of the Christ? Today it is well to call to mind the words of old, "I preach Christ and Him crucified." Such preaching will compel wholehearted service and sincere worship.

I omitted to state that there are approximately in England 830 churches dedicated in the honor of Saint Peter; 230 churches dedicated conjointly with Saint Paul; 10 churches dedicated in conjunction with other Saints.

Reverend Kenneth Mackenzie, Doctor of Divinity

The Reverend Kenneth Mackenzie, rector-emeritus of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Westport, Conn., having accepted the invitation of the Trustees of Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, to attend the Commencement on Monday, June 10, was on that occasion made the recipient of the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

The following record in the files of the College, discloses the ground for the unanimous decision of the Faculty and Board of Trustees, in recommending and authorizing the conferment of the degree on Dr. Mackenzie:

"Fifty-five years in the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church; serving for eight years as curate to the three only rectors of the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York City, the largest single parish in the metropolis. This was followed by three years as rector of St. Thomas' Church, New Windsor, N. Y., and his coming to the Church of the Holy Trinity, Westport, Conn., on June 1, 1891. Continuing in that parish until June 1, 1926, he rounded out a ministry of thirty-five years. His withdrawing from parochial responsibilities was motivated by the desire to give himself more freely to the increasingly frequent demands for his services beyond the confines of his parish.

"His interests in the town in which he has spent more than half of his life, have been varied and numerous. He has for twelve years been chairman of the Westport Chapter of the American Red Cross. For fourteen years, he has been chairman of the Westport Chapter of the Norwalk Home for the Aged. For thirty-five years, he ministered to the inmates of the Westport Sanitarium. The Westport Rotary Club has claimed him as an honorary member for eleven years; and since its organization, he has been an active member of the Westport Chamber of Commerce and for three years he was president of the Saugatuck Historical Society.

"Beyond the pale of Westport, his relations have been widely distributed. For twenty-three years he

Assurance

By JAMES E. FREEMAN, D. D.,
Bishop of Washington.

Bishop Freeman.

WE are so constituted that we demand at all times and in every experience of life, assurance that what we undertake will issue in measurable success. We hesitate to embark on a new venture without feeling within ourselves confidence, not only as to our own capacity to attain our ends, but of the goodwill and support of those we respect and trust. We may love our independence and our right to determine our course, nevertheless we are stabilized and strengthened when we have the assurance of those whose opinions we respect and readily follow. To have our own judgment underwritten has sustaining value. A right self-appraisal is urgent, if not indispensable, and it is the chief governing factor in great decisions; it is immeasurably strengthened when it receives endorsement and confirmation from those who are most competent to judge it.

As we survey the road we have followed and review the successes or failures we have experienced, we trace many of the results to the judgments of those in whom we reposed confidence. "Badly advised," might be written across many records; "well advised," across others. Behind and beyond all that we receive of human help, whether expressed in creeds or formal religious profession, the average of us has a secret, possibly undefined feeling that there is a "Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we will." Repeatedly, in contacts with those whose lives bore no evidence of deep, religious feeling, we have seen them in a crisis blaming God for their mistakes or their misfortunes. The inconsistencies of men are never more evident than when in an hour of supreme testing they inveigh against one whom they have never acknowledged or reverently worshipped. During the great war the men going into action spoke of their security or insecurity in terms of an invisible and supreme power who determined their fate.

It is a comforting feeling to believe that behind the plan of our life resides a power, not of ourselves, that regulates and determines our course. There is a story in the Old Testament that strikingly illustrates this. Two brothers, Jacob and Esau by name, had parted company as the result of jealousy and rivalry. Jacob had, under compulsion, set out for an unknown destiny. Confused and uncertain he paused in his journey to rest and take counsel of his hopes and expectations. In this hour of his uncertainty and doubt he had recourse to prayer, a practice not uncommon to men the world over. At this critical juncture he had a dream in which he heard a voice speaking to him, saying: "Behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and I will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee." Rising from his sleep he declared: "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." Refreshed and renewed by his strange experience, he went on his way, confident that out of all the mishaps of his journey he would ultimately recover that which he had lost. His subsequent life confirmed his belief.

There is nothing so reassuring as a sustained belief of this kind. All of us at times, find ourselves hindered and confused by the strange happenings of life. We find it difficult to reconcile or reason about them, frequently we are so stunned by the interruptions we experience in attaining our desired ends, that we cry out in rebellion against our fate and place the blame for our misfortune upon the God whose will we have disregarded and whose presence in our lives we have failed to recognize.

Jacob's career was by no means without disclosed weaknesses and at times moral dereliction, but he adhered to the promise made him in the hour of his need and believed that, out of all the vicissitudes of his checkered life he would eventually have his hopes and expectations fulfilled. Each one of us has the choice to make between a self-directed course, sustained only by erring human judgment, or a God-directed course with the assurance and confidence which come from an attempt to adjust life to His will, as we are able to understand it. Francis Thompson, the English poet, who wrote the remarkable poem, "Hound of Heaven," came at length after a life that had been marked by tragic misfortune, to recognize the One of whom he wrote:

"I fled Him, down the nights and down the days,
I fled Him down the arches of the years," and to recognize His prevailing presence in his life and to give himself without reserve to what he conceived to be God's plan for his course.

For twenty-four years, he conducted a weekly Bible class in Bridgeport. Also, while thus ministering to interested Christian people in this line of study, he contributed a weekly exposition of the International Sunday School Lesson in the then existing Bridgeport Standard. He now maintains two weekly Bible study classes in Norwalk, Conn., and as well, conducts a weekly devotional service with the workers of the Good Will Industries. He is constantly sought as speaker at Bible conferences and other gatherings, evangelical, expository and missionary. And he is always welcomed to chancels and pulpits of his own communion.

For many years Dr. Mackenzie has been a reviewer of books for the Southern Churchman.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

The Boarding School at Anvik Closes.

For want of funds, owing to cuts in appropriations for work in Alaska, the school for Indian boys and girls of the Lower Yukon, Christ Church Mission, the first boarding school of our Church to be established in Alaska, is to be closed during the coming summer, after nearly fifty years of service—1887-1935.

In April of the year 1887, when the trails were hard and smooth for sled travel, a party of Anvik natives went over to the coast, to St. Michael, to trade. There they found a clergyman of our Church, the Rev. Octavius Parker, who had been there for a year already. When they heard that he had come into the country to found a mission, they approached him and asked him to go to Anvik and settle there. He returned with them, and found the location and prospects favorable. Their village was situated upon the point of land made by the joining of the Anvik with the Yukon River. The people, about 200 of them, were friendly, and the white trader was willing to sell his group of log buildings, cabin, store-house and caches, all in good repair and suitable for that climate. Mr. Parker bought the property and returned over the trail to St. Michael. When Mr. Chapman landed there in July, they talked over the situation, and agreed that it would be best to join forces, and after buying a large boat, and supplies, they went to Anvik. Long after, the willingness of the trader to sell his buildings to the missionaries, was explained.

Lieutenant Schwatka, floating down the Yukon on a tour of reconnaisance of the Territory, in the early eighties, came to the village of Anvik, and there found the natives in a state of great excitement. He writes:*

"Mr. Frederickson, the trader, warmly welcomed my arrival, having had recently some serious trouble with the Indians, who were not yet even quieted. A number of Shagelooks had come down to the river a short time before, to meet the Greek priest from the mission at Ikogmute, who was to come to Anvik to baptise them. While the Shagelooks were waiting to baptise priest, they arranged a plot to rob the trader. Some one or two of them were to provoke him in some exasperating way, and if he showed any resistance, or even annoyance, the others were to side with their fellows, seize the trader and secure him until his store was plundered and the booty removed, when he was to be liberated, or murdered, if aggressive.

"In some way the Anviks got an inkling of the plot, and prepared to side with Mr. Frederickson. When the preliminaries commenced, with the cutting open of one of the trader's finest skin boats, the plotters found themselves confronted with such a determined band of well-armed Anvik Indians, that they were well satisfied to let the matter drop.

"The christening was carried out according to program, but the baffled Shagelooks vowed vengeance on both the Anviks and the trader at some future time."

In September, then, in the year 1887, mission work was begun at Anvik. Religious services were held, and day school opened. The sessions were held in the one large room of the dwelling house; but in the spring of 1888, Mr. Chapman wrote:

"We are overrun with children and Indians all day long, and, although they respect our rooms, the house is too small and everything too crowded. We need another building."

Then follows the account of the selection of another site for the mission, nearer the village; the powwow with the Indians, and their agreement with the missionaries that they should hold title to the land, and never be disturbed by unwanted settlers there; and finally the exchange of goods for the land, and a feast. Then the details of the building began:

"I was thankful to see that the people have begun to put a good value on our work for the children, and since then our school has been crowded."

May 22, 1888: "Some of the men have been bringing in fine logs for the building. We are greatly delighted with the industry of some of them. Three or four have been at work for two weeks, and they do excellently, beginning at seven in the morning, and stopping work at six. All are heads of families and they seem anxious to provide for them. We plan the work, and they carry it out faithfully, cheerfully and intelligently."

By the fall of that year, the new building was ready, the other buildings brought from the old site and put up, and school work began in earnest. Waifs and orphan boys were taken into the family.

Mr. Chapman wrote: "My salary is sufficient ($750!) but Mr. Parker, being a married man, receives $1,000."

For five years this work went on, until Mr. Chapman was recalled for his furlough. When he returned to Anvik in the next year, with him went Sister Bertha, to teach, and to begin work for the girls, as had been done for the boys. More logs were brought, and another building put up for her, into which she gathered orphan and needy girls. They were provided for, and clothed, by the gifts of our faithful friends of the Auxiliary Branches.

Those pupils of the former years, have gone out into homes of their own, in Alaska, others to Montana, to Florida, to New York State, having learned Christian principles to fortify them, we trust, to their life's end.

That warlike generation of "Shagelooks" has passed on, and their descendants are now adherents of the mission, by their own choice.

The order to close the school seems to come at the time when it has arrived at its greatest efficiency. The fine large house, built largely by funds provided by the Newark Auxiliary, furnished and occupied only two years, is adequate in every respect for housing the women of the staff, and the thirty or more girls and young children. To see this building, for which we have waited many years, closed, just as it had begun to fulfil the purpose for which it was designed, only for want of funds, has the appearance of tragedy.

We can but pray, and look hopefully forward to the time when it may be re-opened.

The essential, the evangelistic work of the mission will go on. The Rev. Henry H. Chapman, with his wife, will remain in charge, possibly with the help of one other worker.

(Mrs. John W.) M. S. Chapman.

disciple if he would truly be the follower of Christ. And then he showed in his earlier ministry and as a bishop that practically such lives as his of deep devotion found the guidance that carried them on to practical church administration.

We think too often of our great leaders as the men whose names are found in the newspapers. But in reality it is the men like Bishop Booth who in quieter but stronger ways demonstrate the Faith that is kept and the race that is run and the fight that truly conquers.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

THE PRAYER BOOK FAMILY.

(Seven chairs are placed in a semi-circle. The first is empty but has a placard on it with the word, "Common" in large letters on it. In the other chairs people are seated each of whom has about his neck a placard with name of part of Prayer Book on it as follows: "First Part, Prayer Book"; "Second Part, The Sacraments"; "Third Part, Other Rites and Ceremonies"; "Fourth Part, The Psalter"; "Fifth Part, The Ordinal," and "Sixth Part, Appendix.")

Prayer Book: Here we are, all the members of the Prayer Book Family. I suppose that as the oldest I should preside.

Sacraments: Oh, no, Sister Prayer Book, you are but a child beside me. Why do you think that you are older than I?

Prayer Book: Of course I was not always the exact size I am now. Once I was much smaller. Then later I grew very large. For I had but a few prayers in me many years ago, but they added to me until people were having seven and more services every day. That was in the Middle Ages. For my purpose is to teach men to come to God, and to show them how to approach Him. Then came what men called the Reformation. At that time I had a great many of my services made much shorter. Some were done away with altogether, until I now have in me only Morning and Evening Prayer, the Litany, and a few special Prayers and Thanksgiving. But men have always prayed to God out of a book, so who in the Prayer Book Family can claim to be older than I?

Sacraments: No, Sister Prayer Book. All that you say is true. There were Jewish Prayer Books, but you are a Christian Prayer Book, and men made you after the Church was founded. But Christ Himself started me on my career. For He and His followers baptized, and Jesus Himself celebrated the first Holy Communion on the night in which He was betrayed, and commanded men to "Do this in Remembrance of Me." So I am older than you. I, too, was at one time small, and grew until many books were used whenever men wished to have a service of the Holy Communion. Then came the Reformation when they cut me down a great deal, too. So that I am rather short now, in spite of my age.

Psalter: Sisters Prayer Book and Sacraments, you two are mere children. You make me laugh, speaking of your age. Do you not know that though I am in your family that I am that very Prayer Book of the Jews of which Sacraments just spoke. Whereas you two started with the Christian Church. I was old then. Moses and David sang my Psalms. You speak of having been made smaller at the time of the Reformation. That happened to me before the time of Christ.

Ordinal: Yes, Psalter, you are right. You are really old, while the rest of us are very young. But you are in a class by yourself. Prayer Book with Morning and Evening Prayer are old. But Sacraments are older, and I am next to Sacraments. Do you not remember that the first chapter of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles tells how the Apostles laid hands on Matthias and he received the Holy Ghost. That was where I was born. For I tell people how to ordain men to the Sacred Ministry. Whether Bishop, Priest or Deacon, I have the service by which they are made. No one but a Bishop may use me, and that, by the way, is where I get my name. For a Bishop used to be called the "Ordinary," so that as the book the Ordinary uses I am called the Ordinal. Ordinary means, of course, the Man who Ordains. But I have two other services also, the Institution of a clergyman in a parish and the Consecration of a Church. But I am really very glad to be one of your family. For since I have been bound together with you all, men may read and see exactly what are the things which a man promises to do when he is ordained, whether as Bishop, Priest, or Deacon.

Other Rites: It looks as if I am the only one who is willing to acknowledge that I am really young. For whereas most of you are centuries, nay, thousands of years old, I am comparatively young. Most of my services are very new indeed. But, when I come to think of it, the Marriage Service is very old and so is the Burial Service. Yet, the Marriage Service is ever new to people getting married, and is really up to date, and the Burial Service takes its whole spirit from the Resurrection of Christ. Indeed, its first words are: "I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord." So it has practically nothing in common with the old heathen idea of death as the end of all things. Really you see I rather pride myself on my youth. My other services are much younger. And they, the Office of Instruction, Thanksgiving, and Visitation of the Sick, show that I am just a little fireside companion to be with the Churchman. I have even stolen the Confirmation Service from the Ordinal just to be sure that people will often read it over. But though I am rather unassuming myself I am very glad I am in the Prayer Book Family and so close to the Sacraments.

Appendix: You are all very old, and I am very new. But you must not forget me. For I am your junk room, in which you put all the things you do not want. But I must be of some use, or General Convention would not let me stay in the family.

Prayer Book: I am afraid, Appendix, that you have gotten your feelings hurt by what some people have said about certain of your parts. Our junk room is really in the Introduction where we have put all sorts of tables, like the way to find Easter, and the list of the lessons to be read in Church on the various days of the year. You, as the Appendix, are really most important. Some people wanted to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles of Belief, that show how we stood three hundred years ago. But they are most valuable and should be there for reference.

Other Rites: Nor must you forget that a part of my rites have been put in you, for Family Prayer is one of my most important services. It was put in the Appendix so that it could be more easily found. And that nothing uncomplimentary was meant by so placing it; many new prayers have been attached to it, like that beautiful one, "For Those We Love," and "For the Spirit of Prayer."

Appendix: Thank you both. There is a question that I would like to ask some of you. It is this: I have Family Prayer. You say that it is not meant to be thrown away. It is marked Morning and Evening Prayer. But in the Prayer Book proper there is also a service marked Morning and Evening Prayer. Why have two sets of Services, both for Morning and Evening Prayer?

Prayer Book: Family Prayer is just for two or three to meet together with God, just before we go to bed, or just before or just after breakfast, with no one but the immediate family and God there. But in the daily offices of Morning and Evening Prayer, it is as if we were giving a reception to God. Indeed, some years ago a small boy on coming to one of these services, said: "Episcopalians must love God a lot; they do such a lot for Him." So, in the daily offices we try to show our love. First, we hear an invitation from God's Holy Bible, showing that He wants us to come and be with Him. Next, we must prepare our hearts. So we kneel and confess that we are sorry for all that we have done that is wrong. Then God's Priest assures us that God does forgive us when we truly repent. Then we speak to God to praise Him in the Psalter. Then we listen to Him in the lessons from the Old and New Testaments, which the Minister reads. Then we sing our thanks to Him. Having heard God speak, we assure Him that we understand His Love, by saying the Creed. Then we talk to Him in the Prayers. Then God speaks to us again through the sermon that He was given to the Preacher to tell us. So, we respond by showing God our love by presenting our offering. Then we have more prayers and the Service is closed. In order to remind ourselves of whom it is that we are approaching, we dress in vestments, or special garments for these services, which we do not do in the less formal ones of Family Prayer.

Appendix: I see, but it looks as if you had done everything possible for God in the Daily Offices. I thought that the main service of the Church was the Sacrament of the Holy Communion. Is this right?

Sacraments: You are right, but there is this difference. In the Daily Offices of Morning and Evening Prayer, we do things for God. In the Sacraments God does things for us. Let us take Baptism, for example. For many people do not understand it. Some think that it is just joining something. But it is much more. Some time ago a great English soldier was knighted by the King. Do you suppose that he considered for a great while whether he wanted to join the Knights of England? It was a great honor; of course, he wanted it, and will do all he can to deserve it. So Baptism is a great honor and privilege that God gives to us to become a member of His family, the Church. Of course, we should accept it and do all in our power to show God that we appreciate it. And if we have any friends we should go and bring them, that they, too, may share in God's goodness.

Appendix: I see, and is the Holy Communion something like that also?

Sacraments: It is, only it is more so.

For a person can only be baptized once, and he can come to the Holy Communion, and should do so many times. Indeed, he should do so regularly all his life. You see, it is like a meal. For when Jesus took bread and brake it and gave it to His disciples and likewise with the wine, He was having a way shown by which we can come and sup with God. So, the Holy Communion is God having us come to eat and drink with Him. He is doing something for us, some especial something that we cannot ever deserve, but that should fill us so with gratitude that we say: "We here present ourselves, our souls and bodies to Him." And when we commune we feel that we are so much closer to Him than at any other time.

Appendix: That is wonderful, isn't it? We have, indeed, a great Prayer Book Family, that can have such services as Baptism and the Holy Communion in it. But there is something else that I would like to ask. I see there beside you, "Sister Prayer Book," a vacant chair marked simply "Common." For whom is that reserved?

Ordinal: That is for the People of the Congregation. For no service is complete in this Episcopal Church of ours without the full and hearty responses of the people. The Prayer Book Family is a Common Family. That is to say, that it cannot be carried on without the people taking part. It must be common to minister and people. So, whether it be the Young People's Service League, the Woman's Auxiliary, Vestrymen, or people that do not belong to any of Mother Church's organizations but are simply her loving members, or whether it be people who are not members, know that the Prayer Book Family is always lacking an impotant part until it is shared by you. So we plead that you get the Prayer Book habit, read it, study it, pray with it, and thus know that you can fill the Common seat and make the Prayer Book Family complete. It needs you.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

THE OXFORD GROUP IN DENMARK.

Hamlet's Castle, Elsinore, Denmark, was the scene on June 9, Whitsunday, of one of the largest mass meetings in Scandinavian history. It was an international gathering of the Oxford Group arranged by Danish members.

The War Ministry permitted the Castle to be used. The court, which holds seven thousand, was insufficient to accommodate the crowds, three thousand stood on the battlements without. The meeting was broadcast over a national hook-up. The government, which controls the radio, does not permit any political parties to broadcast. The time given the group was extended to one and a half hours. Trains ran from Copenhagen. More than a thousand came by bicycle. Some came by foot forty miles. The meeting was in German, Danish, English, all translated into Danish. It was led by Dr. F. N. D. Buchman. The speakers included Advocate Erling Wikborg, K. C. (Oslo); Mr. J. E. W. Duys, a socialist member of the Dutch Parliament; Lord Addington, British House of Peers; Professor A. Runestam (Uppsala); the Dean of Copenhagen, the Bishop of Copenhagen, Mme. Alfthen, of the Finnish Opera; a Danish saddler and a butcher.

When Mr. Duys said: "I remain a good socialist, but the one thing I know is that the best way to bring about the solution of the economic and international problems of the world is to put everything under the guidance of God. I believe the movement is doing more towards this end than any other movement in the world today," the cheering shook the Castle walls. The speakers represented United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, Switzerland, Holland, Norway, Finland and Denmark.

The Group, in its two months in Denmark, has touched every side of life. A small boy was talking with one of the team, and the conversation naturally came round to the Oxford Group. "Oh," he said, "we know all about it. We get taught about it in school these days!"

A cabinet minister, Mr. Dahl, Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs of Denmark, has said: "My impression of the Oxford Group movement is that it digs deep, aims high and embraces all."

A lawyer met one of the team, who suggested that the Oxford Group's answer to social problems might be putting him out of business. "Oh, no. I'm not crime—I'm divorce!" But he was changed, and one of the first persons he saw was a client of his who was due in the divorce court in six days. He was able not only to stop the divorce proceedings, but to bring the couple together, so that they are now on a virtual second honeymoon.

The librarian of the Copenhagen Public Library says that demand for books on the Oxford Group is the greatest on any subject for the past ten years.

Gerdu Mundt, woman M. P., said: "The Oxford Group brings us the kernel of the Christian Gospel."

Falk Hansen, leader of the unemployed in Denmark, said that more had happened through the Oxford Group already than he had expected to happen in five or ten years.

On Whitsunday, June 9, Dr. Buchman gave an interview to Denmark's leading paper, in which he said:

"This is Whitsun. This day a new illumination first came to the world through a group of unknown men. They changed the course of history.

"The great truth that the Oxford Group has made to live again is that God speaks to man. When man listens, God speaks. This, too, is available for every man. This is the revolutionary message of Whitsun which the world has lost.

"Today a national illumination is coming to Denmark through an outpouring of the Spirit of God, bringing a new quality of leadership, free from the bonds of fear, rising above ambition, flexible to the direction of God's Holy Spirit; a new quality of public opinion, whose values are dictated by the standards of Christ; an awakening in the Church, whose message becomes relevant to the needs of modern society; a right and creative conception of news in the press; an awareness in politicians of what is the true destiny of a country; nothing short of national resurrection influencing the international family.

"The leader of tomorrow is the man who is led by God, and is uncompromising in his challenge to the people.

"The Great Power of tomorrow will be the nation which gives God's leadership and illumination to the world. Such a nation might save Europe and civilization; and find herself in the process."

On the occasion of Dr. Buchman's fifty-seventh birthday (June 4), a feature writer for the Dagens Nyheder said:

"I no longer doubt that Dr. Frank Buchman is one of the most significant personalities in our times. One of his British followers has, in my presence compared him directly to the Apostle Paul. I myself found that he resembles in many ways St. Francis of Assisi. A couple of days ago I heard the editor of 'Kristeligt Dagblad' indirectly compare him to Martin Luther, stating as his conviction that Buchman's work would have an influence on the civilized world similar to that of the Reformation—perhaps even overshadow the Reformation in its significance for modern Christianity."

BISHOP BOOTH'S WORK FOR THE FORWARD MOVEMENT.

The Forward Movement, as well as the whole Church, has sustained a great loss in the death of Bishop Booth, of Vermont. He was an associate member of the Joint Commission, and his fellow members were anticipating his presence and counsel at the meeting held in Chattanooga, June 12-14. It was a matter of deep regret when they learned of his illness and that it would prevent his attendance. In the plans for its future work the Commission counted much on the help of his proven leadership in the renewal of the spiritual life of the Church, and especially in the matter of conducting conferences and retreats.

Since his return from the visitation of the churches in Europe at the end of May, Bishop Booth had been devoting himself to the preparation of a course on the Use of Meditation in the Life of the Clergy and Laity, which the Forward Movement Commission had asked him to write. This engaged his mind and heart during his last days, and will be part of the splendid legacy of his inspiring life of self-forgetting service and wholehearted loyalty to Christ and His Church.

LEADERS' HELPS FOR THE STUDY OF THE ACTS.

The Forward Movement asks us all to be reading and studying the Book of Acts this summer in order that we may learn the way in which the Church went forward in its first days. Some of us will want to do this studying in groups. Helps are available for this and may be had on application to the Forward Movement, 223 West Seventh Street, Cincinnati, Ohio. Ask for "Studies in the Acts"; a charge of five cents is made for handling and postage.

FIFTIETH BIRTHDAY OF STATUE OF LIBERTY.

The Statue of Liberty will celebrate its semi-centennial birthday, October 28, 1936. It was on October 28, 1886, that the great bronze monument, which was the gift of the French people and which was erected on its pedestal on Bedloe's Island in New York Harbor, was unveiled with ceremonies, in which citizens of both nations, through their represenatives, participated.

The gift was proposed by a group of Frenchmen in about 1872. One member of the group was Frederic Auguste Bartholdi, noted French sculptor, who was designated by them to do the work.

Committees in both countries were soon organized to raise funds for the undertaking. In France, 180 cities, 40 general councils, numerous societies and thousands of French citizens raised upwards of $700,000 to have the statue sculptured and placed on its pedestal. United States citizens, with the aid of the New York World, raised $300,000 to construct the foundation and pedestal.

Bartholdi early suggested Bedloe's Island as the site for the statue, a space which was later set apart for this purpose by the Act of the U. S. Congress, February 22, 1877.

The statue weighs 450,000 pounds, the bronze alone weighing 200,000 pounds. Forty persons can stand in the head of the figure and twelve in the torch. The height from base to torch is 151 feet, and over 305 feet from the foundation of the pedestal to the torch. The distance from the heel of the figure to the top of the head is 111 feet.

The head of the statue was exhibited in 1878 at the Paris Exhibition, and a forearm was sent to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia in 1876. The statue was finished in Paris in 1883, and on July 4, 1884, it was officially presented by M. De Lesseps, president of the French Committee, to Mr. Levi P. Morton, U. S. Ambassador to France. In June, 1885, the statue was landed at New York from the French vessel, Iscre.

CHURCH SOCIETY FOR COLLEGE WORK.

The names of twenty widely known and outstanding Churchmen and educators are attached to a petition filed in the Courts in Philadelphia this week for the incorporation, under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, of the Church Society for College Work. The purpose of the society is set forth as follows:

"To promote knowledge and acceptance of Christ's religion, and in other ways to strengthen the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in colleges and universities and to establish a fund for that purpose."

Officers of the society are: President, Rev. W. Brooke Stabler, chaplain University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa.; vice-president, Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, rector Christ Church, Cambridge, Mass.; treasurer, Dr. Thomas S. Gates, president University of Pennsylvania; assistant treasurer, William H. DuBarry, Director of Scholarships and Student Finance University of Pennsylvania; secretary, Rev. Theodore O. Wedel, secretary for College Work National Council.

In addition to the officers, the Board of Directors comprises the following:

Leila Anderson, field worker, National Woman's Auxiliary.

Hon. William R. Castle, Washington, D. C., member of National Council and former United States Under Secretary of States.

Henry Woodburn Chase, chancellor New York University and formerly president of the University of Illinois.

Rev. John Crocker, Princeton, N. J., Episcopal student chaplain Princeton University.

Rt. Rev. John T. Dallas, D. D., Bishop of New Hampshire.

Hon. Norman S. Davis, United States Ambassador at Large.

Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, headmaster St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H.

Robert C. Hill, New York, trustee, University of Pennsylvania.

Coleman Jennings, Washington, D. C., formerly Associate Secretary for College Work Natonal Council.

Rt. Rev. Henry W. Hobson, D. D., Bishop of Southern Ohio.

Rev. Dr. Arthur L. Kinsolving, rector Trinity Church, Boston.

Hon. Roland S. Morris, Philadelphia, chancellor Diocese of Pennsylvania, professor of International Law, University of Pennsylvania; Life Trustee Princeton University and formerly U. S. Ambassador to Japan.

John Lloyd Newcomb, president University of Virginia.

Robert K. Root, New York, trustee University of Pennsylvania.

Mrs. Harper Sibley, Rochester, N. Y.

Immediate objectives of the society are summarized as follows:

To assist in the placement of clergymen, laymen and women workers who will minister to students in college and university centers.

To develop an adequate and detailed file of clergy interested in and qualified for college work.

To continue emphasizing the strategic importance of college work to the Church.

To aid the movement for Christian conference and retreats for college students by increasing the scale of these meetings, and in some cases by starting new conferences.

To recruit for the ministry.

To gather together those committed to the cause of college work for prayer, inspiration and planning.

To raise money for the support of the work.

To unite in intercession all those who care about the college work of the Church.

The headquarters of the society will be at the University of Pennsylvania. The directors have completed a twenty-four-page booklet, which will be off the press within a week, which presents an interesting and informative story of the Church's work with students, and full and detailed information as to the aims and objectives of the society.

Attention is drawn in this booklet to the loss of students to the Church. This loss, it is pointed out, is not due, as many suppose, to Freudianism or Marxism or the war, or (until lately) our unprecedented material prosperity, which left no time for spiritual things.

"The reason for this loss," the booklet states, "is the simple fact that the Church is out of touch with the colleges, and the fact has appeared more and more obvious because the colleges have grown more rapidly and the loss has been correspondingly greater."

Copies of the society's booklet may be obtained by those interested in learning in more detail the reasons for the society's organization and the objectives it has in view by applying to the president, the Rev. W. Brooke Stabler, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Penn.

A CALL TO THE CLERGY TO ASSIST.

The Philadelphia Divinity School was founded in 1863 in the midst of a great civil upheaval and new social conditions, and met conditions successfully. After more than seventy years of service, this school, faced again with changing conditions, seeks to broaden her basis of support and scope of efficiency by providing Clinical Theological Teaching for Seminarians. Sound accomplishments of the past years provide fitting foundation on which to build.

Bishop Philip Brooks was an original overseer of the school, and the roll of graduates has furnished many great leaders to missionary and educational enterprise throughout the world.

Wide interest attaches itself to the present program for the presentation and expansion of the school's work. Bishop Beecher, of Western Nebraska, is chairman of a large committee of Bishops, alumni and friends, who are at work to raise $70,000 in the near future, and $160,000 in the next three years. The Bishop of Pennsylvania, the Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt is the honorary chairman of the campaign, and has just issued a call to all of his clergy to assist in the campaign for the school.

More than $20,000 has been subscribed within the last few days. The joint boards of the school will meet June 27 to act in regard to the election of a new dean of the school and to transact school business bearing on the future.

Summer School for Rural Ministers.

The diocese has arranged to send twelve ministers to the Virginia Summer School for Rural Ministers at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, which will be opened for registration July 17. The regular sessions will begin the next day and continue through July 26.

The 1935 Summer School for Rural Ministers assumes special importance in bringing country preachers and rural church leaders together for a review of the many and significant programs dealing with rural life which are under way today. This school, which is a study of the rural life situation as it affects the country church, should bring those who attend up to the minute on current programs and events and prepare the ministers who are fortunate enough to take advantage of this entire series to return to their pastorates as real leaders in this time of urgent need.

All the resources of the State College of Agriculture are made available to this school and a great many federal agencies are contributing to the abundance of this program. The experience and problems of those in attendance will be given a prominent place and the school made to apply directly to the country church situation as it is today.

Round table discussions dealing with the most vital problems in rural life will be under the general direction of the Rev. W. C. Shawen. This period provides ample opportunity for the participation of all in attendance. Special contributions will be brought by a large number of active country preachers.

The evening lectures are devoted especially to the national agencies dealing with rural life today and will be of very special interest to all.

A large number of officials of the Virginia Rural Church Conference Board, of rural church leaders, and of country preachers will take leading parts in this program. All in attendance will have ample opportunity to join in the discussion period.

For further information, write the Secretary, Professor B. L. Hummell, Blacksburg, Va.

Y. P. S. L. Convention—Conference.

The annual convention of the Y. P. S. L. of the diocese will be held at St. Margaret's School, Tappahannock, Va., June 28-30. The convention opens with registration Friday afternoon, June 28, and closes with supper on Sunday, June 30. The cost for any delegate or counsellor is $5.

The theme for the convention addresses is, "The Bible in the Light of Modern Research." The Rt. Rev. F. D. Goodwin be the speaker. Discussion groups on programs, organization and finance and budgets will be held, and a service of preparation for the Holy Communion, conducted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Edward Guerry, will be held Saturday.

Beginning July 1, the annual conference for Young People will be held at the same school buildings, and will last until July 7. On July 8 the Adult Division of the conference will open, and will last through July 12; the Children's Division runs simultaneously with the Adult Division. Program may be obtained from the Diocesan Offices.

School for Ministers.

The Virginia Seminary School for Ministers, which was held from June 17 to 21, proved a great success. This school is filling a long-felt need in the life of the clergymen of this and neighboring dioceses; the splendid courses offered provided for the attending ministers spiritual refreshment and encouragement. The enrollment showed an increase in numbers over that of last year.

To Make Survey.

Mr. Fred Griffith, lately graduated from the Virginia Seminary, has been appointed to make a survey during the summer of that part of the diocese in which our Church maintains no work at present. This is a large area, embracing parts of Fauquier, Prince William, Spottsylvania, Stafford and Culpeper Counties.

The Rev. Joseph B. Dunn, D. D., has consented to act as minister-in-charge of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, during the summer months. It is hoped a rector can be secured for the church by September 1.

While returns from the Whit-Sunday offering are not all in as yet, it seems as if the sum contributed will fall short of the goal by about $5,000. To cover this shortage, additional envelopes have been sent out asking for gifts of $1 or more, and it is hoped in this way to raise the whole of the $25,000 asked of the diocese.

CHICAGO.

Rt. Rev. George Craig Stewart, D. D., Bishop.

Spiritual Things First.

"The results thus far of the Centenary Campaign in Chicago signalize the sunrise, the new dawn, into which the Church is going under the impetus of the Forward Movement," declared the Presiding Bishop on June 18, participating in services marking the fifth anniversary of Bishop Stewart's consecration and the achievements of the Centenary undertaking.

Bishop Perry was the celebrant at the service in St. Luke's Pro-Cathedral, Evanston, in the morning, when Bishop Stewart repeated the vows which he took just five years previous when he was consecrated. The Presiding Bishop delivered his message to the diocese at a diocesan-wide dinner in the evening at the Hotel Sherman, attended by more than 700 men and women.

The challenge of the new day, which he said is dawning, is to place spiritual things first. In the future men must recognize the partnership, under obligation, between themselves and God, a partnership which involves all material possessions.

The Church is on the verge of a great advance step, Bishop Perry believes. In this forward step, the Church must strive to throw off what he termed certain old "superstitions," one of which is the idea of separation of the spiritual and material. Bishop Perry paid tribute to Bishop Stewart, saying the Church and the nation was sorely in need of such dynamic force and leadership and vision as Bishop Stewart possessed.

Christians Must Assert Their Christianity.

"The world today is asking for a practical demonstration of Christian faith," the Rt. Rev. Warren L. Rogers, D. D., Bishop of Ohio, asserted in his sermon. He scored the secularization of the present age, and said that crass materialism cannot be overcome unless Christians are convinced of their mission in the world and assert their Christianity. "Love, Brotherhood and Sacrifice—these are the elements which must show the way to a solution of the national and international problems of the present," Bishop Rogers declared.

The Rt. Rev. Harry T. Moore, Bishop of Dallas, and the Rt. Rev. John Chanler White, D. D., Bishop of Springfield, assisted in the service.

Reports submitted to the Presiding Bishop at the dinner showed approximately half million dollars raised in the Centenary Campaign. Bishop Stewart assured the Presiding Bishop that the campaign is to be carried forward until at least a million dollars is raised.

Dedicate Rare Windows.

Two rare stained glass windows were dedicated at the Church of the Holy Spirit, Lake Forest, the Rev. Dr. Herbert W. Prince, rector, on Sunday, June 16. They are the gift of Mrs. Frances North Haskins and Miss Helen North, in memory of their mother, the late Elizabeth Holmes North.

The windows are patterns of a little church high up in the Styrian Alps. They were made in Vienna through the same process and by the same artists as the windows for the famous St. Stephen's Cathedral there were made. They were brought to this country and exhibited at the Century of Progress Exposition last year.

VERMONT.

Bishop Booth Dies of Pneumonia.

Bishop Booth of Vermont, one of the most prominent bishops of the Church, died at a hospital in Bennington, June 17.

He collapsed June 9 while officiating at St. Peter's Church there. Pneumonia developed. His condition was critical the entire week.

Born in Philadelphia October 29, 1883, the son of Henry Driver and Mary Bourne Babcock Booth, he attended the William Penn Charter School in Philadelphia and then graduated from Harvard. He received the Doctor of Divinity degree from Virginia Theological Seminary in 1925. He also received the Doctor of Divinity degree from Middlebury College and Norwich University, and the Doctor of Civil Law degree from Bishop's College, Quebec.

He was ordained deacon in 1910 and priest in 1911, serving as a missionary in Idaho from 1910 to 1914. He was rector of St. Luke's Church, Kensington, Philadelphia, 1914-18; chaplain, American Red Cross, Evacuation Hospital No. 9, in France, 1918; assistant at St. Mary's Pro-Cathedral, Philadelphia, 1919; in charge of missions, Bucks County, Pennsylvania, 1920-25. He was consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of Vermont February 17, 1925, and became Bishop of Vermont February 26, 1930.

Vade Mecum Camp Open to Adults.

At a meeting of the Vade Mecum Camp Committee, at which Bishop Edwin A. Penick presided, the program of summer camps and conferences was cancelled. This action was taken as a precaution and in cooperation with the health authorities for the protection of the children, due to the infantile paralysis epidemic in the eastern section of the State. Feeling that some use should be made of the Center, the committee decided to open Vade Mecum for a Guest Period beginning June 23. This will afford a great many of the adult members of the Church an opportunity to enjoy the privileges of this beautiful camp. Situated in the mountains of North Carolina, twenty-six miles north of Winston-Salem, at an elevation of 1,800 feet, Vade Mecum offers to the people of the Church a delightful place for rest and recreation. Its mineral springs are famous throughout the state. A fine outdoor pool supplied with pure mountain water; the gymnasium with indoor tennis, basket ball and other sports; Moore's knob, 2,685 feet high, for mountain climbing and the many trails offer a variety of exercise.

The camp is equipped with electric lights and modern conveniences. Excellent food and the rates are very reasonable. The Rev. J. A. Vache, Vade Mecum, N. C., is business manager.

Resigns as Chaplain.

The Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher has resigned as chaplain of St. Mary's School and Junior College, Raleigh, N. C., a post which he has held for the past three years. Mr. Fletcher came to Raleigh in November, 1932, from London, England, where he was engaged in research work in quest of his doctor's degree, and where he was also assistant curate of St. Peter's, Regent Square. He plans to continue his degree studies at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Fletcher became well known in the diocese of North Carolina for his lectures, giving courses at State College, the University of North Carolina, St. Augustine's and delivering addresses on a number of occasions. Also, he assisted in diocesan parochial affairs by filling pulpit assignments in the Church of the Good Shepherd and Christ Church in Raleigh and at other churches of the diocese.

A native of New York, Mr. Fletcher has engaged widely in literary and magazine research and composition, and is the author of a book, "The Church and Industry", that was published in 1930. He began his study for orders at Berkeley Divinity School, New Haven, Connecticut, in 1925, after graduating from the University of West Virginia. He also engaged in graduate work at Yale.

Rt. Rev. J. DeWolf Perry, D. D., Bishop

Chapel Dedicated at Arcadia.

Last Friday Bishop Perry consecrated with ancient ceremonies the Chapel of the Transfiguration at Holcomb House, diocesan rural mission, Arcadia. He blessed the building as he entered. Here and there the procession of the clergy through the building paused that various memorials might be dedicated. The instrument of donation was read declaring the building to be free of debt and ready to be set apart for the purposes of the church. After prayers for the various offices to be performed in the church, the Instrument of Consecration, by which the church was taken under the control of the Bishop, was read for him.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop

The Boys' School of St. Paul's Parish, Baltimore.

On June 5 this school closed its eighty-seventh year with an attendance of ninety boys, the largest number since it was founded in 1849, under the Rev. Dr. William E. Wyatt. The present rector of St. Paul's at his coming found the school of fewer than thirty boys, housed in buildings near the church in the downtown section of the city. This property was sold at the peak of prices, and the school moved four miles into the suburbs. There are six masters, a lower school and higher school, and the older boys are taken through college prepartory. Of recent years its graduates have received their full share of honors at Johns Hopkins, St. John's, Annapolis, West Point and other institutions of higher learning. At the late commencement, Mr. George S. Hamilton, headmaster, presented the prizes, and Dr. Kinsolving, president of the trustees and rector of the parish, gave diplomas to twelve graduates, the largest number in its history. Mr. Herbert E. Pickett, dean of Gilman County School, made an address sparkling with wit, pithy advice and sound wisdom.

One of the marked advantages of this school is its location in a fine residence neighborhood, from which it draws all the day pupils that can be accommodated. Thorough instruction in church music is given about one-third of the boys of the school by the choirmaster of St. Paul's Church.

The religious education of the boys is under the immediate care of the rector of St. Paul's, and about one-third are communicants of the church.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. Henry J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop

Camp Mikell.

Camp Mikell, the young people's camp of the diocese of Atlanta, opened at Toccoa Falls, in North Georgia, on Monday, June 16. More than one hundred young people from fourteen to twenty-five years of age, from practically every parish in the diocese, registered on the first day.

The activities of camp life are balanced so as to include play, worship and study, in proper proportion to afford a pleasant and profitable vacation, with the added advantage of religious study and spiritual training.

Courses are offered in Bible, Prayer Book, Church History, the Christian Vocation, Methods of Young People's Work, Programs for Young People's Meetings, Hygiene and Personal Health, Parliamentary Law and Public Speaking and others.

The faculty includes the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, chaplain and dean; the Rev. Mortimer Glover, director; Randolph Claibourne, David Cady Wright, Charles Schilling, William S. Turner, Robert Bandy, Mrs. B. H. Wagnon, Mrs. L. A. Bailey, Mrs. Herring Winship, Mrs. W. L. Stribling, Jr., Miss Louise Starr, Miss Annie Morton Stout and Miss Gail MacDonald.

The camp closes June 29.

Confirmation.

The Bishop visited the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, on Sunday morning, June 16, where he confirmed a class of fourteen before leaving for the Young People's Camp, at Toccoa Falls, early Monday morning. The Bishop was also celebrant at the Holy Communion, assisted by the rector, Rev. G. W. Gasque, and Rev. E. J. Saywell. Thomas Lee was crucifer, and William Beckett and Herbert McDonald acolytes. Three young people from this parish, Anna Lee Gasque, Emily Dana and Doris Franz, are attending Camp Mikell.

Cathedral Choir Loses Soloist.

Frank C. Eastman, Jr., baritone soloist of the Cathedral Choir, has been transferred by his company, C. F. Childs & Co., to Washington, D. C. This is a serious loss to the Cathedral Choir. For thirty-five years Mr. Eastman has been soloist, giving generously of his voice and himself to the Cathedral of St. Philip, Atlanta. As boy-soloist and later as a baritone, his voice has been one of the outstanding assets of the Cathedral. Though his friends are happy over his promotion, they are grieved over losing him from Atlanta and the Cathedral.

Bible Lessons With Motion Pictures.

The Rev. John Moore Walker, of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, is inaugurating a new idea at his church school. As usual, the various departments have disbanded for the summer. The children all gather in the assembly room for a general worship period, after which an episode of the motion picture, "The King of Kings", will be shown, and Mr. Walker will tell the Bible story upon which that particular part is founded. Thus the Bible story will be taught both through the ear and the eye. A larger attendance is expected this summer than for any previous summer.

Camp Reese.

Following Camp Mikell, the Young People's Camp for the Diocese of Atlanta at Toccoa, in the Blue Ridge, the Rev. Mortimer Glover, of Christ Church, Macon, director of Camp Mikell, and Miss Louise Starr, Episcopal student worker at the University of Georgia, Athens, will go to Camp Reese on St. Simon's Island for the Young People's Conference of the diocese of Georgia. Mr. Glover will teach "Applied Christianity".

Camp Mikell closes June 29.

For the first time in the history of Camp Mikell, more boys registered than girls. The erection of a new building at Toccoa Falls Institute made it possible to increase the enrollment from the customary eighty to one hundred young people. Every part of the diocese was represented at camp this year.

St. John the Baptist Church Observes Day.

The Patronal Festival of the Church of St. John the Baptist, Philadelphia, was observed with special services on St. John the Baptist's Day, and included the blessing of eight new memorial windows recently installed. The services at night were a Festival Evensong and Te Deum, with a sermon by the Rev. Wallace E. Conkling, rector of the parish and also rector of St. Luke's Church, Germantown.

Father Conkling took over the additional oversight of St. John the Baptist on April 5, last, in order to prevent its being closed. Since then there has been a marked revival of interest, and, in addition, a number of improvements have been made, the installation of the new memorial windows being one of the features of the progress. The windows being replaced were put in when the church was built eighty years ago. Although none of them was a memorial, some of the glass has been incorporated in the new windows. Among those commemorated in the new windows are two former rectors, the Rev. George W. Lincoln and the Rev. Dr. Charles Henry Hibbard. Others being commemorated are a former rector's warden, Dr. William H. E. Wehner and a faithful parish worker, Miss Fanny D. Abbott.

St. Mary's Chapel Service.

George Herbert Randall, former general secretary of the National Brotherhood of St. Andrew, conducted the 11 A. M. service Sunday in St. Mary's Chapel of the Cathedral Church of Christ, Upper Roxborough. Mr. Randall is a member of the Church of the Holy Trinity, and is a licensed lay reader in the Episcopal Church by appointment of Bishop Taitt.

Celebrates One Hundred and Seventy-fifth Anniversary.

Historic Christ Church, Upper Merion, one of the groups of churches erected by the early Swedish colonists, who settled on the shores of the Delaware in 1637, and who later made their way up the Schuylkill River to Upper Merion, commemorated the 175th anniversary of its foundation on June 23.

Descendants of the early Swedes, representatives of the Swedish Historical Society, the Montgomery County Historical Society, county officials and officials of the nearby towns took part in the services at the invitation of the rector, the Rev. James H. Lamb, Jr., and the vestry of the parish. Bishop Taitt was the special preacher and also administered the rite of confirmation to a class presented by the rector.

For a number of years prior to the foundation of Christ Church, the Upper Merion Swedes attended church services at the older Swedish Churches, Gloria Dei at "Wiccacoe" and St. James, "Kingsessing", passing down the Schuylkill River in canoes. Occasionally visitations were made to Upper Merion by the ministers who served at Gloria Dei, at which time services would be held in a schoolhouse that had been erected in 1735. Subsequently ground was purchased and on June 25, one hundred and seventy-five years ago, the present church building was dedicated. With the influx of the Welsh settlers to the Upper Merion district the English language supplanted the Swedish, and the successive Swedish pastors were frequently assisted by Church of England clergymen, as was also the case in the other Swedish Churches at "Wiccacoe" and "Kingsessing".

During the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. Nicholas Collin, who was the last of the Swedish pastors and whose service to the "United Swedish Churches" covered the period of forty-five years from 1786 to 1831, the Book of Common Prayer came into general use in all Swedish congregations, and Dr. Collin was aided in his ministrations by a very considerable number of the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church. With the death of Dr. Collin the Swedish Missions came to an end, and the Rev. J. C. Clay, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church was called to serve the three congregations. In 1843 the union of the three churches was dissolved, since which time each of the three churches, having become part of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has had its own rector. The Rev. James H. Lamb, Jr., the present rector of the Upper Merion parish, has served there for the past ten years.

Outdoor Religious Services Meet Hot Weather Problem.

Many New York churches are this summer meeting the hot weather problem and the discomfort of worshipping indoors by conducting outdoor services.

The newest series of such services is announced by Grace Episcopal Church, at Broadway and Tenth Street, which, on Wednesdays and Fridays during July and August, will conduct a 25-minute service, starting at 12:30 in Huntington Close on the grounds. The theme will be, "The Christian Way".

A canopy will be erected for those who care to come within the Close, and a platform for the speakers will be set up. The opening service will be held on Wednesday, July 3, with the Rev. C. Lawson Willard, rector of St. James' Church, Elmhurst, Long Island, as the preacher. Those who are scheduled to participate in the services during July are the Rev. A. B. Parson, of the National Council; Rev. David M. Cory, pastor of the Cuyler Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn; Rev. Harry J. Knickle, assistant minister of the Holy Trinity Church, Manhattan; Rev. Hugh D. McCandless, rector of St. Simon's Church in Staten Island; Rev. Fred W. Cooper, assistant minister of the Church of the Ascension, Manhattan; Rev. William K. Russell, of West Englewood, N. Piper, assistant minister of St. Bartholomew's, and Dr. Floyd Van Keuren, executive secretary of the Social Service Committee in New York, are among those who will preach in August. The Church Army will have charge of three of the services.

Grace Church is also conducting a series of neighborhood gatherings on Wednesday evenings in Huntington Close for older residents in the community. These begin outdoors at 7:30, and then adjoin to Grace House for music and refreshments.

Other outdoor services in New York are being conducted daily at 12:30 at the north end of Madison Square Park by the Greater New York Federation of Churches under the direction of Dr. Arthur Y. Beatie. These are designed for people of all denominations, and particularly to help those who are discouraged. The Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church at Seventy-third Street conducts its Sunday evening services on the roof of the church house. Family Roof Parties are also being held there from time to time. The New York Youth Christian Center is also conducting some twenty-one outdoor meetings on church lawns, house porches and street intersections at various points in the city's five boroughs.

SUMMER HOUR.

No winter wind comes to this meadow now,
No snow lies banked above the singing stream
The sun is warm upon each leafy bough,
And golden peace lies round us like a dream.

The bees come visiting; a bird flits by
Toward its nest, deep-hidden in the wood;
The clouds pile up white castles in the sky,
And here our hearts know well that God is good.

We lie at ease, warmed through and through by sun,
Whilst scent of clover-blossoms fills the air.
We joy in this rich hour which was begun
Secretly months ago, whilst trees were bare.
God promised Earth this hour, and keeps His vow:
No winter wind comes to this meadow now.

To Show Forth Jesus.

The congregations of many churches are hungering for a sight of Jesus. They are given many other things, important in themselves and good, yet all the time they are longing for a vision of Him, who alone can help them solve their problems. Many pulpits quote Jesus and speak of Him, but far too few present Him today, where He can be understood, received and followed by sinful souls needing release and salvation.

If we are honest with ourselves, we must acknowledge that not always is Jesus shown to the world by the churches in their work, or in the meeting of church courts. So much time is given to the turning of the wheels of machinery, so much to the defense of our particular interpretation of the faith, so little to the showing forth of our Master, who is the only hope to the troubled people of the world.

One of the most strange and paradoxical things in the world today is the effort on the part of some Christians to put the principles of Jesus into operation in the affairs of the world and the opposition on the part of others even to making the effort. It is not that men wish to go outside of the sphere of the Church and rule the State. It is that they believe, as John R. Mott has gone around the world proclaiming, that "Jesus is Lord of all, or not Lord at all." It is that more and more earnest Christians have learned from experience, that, if a man is not a Christian in his relationships of business and politics, he is not a Christian in that which he denominates his religious life. Someone has said that an army on the march is not so powerful as an idea, whose time has come. The idea of social justice has come in the world and there are countless questions today, which will be settled either inside the Church or outside. If men can see Jesus in the lives of Church members, wherever their lives touch the things of the world, the beginning of the final solution has come.

Humanity will be exalted. Jesus on the throne in Heaven is a pledge of this. Righteousness and truth will prevail. Jesus, living in the lives of His followers, is the ground of this assurance.

This is an age of specialists. It has to be so, because our lives are so complex, our problems so complicated and our needs so varied. Let the Church remember that with all the work it is doing, its specialty is preaching Jesus to the world. Presenting Him in His loveliness, His attractiveness, His saving power. And let Christians remember that whatever else they do, if men do not see Jesus in them their work is vain. If Jesus can be seen in us, we may be utter failures according to all worldly standards, yet we have succeeded gloriously, according to heavenly standards, and in the end will doubtless have earned that final and most desired of all commendations, "Well done good and faithful servant."—From a Sermon by Rev. Dr. S. R. Ogilsby.

The Child Makes a Bad Bargain.

Three sisters, mothers of little children, were visiting in their old home and each, as a special treat, gave her children a few pennies to go downtown and buy what they liked. The little journey was quite safe for the youngsters and it was at an hour when they could take their time in looking at the toys and candies on display, so they set out in great good humor. But when they returned, sad to relate, it appeared they had made bad bargains. A man had been making shining, fascinating looking taffy in plain sight of a large crowd, and these children had invested their money in candy. When each received a bag containing a very tiny portion, they all felt badly disappointed, for they had planned for other things. Of course this is a common happening with children. It was the different way that each parent commented on the incident that especially interested an onlooker.

One mother said that it served the children exactly right. She reminded them that they had gone out with the intention of buying balls for a little game they were planning, and she said they were old enough to know better than to waste their precious money.

Another mother said that the next time a shopping excursion was in progress she would go herself to see that the children did not come home disappointed.

But the third mother gathered the sad children in her arms to tell them that she had once done the very same thing and had come home disappointed because something unexpected had coaxed the money out of her purse.

"But, children, you don't have to do it again," she said. "The next time you will know better. And I'll tell you a little secret. Grandmother wants her onion bed weeded, and if you work hard you'll have enough money for your balls this very day."

"Adele, you always were soft-hearted" said her older sister. "Now I believe in teaching children a lesson instead of sympathizing with them when they waste their pennies. But, I must say," she added truthfully, "your children are better behaved than mine, and they confide in you more than my two do in me. Maybe after all . . . . Well, I do declare! They've all started for the onion bed."—Hilda Richmond, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

IN HIS HAND.

"Lord, how can I a chosen vessel be,
To bear Thy Name to others far and near?
Those precious contents carried, Lord, by me,
An earthen vessel, frail and full of fear?
Lord, what if that weak vessel soon should break,
Leaving someone without a taste of Thee?"
But He made answer very tenderly:
"I know that thou art frail indeed to bear
The message I have put within thy soul,
But nothing that is handled with great care
Is broken, though it be a fragile bowl.
I chose thee not for any strength of thine,
But thou art in My hand, O child of Mine."

Broadminded.

An open mind is an accepted sign of intellectual quality today. Your house has windows and doors, but sometimes these have to be closed against arctic winds and unwelcome visitors. Can we deny that privilege to the mind?

Broadmindedness signifies tolerance, universal sympathy, and magnanimity, but there are some features not so desirable. Often it means mere light-hearted forbearance which shuns contradictory people. But surely one cannot go through life smiling indiscriminately on everybody. Even at the risk of losing friends it is occasionally necessary to be severe. Easy leniency is a melting pot into which some people throw the silver treasures of their high standards and noble principles only to find them a shapeless mass. Irresponsible neglect of difficulties and problems may keep you from being too serious, but it leaves the mind childish and useless. So is it if you shirk the clamorous questions of faith. It is not enough to say gaily that one faith is as good as another. Sometimes it happens that such men are not morally capable of defending their faith, for moral courage is at a premium.

Jesus was of Nazareth, a despised town; He preached in Samaria to the offense of the Pharisees; He listened to a Gentile woman and a Roman soldier; He bade men forgive seventy times seven; He prayed for His enemies; He believed even in prodigals; and He gathered into His society unknown people from the north and from the south, from the east and from the west.

Do you wish to be broad minded, pray for the presence and guidance of His Holy Spirit. In His companionship your mind will be open to receive the best and to make the best of old and new alike.

Does this narrow your mind? Well, remember that a little well kept garden is more companionable and inspiring than the widest plains of buffalo grass, dust driven and swept by Arctic gales.

Better a little garden than a big wilderness.

"Choose ye this day whom ye will serve" does not end with arithmetical facts and scientific demonstration. It leads us into the deeper consideration of whether humanity can continue to exist without the supreme authority of the eternal mind and will.—Robert MacGowan, in Presbyterian Banner.

THE SEXTON THINKS IT OVER.

Charles Ballard.

I wonder—
Is there anything in it?
She comes regular;
And the reverend says—
But the boy says that's all bunk—
And he ought to know:
He's been to college.

College!—seems only last year,
The night he was born—
And her layin' there so still and white,
And Doc shakin' his head.

Then all at once I said it—
First time since I was a boy—
"Our Father"—the words came natural.
All night I kep' goin' over it.
Then she moved:
And the doctor turned round and nodded to me.

The boy says he knows better—
Read all about it in college.
But say—the Reverend's been to college, too—
Queer I never thought of that before!

Bene Fit and Bene Volens.

The word "benefit" is in itself a grand word. It means "good deed." Now, I like a man who has good will, who is benevolent—bene volens; a man who on a dark night says, "Good-night, I wish you well." "Good-night, friend," I say; "I thank you." That is bene volens. But I like better the man who says, "Stop a bit; it is a dark moor over there; I will get a lantern; I know my way, and I can take you across this footpath, which will be a short-cut, and see you safely into the highroad." He shakes me by the hand and says, "Good-night." That is bene volens turned into bene fit. Bene fit is good deed. Bene volens is good; but bene fit is better. Oh, our God loves us never with good-will only.—Mark Guy Pearse.

When Defeat Is Victory.

Victory in God's sight and victory in men's sight may be two different things. Strained situations arise in this life as suddenly as thunder-clouds in summer, and only the grace of God can keep them from reaching the breaking point. At such a time the worldly man, by some clever, cutting remark, may apparently crush the Christian; and the Adversary will urge the Christian to try to outdo the other. But then it is that the man seeking "first the kingdom of God" will remember his Lord, and trust Him, "who, when He was reviled, reviled not again." By saying nothing, or by a "soft answer," he can end the dispute, and the other may think he has carried the day. And if the Christian feels a lingering sense of humiliation, what consolation is there for him? There is a great deal. Like Enoch, he has "this testimony, that he pleased God," which is infinitely better than pleasing himself; and he may rest upon Peter's inspired word: "But if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God." As a peacemaker he is "blessed," and his communion with God is unbroken.—Sunday School Times.

THE BLESSING OF PRAYER.

Putnam W. Kyle.

I came to Thee in agonizing prayer,
My human spirit tossed about at sea,
My selfish thought: To tell it all to Thee.
Out tumbled words, hot with bitter tears,
Remorseful that yesterday was gone
And fearful of tomorrows yet to come.
Looking at the clear blue sky, I knelt to pray,
For those I love, "Grant them Thy peace, O Lord."
And lo! A tranquil joy filled my own breast.

What We Enlisted For.

It is said that a soldier who enlisted in a war took along his kit of watchmaker's tools, and while they were in camp he did considerable business. But one day when the order came to strike tents and prepare for battle, he looked around his tent in dismay, and exclaimed, "Why, I can't possibly go, for I have twelve watches to repair, which I have promised by Saturday night." The man had forgotten what he had enlisted for. The soldiers of the King of kings sometimes seem to forget what they enlisted for.—The Sunday School Chronicle.

The phrase, "eternal life", was frequently on the lips of Jesus. It is found some forty times in the New Testament, and as far as I know is peculiar to Christianity. I do not find it in the Old Testament. I find such expressions as "the eternal covenant", "eternal righteousness", "external possession", "the eternal God", but I do not find "eternal life". I do not know any place where it occurs in the religions of the world. It is peculiar to Christianity.—Rev. H. T. Kerr.

Afraid of Overweight.

The other day I watched a grocer weighing a pound of cheese. He had a hard time getting the piece to weigh a pound. Finally, he cut off several slivers in order that the buyer should get nothing over his pound. He might as well let his customer have the benefit of these, as they were useless to him. But he never gave overweight. We often treat God in the same way. We are so careul to do just what we think we ought and to give no overweight. We ask: "How little can I do and still be a Christian?" instead of our hearts asking: "How much can I give?"—Onward.

STARS HELP.

Monica Williams.

The little stars come out at night
And shine so clear and bright,
I wonder why they wait 'til then
To give there wondrous light?

Perhaps it is the sun is tired
And has gone home to rest,
Or maybe he is helping, too,
Where somewhere else is, best.

And so the little stars come out
When he has gone away,
For we do always need some light,
Though just a tiny ray.

Oh, God is very good to us,
He gives us all our need,
And we must help Him, like the stars,
Though tiny, be our deed.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Birthday Morning.

M. L. G.

September came, with golden sunshine and ripening fields. Philip and Kent were at the top-notch of excitement, for they were to begin school, and on their birthday! Six years old on the fifteenth, and school boys, too—it was almost too much for Philip, who kept the household in an uproar. Kent had some moments of doubt, and kept closer than usual to mother, who was busy making new suits of blue and brown, and two stout school bags.

"Come here, sonny," she said to Kent one morning. "Let me measure this strap and see if it's long enough. Then your bag will be done. It has a red K, you see, and Phil's a red P."

"Is there a little room in it could hold our fwag?" asked Kent as mother held the bag to his side and passed the strap around his shoulders.

"Why, Kent, you wouldn't want a frog in school!" cried Claire. "He couldn't learn, not even A, B, C."

"But wivout muvver nor even our fwag—" began Kent, and his lip trembled.

"To school perhaps, but not in bags."

"I know something better than the frog," said mother quickly, "and you shall know tomorrow."

"Is it a birfday somep'n?"

"Yes, and the birthday's tomorrow."

"And can we take it to school in our bags?"

"I know 'bout it!" Claire put in. "It will be more sensible than a frog, Kent."

"Then it can learn A, B, C?"

"Not that, perhaps, but other lessons. Just be patient, darling," said mother, "you shall know tomorrow. Now, here's your bag, and here's Philip's. Go put in your nice pencils Aunt Mollie sent, and the pads and copybooks."

"Mother," said Claire as Kent ran off to fill the bags and tell Philip that there was to be a "surpwise better'n a fwag" for their birthday, "Mother, I would so be happy if I could go to real school".

"That will come, honey, before so long," said mother, taking up a little jacket and her button-bag. "You're not falling behind, you know, and what would I do in the long mornings without my own little school, with its one scholar? Let's keep on until February, and if you get stronger as fast as you have been doing, we'll ask Dr. Carrington about it then."

"It isn't jus' lessons," said Claire wistfully. "'Cause I like you for a teacher better'n any other person; it's recess an' lunch boxes, an' games, like Winnie tells about."

"But think how much farther along you are than you were last year!" mother said, brushing back the pale gold hair from the little face which bore the marks of so many hard lessons of patience and pain.

"I do think that," Claire answered, rubbing her cheek on mother's hand, "I feel a little fussy, mother, but much happy, so don't mind," she ended smiling.

"Muvver!" cried Philip rushing in, "Kent says it's somep'n better'n a fwag for birfdays. Is it maybe a bigger fwag? An' did you know if one boy goes wif hands an' anudder boy holds one boy's foots dat's a wheelbawwow?" He stopped from lack of breath.

"Yes, I've seen that kind of wheelbarrow," answered mother placidly, "and the surprise is not a bigger frog, but something much nicer than even the biggest of frogs."

"Dat's hard to fink, muvver," said Philip. "Like de donkey talked to de man in de Bible is hard to fink."

"Well, make up your mind tomorrow!" mother laughed.

And on the next morning, Philip and Kent were quite convinced. After breakfast, when the usual mysterious packages had been unwrapper and exclaimed over, David ran out and called back, "It's all ready! Come to the back porch! The surprise is there!"

The little boys rushed out, father caught up Claire and mother and Winnie followed. At the foot of the back steps stood Uncle Danger, grinning and holding by the bridle a splendid brown pony. Roy and Noel capered about, barking their excitement, but the pony stood quiet, as if waiting to be approved by his new masters.

"Oh, muvver, is he ours?" cried Kent, pressing close to mother in delight and surprise. But Philip ran straight to the pony and flung himself against his neck, crying out, "O Tom! O Tom!"

"The Trent ladies sent him," said mother. "Who could have thought of a better present? See how pretty he is, and so gentle."

"Now I can b'lieve 'bout de donkey talked," said Philip from the pony's mane, "'cause Tom is better dan a fwag, even if de fwag was as big."

"Let Uncle Danger lead you around," said father, setting Claire down to put Kent in the saddle. "Don't be afraid, son. Move away, Phil, old man, you shall have the next turn."

"Why do you call him Tom, Phil?" asked Winnie as Uncle Danger started slowly off, with Kent holding tight to the pommel of the saddle and David walking alongside to steady him. "I didn't know he was named."

"Well, now!" exclaimed mother. "I had thought Brownie would be a nice name—"

"That is the most pretty," said Claire.

"Maybe we can change Phil's mind," Winnie added. "Let him have his ride first."

"He is Tom," he said distressed.

"I looked an' saw it was Tom," said Phil, his eyes on the pony. "Oh, be quick, Kent, so my turn will come!"

But even after the little boys had several rides, singly and together, Philip, sitting on the bottom step, was not to be moved.

"How can we call him Brownie? You wouldn't like it, Winnie, if ever'body called you a name an' it wasn't Winnie."

"I tell you," said father, "call him Tom Brown. Just as you're Philip Duncan, Phil. How would that do?"

"Oh, I didn't mean dose udder names," said Philip instantly. "I don't care how much names he has."

"I like Tom Brown," Kent added shyly.

"And if he's going to carry Kent and Phil to school, it's a good name," David declared, "because he'll have school days like the Tom Brown's School Days I've been reading about."

"And it's time for the first school days right now," said mother. "Get your bags, boys, and, David, walk with them so both can ride. They'll soon grow used to it."

"But, mother, what will Dr. Blackburn say?" asked Winnie anxiously.

"Father spoke to him, and he doesn't mind. Tom Brown can be turned into the pasture with the Williams' children's ponies, and Pat's horse. David can take care of him and saddle him again at twelve o'clock, when the little boys are out, and for a few mornings I'll send Uncle Danger to bring them home. But Tom is sure-footed and they will soon learn to ride him safely."

"We have very nice Trent ladies in our parish," said Winnie as she turned into the house to find her own schoolbag. "It must be pleasant to have lots of money to give folks ponies and paint boxes and all those things."

"Well, it isn't all the money." Mother put her arms around Claire to give her just the little help that made her way easier. "They have such good hearts! Miss Sarah gave you lessons, honey, as well as the paint box, and dear Miss Alice, what hasn't she done!"

"I do 'specially like friends," said Claire, her face shining, "an' now we have a new one, an' he's Tom Brown."

Burning Punk.

It was the middle of the forenoon of a bright Fourth of July at the camp at Echo Lake. The sun shone down with intense heat from a cloudless sky. The early morning pop-pop of firecrackers and bang-bang of torpedoes had let up, but Ted was still playing with his slow match, or punk, as he liked to call it.

Earlier in the morning Ted's father, Mr. Hardy, had warned the boy to be very careful in the use of firecrackers, and especially in using the slow match, explaining how the latter would burn very slowly for a long time, but if it touched any wood, might set it on fire.

Ted had brought out a magnifying-glass, which he called his "burning glass", and, holding it over the punk until the heat of the sun had lighted it, he then proceeded to light a leaf from the slowly burning punk. He watched the leaf smoke and crumple up, then laid his punk down on the step and began holding the burning glass over the leaf until it was lighted.

Just then came a shout from his friend, Tom, "Hi, Ted. It's time to go swimming. Hurry up."

"All right," answered Ted. "Be with you in a jiffy," and he rushed into the house to get into his bathing suit. Soon the two boys were racing to the lake, where they joined the other boys and girls swimming and paddling about in the cool water.

Ted was a fine diver, and always enjoyed showing off the various kinds of dives he could make. He swam a race with Tom across the narrow end of the lake to the opposite shore. They lay in the shadow of the tree for a while, resting, then swam back, and Ted returned to the diving board. He had just made a jack-knife dive and come spluttering out of the lake to shake the water from his head and climbed onto the board again when he heard the fire alarm and stopped to count the number.

"Twenty-nine," he exclaimed. "Gee, whiz. That's our number. I left my punk burning," and he made for the shore.

He felt choked as he ran, and it seemed to Ted as if his throat was filled up. "How can I have been so careless?" he said to himself. "Oh, if only the fire engine will get there in time!"

Ted rushed straight toward his own home as if he had been told that the fire was there. Soon he could see crowds of men and boys, many of them in their bathing suits. The smoke was piling up, with here and there some blaze, but, to his delight, he could see much of the cottage still standing, even though the smoke was dense. "At least," he thought, "it's not all down yet. I'll never again be careless with punk."

Ted felt as if he must do something to help put out the fire, but as he rushed toward the house a fireman called, "Here, come back! Keep this side the line!" Ted, realizing that he must obey, came slowly back. He would have liked to have done something to help put out the fire, since he felt sure that it was his own carelessness that had caused it. However, he could do nothing but watch.

Soon, to his great delight, he saw that the fire department had the fire under control, and later found that only the steps and wall directly above them had been burned. There had been more smoke than real fire. He felt glad enough that the fire was no worse and the damage no greater.

After the excitement was over and the engine and firemen were gone, the watching crowd gradually left, and only the Hardy family remained to see that the fire did not break out again.

"Come in to dinner," called Mrs. Hardy. "We shall all need something to eat after all this excitement." The family sat down to the table, but they could talk of nothing but the fire. "I cannot understand how it could possibly have caught," said Mr. Hardy. "It was just the steps and the wall over them. If a match had been left there it might have been stepped on and lighted the wood, but who would have a match on the steps?"

Ted's throat felt so full he could hardly swallow. He glanced out the corner of his eye at his father, but the latter was paying no attention to him, and probably was not thinking of him at all. Should he tell of his carelessness?

"Do you suppose there are rats under the steps and that they might have chewed a match and thus lighted it?" asked Mrs. Hardy.

"But where would the match come from?" queried Mr. Hardy.

Ted longed to get up and leave the table, but he knew that would only call attention to himself. What should he do?

"I was playing on the steps with my doll," said Betty, "this morning. I'm glad I didn't leave her there. She'd have been burned to death."

"You didn't have any matches, did you?" asked her father.

"No, I did not have any matches," she said.

Ted longed to tell the whole miserable story, but somehow he couldn't even open his mouth. He was very thankful when dinner was through and he could get away by himself. He had not been able to eat much, but no one had seemed to notice it. Up in his room he sat by his open window and tried to think what to do. He hated to tell his father how heedless he had been, but he knew that he would not be happy until he had confessed. Finally, he decided he would do it at once. He wanted to get rid of that disagreeable lump in his throat. "I'll do it right off," he decided. "I can wait no longer". But when he found his father he was talking with a neighbor, and Ted turned quickly away He could not possibly talk before any one else.

"O Ted," called his sister, Joan. Let's ride our wheels down to the store. Mother has an errand to be done."

"You go," said Ted. "I'm busy."

Some time Ted haunted the yard, trying to find his father alone, but as soon as he saw that Mr. Hardy was busy he hurried up to his room. Slowly the afternoon wore away, then Ted saw his father sitting alone on the edge of the platform by the burned steps. Downstairs the boy slowly walked and out to his father's side and sat down. For a while he remained in silence. Then Mr. Hardy said, "It troubles me because I cannot understand what caused the fire".

For a while Ted remained silent, then, very slowly, he said, "It was my fault, Dad. I was careless and left my punk burning on the step. You had warned me, too."

The father glanced at the boy as he sat there in a dejected attitude, and then, realizing what it had cost the boy to make the confession, said in a cheerful tone, "That was fine of you to tell me, because now I can account for the fire. I could not understand how the fire could have originated, but now that you have told me, I won't worry any more about it."—Advance.

Monkey Manners.

At a Century of Progress, a small army of monkeys daily attracted throngs of people and sent them into gales of laughter at their amusing antics. A circular moat of water surrounded the animals on their roomy island, while a tall, irregular structure of imitation stone afforded ample freedom for climbing and playing.

The public was permitted to feed them, and especially prepared, inexpensive packages of food could be had near by. The moment some one appeared at the railing, with a package in hand, immediately the water front was lined with the expectant little fellows.

On this particular day, a bystander threw a package over to them and there followed the usual lively scramble, which resembled a league football scrimmage. The winner finally emerged with the coveted parcel, and what followed would have to be seen to be appreciated.

At once, as if by unspoken accord, all activity ceased. There was no attempt to rush the winner, no crowding or pushing each other. Each monkey stopped and sat down right where he was, in a half circle, and waited.

But what excited, tense waiting! Every bright eye was fixed on the lucky one, as he proceeded to investigate the prize. How tantalizingly slow he was! He daintily picked out a bit of carrot, tasted it, then laid it on the ground and took a morsel of something else. He sampled everything in the package until it was empty, and the contents laid on the ground, where he leisurely picked out and ate what he wanted. He seemed to be aware of being in the spotlight and deliberately prolonged it.

Finally, he stopped eating and began to spread out the food that was left so that much of it was within easy reach of the others. And all the time the excitement grew. Muscles twitching, little forearms gesticulating, much chattering and turning of heads and blinking of quick, bright eyes.

Suddenly the host turned away, as if interested elsewhere. It was evidently the signal to "come and get it", for the ranks broke, and, in less than no time, not a vestige of food remained.—Ex.

WEALTH OF GIVING.

Magda Brandon.

Life is worth the living
When tnere is joy in giving
Oneself in humble service every day,
To help a weaker brother;
To lighten for another,
The burden that is his upon the way.

The very art of living
Is found within the giving;
And he is growing richer every day
Who sees an eye grow brighter;
An aching heart made lighter;
And none can take his growing wealth away.

Straight Paths.

The snow had fallen through the night. Pure and spotless it lay on roof and road and field. A number of lads met beside a vacant lot in the morning and looked at the untrodden white before them. No one had crossed the lot, and it seemed to invite footprints.

"Try who'll make the straightest path to the other end of the field," challenged one of the lads, and he was quickly taken up.

All but one started off immediately, taking great care to watch their feet as they went along. The boy that started last sighted a tree trunk at the opposite end of the lot, and with head erect and eyes front he stepped out. The last to start was the first to finish, and his path was as straight as it could well be, while the other tracks were crooked and twisted and, of course, really longer than the straight track.

"Say, Billy," the ones that lost in the trial called out, "how did you make out to do it so straight?"

"Well, said Billy, "I found out that when a chap looks at his feet he can't help wobbling, and so I looked away from my feet to that tree and kept on looking till I got there. Really, fellows, it was looking at the tree did it, and any of you can do as well if you take my way."

At once they found another untrodden lot and tried Billy's way, and found he was right, and that morning those boys learned that when you want to make a straight path you must look up and ahead and not down.—The Presbyterian.

TERTIUS.

"I, Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord."—Rom. 16:22.

Though he was scribe for greater men,
Quiet his life, obscure his work—
The zeal with which he drove his pen
Was not the routine of a clerk.

His carefulness with interest blent,
Not grudging, as beneath a rod.
And Paul, with such an instrument,
Achieved a lasting work for God.

Now younger, stranger companies
Are still admonished by his word;
And Tertius, down the centuries,
Salutes us in the Lord!
—Dorothy Thompson, in The Sunday School Times.

DEATHS

HENRY BISHOP SOULE, U. S. N.

LIEUT. COMDR. HENRY BISHOP SOULE, U. S. N., retired, died at the Naval Hospital in Washington, May 18. He is survived by his widow, Jesse Dean Soule. Funeral services were held Monday, May 20, in Alexandria, Va., with full military honors and interment in Arlington National Cemetery.

The only child of Josiah Soule, Jr., and Malvina Kellogg, Comdr. Soule had an outstanding genealogical record. Tracing descent from King David I of Scotland, his ancestors are among the most noted in America, for he was a lineal descendant of several signers of the Compact and passengers on the "Mayflower". The Kellogg family arrived from Scotland prior to 1650. In the Continental Army, Capt. Joseph Kellogg served throughout the Revolution, and in every war in which the U. S. has engaged a member of the Soule family has rendered loyal service. Comdr. Soule was the only Soule of this family to belong to the Navy, to which he was an honor for 52 years.

Comdr. Soule entered the Navy as an apprentice at Newport and served through all the grades of warrant officer to electrical gunner. He was the first man commissioned under the act of 1902 permitting enlisted men to take examination for commissions. His portrait was placed in the apprentice seamen quarters at the Newport training station by Capt. R. Z. Johnston, then commanding officer of the station.

In 1904 on the U. S. S. Wisconsin on the Asiatic station, Comdr. Soule received commendation from the Navy Department for his work in command of the broadside battery of 12 6-inch guns in breaking the world's record for target practice, which previous to that time had been held by the British navy. For many years he was a member of the Sons of the American Revolution, in the Massachusetts Chapter and since then in the District of Columbia Chapter.

Comdr. Soule was a high type of Christian character and a devoted husband. He was a devoted Churchman and served as vestryman of Pohick Church, Va. For the last few years he was president of the board of managers of the Children's Home and Day Nursery in Alexandria. In connection with his death, a friend writes:

"Again, in our grief, we are forced to ask, 'Why.' The only possible answer is that his work here was done, and so well done that there was no grade high enough on this earth with which to honor him. His host of friends will miss this quiet, modest, distinguished officer and Christian gentleman, who has left some mark of his character upon their lives. Many of us will carry his beautiful image in our hearts until our own time comes to answer: 'Present.'

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Ordinations.

Priest.

The Rev. Frederic John Eastman, B. D., assistant to the Rev. Charles L. Ramsey, rector of St. Paul's Church, Jackson, Mich., and associate missions, was ordained priest by the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop of Michigan, on Thursday, June 20, at 11 A. M., in St. Paul's Church, Jackson. For three years he has been field secretary of St. Philip's Society for Teaching Missions.

At the same time his brother, Eric Ingram Eastman, who has just graduated from the Diocesan Theological Seminary of McGill University in Montreal, was ordered deacon by Bishop Page, acting for Bishop Knowles of Saskatchewan, Canada, where he will immediately go for missionary work with headquarters with a number of priests at the House of the Good Shepherd of the Prairies, at Milestone, Saskatchewan.

Their father, the Rev. Frederic S. Eastman, pastor of St. Peter's Episcopal Church, Akron, Ohio, preached the ordination sermon.

Deacon.

Mr. J. Harvey Chapman was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Woodcock of Kentucky in St. Paul's Church, Henderson, Ky., on June 19. The rector of St. Paul's, the Rev. William Banks, presented the candidate and preached the sermon. Mr. Chapman will continue in charge of Trinity Church, Owensboro, Ky.

Mr. James D. Beckwith was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, on Friday, June 14, 1935, in Trinity Church, Lumberton. The sermon was preached by the Rev. John Q. Beckwith, Jr., rector of St. Matthew's Church, Hillsboro, N. C., and the candidate was presented by the Rev. William M. Latta. Of the clergy present and taking part in the services were the Rev. Stephen Gardner, rector of St. Peter's, Washington, and President of the Standing Committee of the diocese; the Rev. J. E. Bethea, rector of The Messiah, Rockingham, N. C.; the Rev. Alexander Miller, rector of St. Paul's, Wilmington, N. C.; the Rev. E. W. Halleck, rector of St. John's, Wilmington, N. C., and the Rev. W. R. Noe, Executive Secretary of the diocese. Mr. Beckwith has been placed in charge of St. Paul's, Clinton; St. Gabriel's, Faison, and St. Mary's, Burgaw, N. C.

Deaths.

The Rev. Levi Brooks Edwards, rector emeritus of the Church of the Transfiguration, Providence, R. I., died in the Homeopathic Hospital on June 17, after an illness of many months. Of Methodist faith in his youth, he was graduated from Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J., in 1887, coming to that institution from Rutgers College. Ordained in the Episcopal Church in 1895, Mr. Edwards came that same year to St. Thomas' Church, Providence. Later he served ten years as a diocesan missionary, establishing many missions throughout the state. In 1910 he became rector of the Church of the Transfiguration, and during his rectorship the present attractive stone building was erected.

Mr. Edwards was a famous traveller. More than once he went around the world, and as a result of this interest and knowledge he was much in demand as a speaker, especially for the women's clubs.

"WE KNOW!"

William Olney.

Oh, blessed note of Heavenly harmony!
Only within the Page of Truth Revealed
Do we find certain light for Heart and Mind.
Science can spell out facts as ascertained,
But beyond those she is too blind to see.
Philosophy can guess, but varying views
Confuse the mind and cannot Truth reveal.
Here in the Word of God we find displayed,
In grandeur worthy of the Eternal Mind,
Knowledge of God and things invisible—
Our true state in His sight; sin's certain doom;
The great Redemption wrought upon the Cross;
The offer of free pardon to our faith;
And the Regenerating Spirits' power.
The Church of God down the years witnesses
To the reality of these great Truths;
Since through them she obtained her life from God;
And by them she is fed and disciplined.
Here then is Revelation Realised!
We know; we know; WE KNOW; while others guess:
And, knowing, with Life Endless God doth bless.

FIRST STEPS TOWARD RECOVERY

The last General Convention proposed to the Church a budget of $2,700,000 for 1935, and the Committee on Budget and Program reported that the needs of the Church's work called for even a greater sum.

This Program and Budget was divided into two parts: the Emergency Schedule of $2,313,115, an amount fixed by the income in sight at the time, and

The Challenge Schedule, $386,885, to be met by additional gifts to be secured in the course of the year.

To inaugurate the Emergency Schedule it was necessary to cancel appropriations amounting to nearly $400,000. This was done, but to accomplish it . . .

Missionary salaries in all fields have been reduced below a decent living wage;

Trained, experienced, consecrated mission workers have been added to the army of the unemployed;

Workers, already over-tasked, have been given additional duties, through the doubling-up process made necessary by reduced personnel;

Schools have lost accredited standing through reductions in salaries and in staff;

Hospitals are pitifully understaffed in several important mission centers;

Evangelistic work has been reduced; at a time when the need for the Gospel is greater than ever before, and when people are truly receptive;

Rural work has been stopped, so far as the activities of the National Council are concerned;

Opportunities for advance in every field must be declined, through lack of means.

IS THIS TO GO ON?

Shall the Church definitely cripple Her Mission of preaching, teaching and healing

Restoration of this work, now suspended, depends upon meeting The Challenge Schedule. Half of 1935 has gone.

What has your diocese done? What has your parish done? What have you done?

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

"The stars themselves move on the lines of Jesus."

The difference between iron and steel is fire, but steel is worth all it costs.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

I have never seen a savage whom civilization without Christianity had succeeded in civilizing.—James Chalmers of New Guinea.

"No drop but serves the slowly lifting tide."

The Gospel of Jesus Christ ought, above all things, to make one attractive, lovable, and cooperative in the finest sense of that word. That the Gospel does not always have such a beneficent effect upon the individual is due to the imperfect understanding of the gospel, and the fact that it does not have free course and power in the life. It has never yet had a chance to do its perfect work.—Rev. S. C. Harrell.

The silences of Jesus are as eloquent as His speech and may be a sign, not of His disapproval, but of His approval and of a deep purpose of blessing for you.—Selected.

"I do not know anything about it," said Dr. Grenfell, the great medical missionary of the Labrador, when he spoke upon self-sacrifice at the Northfield Conference last summer.—The Record of Christian Work.

To think of the Church standing between the risen Christ and the world, as He stands between us and the Father, is to almost overwhelm us with a sense of our obligation.—Selected.

"The follower of Jesus is called to be a pioneer himself; and it is a common experience that one great feature of the Christian is the constant feeling that there is more beyond."

For us to ask anything at the hands of the Lord, which withal we do not offer ourselves ready instruments to effect and bring to pass, is to tempt God's power and to abuse His goodness.—John Robinson.

The saint is just an ordinary person, limited, apt to stumble, fallible, foolish—"nothing"—but he is dedicated to Christ, sealed with His Name, kept in His power and (most wonderful of all), found available by Jesus Christ and used by Him in His work of redemption. Dr. T. R. Glover.

"There is very little difference between one man and another," said a working man to Professor William James, "but," he added, "what there is, is very important."

It is simply not true to speak of the irreparable past, and not well to dwell upon it. Go deeper and take God into account. It is part of His omnipotence that He can retrieve it. The story is not finished yet. Those who believe in God believe in a retrieving future.—Dr. D. S. Cairns.

Life is full of dignity and potential glory, however low it may appear to have sunk. Men may be utterly unworthy. They may be bound by sin. The world may at times seem entirely dominated by evil. But none of these things should move us or discourage us. Jesus is the pledge of final and complete redemption.

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

IMPORTANT

The Southern Churchman Company is engaged in an intensive campaign to extend the circulation of Southern Churchman and thus enable it more effectively to carry out its purpose as an auxiliary to the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and of service to its members.

Within the short period since this campaign has been in effect, the circulation of the paper has more than doubled; a gratifying indication that Church people want the information on religious subjects contained in its weekly issues, and appreciate the service it renders.

If enabled to continue the campaign for a reasonable time, there is every prospect that the increase in subscriptions thus secured will soon put the paper upon a solid financial basis of publication, and ultimately enable it to discharge its indebtedness.

To conduct this campaign requires a large amount of ready cash, and its continuance depends upon our ability to provide the necessary funds.

Southern Churchman resources consist of subscriptions for the paper and advertising. Of subscriptions there is now a large amount due on annual renewals, the immediate paying of which would greatly assist in carrying out our effort to make the paper self-supporting.

We are, therefore, asking these subscribers to let us have their renewal payments as promptly as possible, to the end that there may be no let up in the work of extending the circulation and increasing the usefulness of the paper so auspiciously begun.

The Southern Churchman is not a profit-making enterprise. It is conducted solely for the benefit of its subscribers and the work of the Church.

Keep the good work going.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Praise of Dr. Tucker's Article.

Mr. Editor:

Am so glad to renew acquaintance with the Southern Churchman, to which I subscribed through Mr. Guthrie, who passed through our town. Dr. Beverley Tucker's article, "The Future of Virginia Churchmanship" (June 15), is worth the price of the subscription. Dr. Kinsolving's article on "The Lord's Day" is most timely and should prove very helpful.

The whole journal, editorially and otherwise, seems to me very much improved, most sound and, somehow, its Churchmanship strikes a fortunate vein in these days of disturbed America.

Questions Dr. Tucker.

Mr. Editor:

If the three following propositions are wrong, please tell me: (1) There have always been "these unhappy divisions among us", even from the days of the apostles. (2) The word, "catholic" has not been used as a blanket term to cover all the divisions, but has been commonly used to designate one of the divisions. It is silly to talk of the root meaning (which is whole, entire). It is the meaning of the word, not of the root, that is significant. As a matter of fact the word was not used to describe Gnostic, Montanist, Nestorian, et al; but only Catholic. (3) The word catholic was never regarded as an argument for inter-communion.

The article by the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker is of more value to me than anything else the Southern Churchman has given me. Therefore, my disappointment with the section on cooperation was great. If he would be an advocate of this new thing, I shall not complain. But to claim the word catholic, and thus gain the prestige of age and general consent for what is really new and sectarian, is dishonest. A new thing deserves a new name.

If I am wrong in the three propositions, and therefore in my conclusion, I beg to be set right.

(Rev.) C. Earle B. Robinson.
Cooleemee, N. C.

Dr. Tucker Replies.

Mr. Editor:

I was much interested in the letter of the Rev. C. E. B. Robinson, calling me to task for my use of the word, Catholic, in my address on the Future of Virginia Churchmanship. I do not know that I entirely understand the purport of his three propositions, but I can assure him that I am sorry to have caused him so much perplexity and particularly am I sorry to have subjected myself in his judgment to an argument which could be classified as dishonest.

To take up Mr. Robinson's three propositions in the order in which he presents them, I would make the following comments: (1) I am in full agreement with the validity of his first proposition, namely, that there have always been "these unhappy divisions among us". St. Paul gives ample authority for this assumption in his First Epistle to the Corinthians.

(2) It is quite true that the word "catholic" has commonly or popularly been used to designate one of the divisions of the Christian Church. The earlier use of the word catholic, however, as an attribute of the Church, was in the sense of universal (see Ignatius). My contention is that the ideal Church, to which we profess allegiance in the Apostles' Creed, is the Holy Catholic Church in the sense of the Holy Universal Church. I was protesting against the narrowing of that interpretation of the church by using the word catholic as a divisive adjective. If this passing reference, however gives rise to such great confusion as it seems to have in Mr. Robinson's mind, I must have been most unfortunate in my use of words.

(3) I cannot answer the third proposition. I can only say that my conviction is that, if the ideal which the word catholic projects in the Creed is ever to be realized, then the practice of fellowship in work and worship amongst Christians of different ecclesiastical folds, is one of the steps that we need increasingly to take.

May I say to Mr. Robinson that while I regret that his disappointment with the section on cooperation is great, yet I am glad to know that he will not complain if I profess myself as "an advocate of this new thing". Brother, believe me, when I tell you that that was the entire purpose of the section on cooperation! So, why complain?

Beverley D. Tucker.

A New Concordance.

Mr. Editor:

Wouldn't it be worthwhile to start a little feeler, in this time when so many able people seem at a loss for a sphere of activity, suggesting the need of a really new and really complete Concordance of the Holy Bible, American Revised Version? It would have to be financed by somebody who is in a position to run the risk of losing most of his money. But there are Christian people who are in that position.

This is a Bible Anniversary year, and every time I urge a man to buy a Bible or use one I have to urge him to buy and use also a concordance. The best concordance I know of is Cruden's, and it has so many errors and omissions that Preserving Our Inheritance.

To the Englishman, our short history of Anglo-Saxon civilization seems but a few years. And yet we do well to remind ourselves that our Church has been actively at work on these shores for a period of time that is longer before the Revolution than it has been since. Great motives and noble traditions have been handed on to us from this Colonial Church, and we should all take pride in our history and in the preservation of this heritage.

No place stands out so prominently as a mark of our heritage than old Bruton Parish Church at Williamsburg, Virginia. This church, the successor of the Jamestown Parish, was for many years the "court church" of Colonial Virginia. It was built in 1710 and paid for by the General Assembly. It was the place of worship for almost every important man who visited this colony from the completion of the present building in 1715 until the Revolution. It is part of the best of our national inheritance.

Today, due to the generosity of the Rockefeller family, Williamsburg itself has been restored to pass on for all generations the civilization that was the background of the present United States. Thousands of visitors come annually to visit this "square mile of colonial capital". In the midst stands Bruton Church as the testimony that our forefathers sent on to us a Faith.

But Bruton is but only partially restored. The church itself is in bad repair. Termites have attacked its fabric. Its galleries, an important part of the colonial church building, are lacking. It is badly in need of paint and its church-yard with tombstones recording the names of America's most distinguished patriots, should be properly landscaped and the tombstones preserved. Unless these things are done, the many visitors may get the impression that churchmen are not interested in their traditions and that those "of the world" are better cared for and preserved.

A movement has been started by the rector who already has contributed so much time and care to the restoration of Williamsburg, the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin. A fund for restoration, which it is hoped will reach twenty-five thousand dollars, has been started. Our churchmen are asked to send to "The Bruton Parish Church Restoration Fund," in care of Dr. Goodwin, any sum large or small to help insure the preservation of this church in keeping with the tradition and inheritance which it has passed on to us. May we urge our readers to take this appeal seriously? This church stands daily as a testimony to our faith and contribution to the past as well as an inspiration for the future.

Ritual—Fancy and Otherwise.

One of our friends has written that we once editorially made the statement that we did not like fancy ritual, and he feels that somehow or other we have betrayed the faith.

It puzzles us to know just what is on his mind, for we always thought that any good churchman disliked merely fancy ritual. In fact, we well remember when we carefully quoted a leading Anglo-Catholic, who said cheap and fancy ritual with no church teaching or tradition behind it used merely to the end that it might be used, made out of such users the only real "ritualists". For a ritualist is he who blindly uses ritual without realizing why or what it means.

Our reason for mentioning it at all is that in our church there has crept into it through an effort no doubt to escape being drab, a great amount of rather fussy and meaningless ritual. It is not worthy of us or our heritage. It has no precedent, either in Catholic usage or Evangelical Anglican tradition. It is the bete noir of men like Percy Dearmer in England and Father Stone in our own country. It is cheap and fancy and it is found just as much among supposedly "low" churchmen as it is found among "high" churchmen.

That the world today wants beauty in its worship is beyond question, and we should use every effort to find beauty. But our Church has an heritage of dignity that in itself prevents—or should—mere fanciness.

The two most beautiful services it has ever been our privilege to witness were found in opposite types of churchmanship. One would and should have been considered "high" and the other was certainly "low". But the dignity and the reading of the service was the point the two services had in common. It is in a better effort on the part of our clergy and a more earnest demand from our laity that the beauty of reading be brought out that will result in less drabness and more worshipful services.

Fortunately, the whole subject of symbolism and ritual (if we care to use such a word) is being studied by real scholars, as it has not been studied for many years. We ought to know why we use certain things today and we should have decent and scholarly reasons for using them. We should question ourselves

Belief in the Holy Ghost.

Church of England Newspaper, June 7, 1935.

Dr. Inge, writing in the C. E. N. on May 3, said: "Many who are hazy about God the Father can say quite sincerely: 'I believe in the Holy Ghost the Lord and giver of life'."

We wonder how many of our readers agree with Dr. Inge's arresting statement? Is it not utterly contrary to the general view notwithstanding our repetition of the Creed? If we may say so without presumption, we feel that our distinguished contributor rightly sums up the situation as it is developing today. A decade ago the claim was not true. The position then would have been more accurately described in the words of the Ephesian's reply to Paul: "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." Today the wind of the Spirit is stirring in the valley of dry bones, revitalizing a Church which has become lukewarm and which has to a great extent lost its vision and initiative and power. Mainly through the faith and zeal of the Oxford Group there are multitudes of men and women in all parts of the world who are consciously and humbly permitting the Holy Ghost to guide and direct their lives and empower them in the service of God and their fellows. Such a fact is full of hope. Once again in the time of need God is fulfilling His promise "I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh; your sons and your daughters shall prophesy and your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams."

The Bishop of London Sat to Receive Gifts.

The Canadian Churchman, June 6, 1935.

There is something fascinating in the picture of the Bishop of London—sitting in St. Paul's Cathedral on June 25 to receive gifts for the extension of the Church in his vast metropolitan diocese. The Bishop is an Empire figure. He is certainly known in Canada from one end of it to the other.

The Reverend E. P. Laycock, who used to be an Archdeacon in British Columbia and now lives in England, has sent me two brochures regarding this unique event. The first deals with the Bishop and his career, the second with the staggering task before the Church in Old London due to the rapid growth of new districts. The first brochure has cuts of the Bishop at every stage. First as a graduate starting out to be head of Oxford House in the slums of London, then as Bishop of Stepney, then during the war in khaki and finally as he appears today and in the garden at Fulham Palace. The Bishop's wonderful work through the years is described in the print. He has been Bishop of London for thirty-four years. His work as a preacher when crowds flocked to hear him preach "Under the Dome" is recalled. He has been author of many books. Although past seventy and nearing eighty, he is still keen as a sportsman and keeps himself fit by tennis and golf. His great power is the Christian heart within him. His hospitality is boundless, and once with Mr. G. B. Woods I was privileged to enjoy it. He even entertained some communists at Fulham, and the echoes of that event went round the world. The growth in his diocese and the great problem that inspired this new experiment of sitting at the receipt of gifts is also briefly described.

Heresy of Nationalism.

The Guardian (English) June 14, 1935.

What we are witnessing today is a challenge to this truth as fierce and intolerant as any that has been made in history. The sacredness of the individual and the necessity of a world community are both denied by the doctrine that the nation is supreme over the individual. Any idea of a world community, it is said, must yield before the imperative demands of national destiny. This view must be denounced as simply untrue. It is rank heresy. "It is heretical for it deviates both from the tenets of Christianity and from those of humanism. It is in fact the most heretical doctrine ever held." Nations have their place in the scheme of things. But they cannot have the final or the supreme place. They provide a useful setting to life, they are valuable because they preserve different types of culture. Their worth is to be judged precisely by their capacity to promote the higher aims of the individual—and by the contribution they are prepared to make to the creation of a world community. If citizens have duties as well as rights, so have nations—duties both towards men and towards mankind. The nation that fails even to recognize these duties is an incubus and a public danger. The price of peace is the sacrifice of national selfishness. This truth was emphasized by the Archbishop of York in his address to Convocation. "The submission by a sovereign nation of what it might regard as a question of vital interest to the judgment of the most impartial tribunal that could be devised may call for a very difficult sacrifice of pride. Yet I cannot doubt that to such a sacrifice God is now calling the nations of the civilized world." The heresy which makes national sovereignty and a purely national policy the ultimate criterion of action must be shattered if there is to be any hope of peace. And peace is now, as Senor de Madariaga says, more than a blessing; it is a necessary. "For while war in the old days was a nuisance, in our days it has become a deadly peril."

Italy Expels Foreign Correspondent.

Christian Century, June 26, 1935.

Expelling foreign newspaper correspondents from the country is probably the worst conceivable method of making a favorable impression upon world opinion. Mussolini loudly asserts that he cares nothing about world opinion. So be it. Then he will probably not mind if the world infers, from the expulsion of Mr. David Darrah of the Chicago Tribune, that there are factors in the present internal situation in Italy which the government wants to conceal from the rest of the world. But if it wants to conceal them, then it must care what the world thinks, and the world thinks worse of the fascist regime for expelling the correspondent than it would have thought for anything that he wrote or might have written about the unpopularity of the Abyssinian campaign with the Italian people. Mr. Darrah is a thoroughly competent and responsible correspondent. He has lived in Italy seven years, and neither previously nor in the article which precipitated this episode has he done anything but report facts that are amply substantiated by evidence. He has not been a propagandist or a rumor-monger or a firebrand. If the expulsion of Mr. Darrah proves that the Italian government does not want the facts known to the world, the exclusion from Italy of the New York Times, by an order effective the preceding day, and of certain British papers, including the Manchester Guardian, shows that the authorities are equally averse to having the facts known by the people of Italy.

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

The Greater Things to Come

Our Lord, at the time of His calling Nathanael to be one of His disciples, said to him:—"Thou shalt see greater things than these." We may well regard the Christian life as a progressive one, with new knowledge opening out before us all the time, as well as new opportunities for service to God and man. The Christian life, therefore, should be one of expectation, with the sense of wonder always present and on the alert for the new unfoldings of the divine will and purpose. We may well expect great things from God, because He has so much to give and is so willing to give it, if we on our part are only prepared to receive it. Each day as it comes should be regarded by the Christian as a Day of the Lord, in which there are new possibilities open to us, through our clearer realization of what God can be to us, if we will only allow Him to make us what He wishes us to be.

The Greater Day.

To pray each day as it comes that it may be made by God the greatest day we have ever lived, can be made an inspiration to us which will make life become more and more a Great Adventure, because it means, or should mean, the passing into a new experience of what God can make out of these lives of ours, in spite of our weakness and many failures. There are many men who are seeking diligently to find out what new wonders Nature has still in store for us, and it is because of this earnest seeking of theirs that we have come to realize the exceeding richness of our natural inheritance. But what is true of Nature is far more true of God Himself, especially when we realize that He has created us with the wonderful capacity for knowing Him and entering into His Mind and purpose. Christ said, in His great Intercessory Prayer:—"And this is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." St. John 17:3.

The Gift of Eternal Life.

This knowledge then raises us to a new and far higher sphere of existence, according to our Lord's own statement, and it is impossible for us to measure the full meaning and significance of this eternal life, because it means something entirely different and of a much richer quality than our merely physical life. If it is true that what we think, we become, then by letting our minds dwell upon the wonders which God has in store for us, we shall become more and better prepared, day by day, to receive further and fuller supplies of the divine grace. But this is not all, for eternal life is not only a priceless possession which makes the spiritual life of such far greater value than the merely physical, but it should enable us to make manifest to the world that Christianity is something far greater and more wonderful than men have been accustomed to think.

The Revelation of the Kingdom of God.

It is only in this way that Christianity can become the power in the world which it ought to be, and must be before the Kingdom of God can be revealed. All created things possess the capacity for manifesting their true character. The diamond or the pearl gives up the secret of its real genuineness when the proper tests are applied, and it is the same with Christianity. Men have little difficulty in recognizing the true Christian, for there is something that he possesses which cannot be hid, no matter how humble and modest he may be, for the light which he sheds is not his own, it is a reflection of the Light of the World. The world needs this Light more than anything else, and it should be our ambition, as Christians, to be used by Christ as His Light Bearers, so that the twilight in which we are now living, may become the New Day. For then the followers of Christ would be obeying His command:—"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in Heaven."

Light Essential to Beauty.

Light, especially sunlight, makes the world beautiful, and flowers and grass and trees owe their beauty of coloring to the sunlight which glorifies them. In the same way the light which comes from Christ, and which is, or should be, reflected from the lives of His followers, brings out the beauty of goodness and of the Christlike character. If there were more radiant personalities in our Churches, far more people would be drawn to them, for there is nothing more attractive than genuine goodness. At the same time all that is unworthy and false to the Christian ideal, is thrown into the shadow, and any attractiveness which now seems to win men's approval and imitation, would then be seen in the pure white light of the New Day to be mere tinsel and tawdriness in comparison with the beauty of goodness.

The Coming Day.

What God can make out of a common day
Nor you, nor I can say.
On earth's first day He said, "Let there be light,"
And day came forth from night.

And yet again He said, "Let there be light,"
And angels shining bright
Told to the startled shepherds of the birth
Of Him, the Light of earth.

And since it is the light that makes the day
And drives the night away,
So He who came to be the world's true Light,
By His all-powerful might,

Can bring in a more bright and perfect day,
And drive the dark of sin away.
But He has said to us, "Ye are the light,"
Not children of the night.

So we must shine with light received from Him
Just as the Seraphim
Glow in the brightness of His glorious Face
And by His mighty grace

We, too, can serve, and by this service shine
With His true Light divine,
And bring in, while we drive the night away,
A far more glorious day.

The Bishop's Pence

By GEORGE CRAIG STEWART,
Bishop of Chicago.

TWO years ago the plan of the Bishop's Pence was broached by me for use in the Diocese of Chicago; since then it has been taken up by many dioceses and missionary jurisdictions, and has been widely copied and adjusted for use among different denominations. That the plan has brought in to the Diocese of Chicago nearly fifty thousand dollars so far, and is going on steadily increasing in scope and interest, offers perhaps sufficient ground for this brief article requested by the Editor of the Southern Churchman.

The plan in brief is this:—Each communicant of the Church is asked to use a Bishop's Pence can, which has printed upon it a proper grace, or blessing for food, and a proper thanksgiving after the meal. It also bears the couplet:

"Thrice a day these prayers I say;
Thrice a day my pence I pay."

At least one cent is to be placed in the can by each person at the table before or after each meal.

Prayer, Thanksgiving, Oblation! Here are three efficient notes of sacrifice. All three are necessary; each is integral to the whole.

Our emphasis in the Diocese of Chicago is always placed upon the spiritual meaning and values inherent in the plan. All over this Diocese there has been a revival of the Christian custom of invoking the divine blessing upon the family table, and of a thanksgiving after meals.

The way the plan started was this. Returning from a meeting of the National Council two years ago, and considering again the pitiful financial problem present to our Church by the failure of our communicants to measure up to their privileges and responsibilities, it suddenly occurred to me that if each of our one million three hundred thousand communicants gave a cent after each meal to our work, we should have fourteen million dollars instead of the twenty-three hundred thousand as at present. I made this remark to a little group of Brotherhood men at a luncheon given by them following one of my noon-day addresses at a Chicago theatre. At the close of the meal one of the men who, unobserved by me, had passed a tumbler round the table, presented me with fourteen pennies. "Bishop," he said, "these fourteen pennies represent $154, for each of us fourteen men is going to give you one cent after each meal during the next year!" The next day, speaking in the theatre again, I related this incident, and immediately began to get letters which showed me that the idea commended itself to a great number of people.

I thereupon put out as a feeler or test one thousand "Pioneer Cans". The response was immediate and encouraging.

Thereupon I submitted a proposed plan to the Diocesan Council, and to leaders among the clergy and laity in whose judgment I reposed confidence. Shortly thereafter in conference with the clergy of the Diocese, I laid before them a very definite plan and asked their cooperation, which was readily given.

The Bishop's Pence should be organized as follows:

(1) The clergy would furnish me constantly corrected lists of all their parishioners. In my files today in my office are the names and addresses of twenty thousand families, including thirty-eight thousand communicants.

(2) They would nominate to me three men, laymen, one of whom I would appoint as the Bishop's Penceman in that parish.

(3) They would observe "Pence Sunday" five times a year, when the Pence cans would be brought in, and there would be occasional sermons and announcements strengthening and supporting the plan.

It became clear at once that it would take time, effort and investigation to set up the plan, and the first thing necessary was a small Bishop's Pence Committee, which I organized to advise with the Bishop. This Committee included two or three clergy, two or three laymen and laywomen. An Executive Secretary and stenographer were necessary at once. The Bishop secured the Secretary, and advanced two thousand dollars to set up the plan. From June until October the Secretary's office was busy securing comprehensive lists, card indexing them, confirming and completing organization of pencemen, preparing instructions to the minutest detail, obtaining bids upon cans, and wrappers, and finally when all was set in order, a Bishop's Pence can, wrapped round with full instructions and explanations was sent direct from the Bishop's Pence Office to each communicant. Thus there was no delay or confusion, as there might have been had they been sent through the various parishes, nor was the parish clergyman put to any trouble.

It was clearly understood from the first that all monies should be sent direct to the Bishop, that ten per cent of the receipts would be taken out for overhead expense, including secretary and stenographer, postage, and so on, and that half of the remainder, that is, forty-five per cent of the total, would be sent by the Bishop direct to each cooperating parish or mission. In the last year and a half more than twenty thousand dollars in checks has been mailed by the Bishop to the Treasurer of the Parish and Mission sharing in the plan, and this has been a veritable god-send to such parishes and missions.

As for the Bishop's share, it has furnished a mobile fund to be used in emergencies, when immediate cash was necessary. For example, within the last two or three weeks when the relief moneys have been held up in the State of Illinois, and the food necessary for our Cathedral Shelter for the poor gave out, I was able to send five hundred dollars quickly; or when the Church Mission of Help in desperate need called for help, I was able to send a thousand dollars quickly; the Diocesan Council, operating on a tightly balanced budget, finds itself in need of money to pay on a mortgage, and the Bishop's Pence provides it; the work among the Assyrians is threatened with foreclosure, the Bishop's Pence comes in with a thousand dollars and saves the situation; fulfilment of the pledge to the National Council is threatened by delays in the payment of parish pledges, the Bishop's Pence comes quickly to save the honor of the Diocese.

Now, it is true that many thousands of communicants are not using the Bishop's Pence. This is to be regretted. If each of the families of the Diocese of Chicago—not communicants, but families—put in one cent a meal, it would bring in $220,000 a year. In other words, if each family contributed the cost of a postage stamp, it would amount to this great sum. So far as I can learn between six and eight thousand families are using the Bishop's Pence in the Diocese of Chicago, but the encouraging feature is that, after almost two years, the number of cans being used is increasing and not decreasing. This in large part is due to the careful superintendence by the Executive Secretary, Mr. Sylvester Lyman, and to the staff of about five hundred pencemen and assistants operating throughout the Diocese.

A year ago I called these pencemen together at my home for a pleasant afternoon. Since that they have met from time to time, and finally have developed such a consciousness of solidarity that they have of their own volition organized into "The Episcopal Pence Men of the Diocese of Chicago."

Twice during the year, under the auspices of the Bishop's Pence, I have broadcast a message to our people. Thus nurturing and increasing the interest in the plan.

AS TO technique of handling the cans as they come in on Pence Sunday, while there is a general standard of doing this, still each Parish develops its own technique. In general, however, it may be said, that the donor who hands in his can is immediately given a new one bearing the same code number (these numbers all being carefully kept at headquarters); after the money is counted, the donor is furnished with a receipt from the local penceman, and later on, a receipt from the Bishop. Thus it is made clear that no leak occurs in transmissal of the money. The success of the plan lies very largely in the follow up. Many people do not bring in their cans on Pence Sunday, and these persons must be followed up by the Penceman and his committee. Thus it comes about that throughout the whole period between Pence Sundays, money is constantly coming in.

When the plan was originated, the Woman's Auxiliary naturally feared that the United Thank Offering blue boxes might suffer. The end of the first year showed that the receipts from the blue boxes had increased and not diminished. Fear was also expressed that the Every Member Canvass would suffer. It has been demonstrated that the contrary was the fact; that contracts had been furnished and re-established, and moreover that many who could not pledge at all were using the pence can. It it is in use not only in big city parishes and suburban centers of wealth, but in the remotest villages and countrysides. And it is serving to unify and strengthen the Diocese, and to break the ground and prepare the way for the great partnership program of the present Centenary Fund, which is seeking a million dollars.

The plan now issues a little quarterly called "Pence Pointers", which is full of bright, attractive information on the plan, and usually illustrated with a cartoon humorously capitalizing the witticisms which arise in connection with it.

Very attractive posters have also been prepared, and are in use throughout the Diocese.

And finally the General Convention, meeting in Atlantic City, by joint resolution of both houses, commended the plan to the whole Church.

A warning should be added. This plan, like any other, will be effective only if it is carefully organized, and is carefully followed up by constant and unremitting and intensive work. It has within it, however, all the elements to strengthen the devotion of the family group in the life of prayer and thanksgiving and sacrificial offering to God. It has in it all the elements that make for a closer unity of clergy and laity in the life, not merely of the parish, but of the Diocese and of the whole Church.

The Oklahoma Spirit

By FRANCES REUBELT,

Tulsa, Oklahoma.

WESTERNERS, especially those who live in the prairie region, are more or less accustomed to dust and drought. Tulsa, which is located east of the prairies, used to be visited regularly in spring and summer by dust storms and all housekeepers knew housecleaning was not just a spring affair, but a task often to be repeated all during the warm weather till late in the autumn.

This Indian village and trading post of some forty years ago has grown into a city of fine residence streets and a business district of skyscrapers, and of recent years these dust storms had almost ceased. This spring, however, such phenomena began again and for weeks every few days the winds brought the dust in great clouds.

Yet, these flurries were nothing compared to what was inflicted on the western counties, that part of the state called the "Panhandle." And the people have taken their troubles valiantly. Everyone who lives out here gets used to high winds and likes them. The air here is usually clean and invigorating. But for the two years past winds and heat and dust have worked havoc. The last two winters have been mild, with little rain or snow. The heat set in early and lasted till late in the autumn months last year. Last February the dust storms began.

Sometimes schools were closed. Often lights were turned on in the streets at midday. In the homes and shops and offices this was done as a matter of course. The winds blew as violently as any blizzard blast and as dangerously, if not more so. But instead of bringing the beneficent snow, they were carrying off the soil, driving it before them for hours and days. Airplane schedules often were cancelled, because the planes could not rise above the dust.

Mothers have written how they sent their children to school dressed in clean clothes, and how they returned brown all over. Besides the mere physical discomforts came the fear of dust pneumonia, and there have been some deaths from this cause. This state of things lasted till the rains came in the month of May.

THE WEST, HOWEVER, has not despaired. There is still a pioneer spirit here not easily overcome. One old farmer in the Panhandle, who has seen his wheat crop blown away these past two years, said recently: "Move out! Not on your life! I've made good crops out here for more than twenty years; came here with statehood twenty-eight years ago, and I shall not give up for a little blow like this!"

An old lady, who weathered the years of the Civil War, told a reporter: "Not till folks boil the dirt of their smokehouses to get the salt will they really learn what hard times mean!" And she is not moving out.

The people of village and town and country have sought the churches and prayed for rain. Recently, a noted divine speaking over the radio in answer to the question if he believed in praying for rain, said he did not. That the world was regulated by natural laws,

Christ Challenges Youth

By FREDERICK WARD KATES,

Theological Seminary Student, Rochester, New York.

ON JULY 17, 1918, news reached Theodore Roosevelt that his youngest son, Quentin, had fallen in aerial combat over France. That autumn he wrote "The Great Adventure", in which book we find these words:

"Only those are fit to live who do not fear to die. . . ."

"No nation can be great unless its sons and daughters have in them the quality to rise level to the needs of heroic days."

"Unless men are willing to fight and die for great ideals . . . ideals will vanish, and the world will become one huge sty of materialism. And unless the women of ideals bring forth the men who are ready thus to live and die, the world of the future will be filled by the spawn of the unfit."

These are strong words—words marked by the vigor and directness of their speaker. What is important is that they are words the world and especially the youth of the world must heed today.

The times in which we are living demand that men and women, especially the young people, "rise level to the needs of heroic days". These are days which need men and women willing to fight and to die for ideals, lest ideals vanish, and the world becomes at best a place in which no one of us would relish living. These are days when persons of heroic calibre are in demand.

It is on this ground that Christ issues His first challenge to the youth of today. He challenges youth to face the problems of the present hour—grave and serious problems—with his high-hearted courage. He challenges youth to tackle the momentous issues upon whose outcome depends the character of the world of the future in youth's characteristic spirit, which is His own spirit—the spirit of gallant and heroic hearts.

No one but feels the pressure of urgent events—political and economic questions of transcendent import; the imminence of war and the instability of the present peace; the iniquities and the injustices in the nation's individual and corporate life; grievous social ills; the spiritual floundering of the present generation. Everyone knows the times are "out of joint" and need righting, quickly and securely. We know, too vividly, that we live on the eve of tremendous changes in every aspect of life: dimly we discern an entirely new world appearing on the horizon.

Youth today has got to make the world it shall live in and its children. What kind of a world does youth want it to be? If youth wishes it to be even mildly Christian in character, does it not behoove youth to array its forces on the Christian side in the conflicts of the age?

The temptation youth and the elder generation today face is to the feeling that their efforts to improve things will be futile. Yet, life never was a sham battle, nor will it ever be. It has ever been a struggle. The forces of good and evil, right and wrong, have always been contending.

So Christ's first challenge to youth today is to enter into this conflict of gigantic forces that shape the course of human lives, nations and the world in His Spirit. He summons youth to display its mettle and come to grips with the tremendous task which confronts it. Christ challenges youth to enter into the troubles of our times, into its struggles, as young men and women who are fit to live, because not fearing to die in behalf of worthy causes, as young men and women who have not shrunk from the joy of life, the duty of life, the danger and the hardness of life. Christ challenges youth to "rise level to the needs of heroic days"—to meet and to tackle the problems of the age, of their own lives, in His own heroic spirit.

CHRIST today is calling young people to elect Him as its Leader. Even more: He challenges youth to follow His lead!

In Jesus of Nazareth young people have not only a sure guide as it assumes its task of erecting a new world out of the passing order, but also the only Leader who can and who wants, with all His heart, to lead mankind out of the intellectual, moral and social morass it is wallowing in. Yet, strangely, this person is a person modern youth, for a number of reasons, scarcely know.

Without any doubt the Manliest Man in human history, Jesus was the most attractive, winsome and magnetic person imaginable. His personality wove a magic spell around all with whom He came in contact. Wherever He went, there also came cheer, health, sanity, and restored good feelings and courage. He was a radiant and joyous man in the full bloom of manhood. But He was also the sternest teacher that has lived and the most demanding of leaders who ever won a host of followers to His allegiance. Anger as well as love divine was a sinew of His soul. He made the leaders of His nation cringe and wither before Him as He stood before them, a solitary majestic figure. At the same time He was the man whose kindness to women and children was sublime. And whose will was more invincible, irrefragable, and whose courage more dauntless? and who was ever more free from fear? and what man ever walked with firmer and steadier step right into the heart of the sun?

And youth need entertain no anxiety about the merits and abilities of the leader it must follow, if it proposes itself to live in a world that will bear any semblance to a world fit for men to dwell in. This greatest Leader of men of all ages in Himself and in His achievement remains unique. His is the greatest name in history. Today He is still the most powerful spiritual force that ever worked for good on and in humanity. He is not a leader of the past, but men and women today are finding Him living—living—the most alive person or thing they know. What name can compare with His? This is the person who dares youth to follow Him as its Leader.

Thirdly, Christ issues an unreserved challenge not only to youth, but to the whole world to out-think Him. Men haven't begun to tap the profound depths and to scale the spacious heights of His thought and being. Never was there a mind like His.

Jesus said: "I am the way, the truth, and the life." He is the way in which history should move. He is the truth—mankind knows it. He is the Life—He is the Power which can carry men and women forward. In this one man, in this unique man and person, we find the truth about God and the universe in which we live.

Young people today are bewildered about many things. Young people today want vital intellectual and spiritual leadership. All too many young folk have drifted away from the churches and organized religion, because they feel the Church is not supplying this need. Young people know it cannot have mastery of themselves or of life without a strong creative faith.

Well, faith in the living Christ is just this vibrating and invigorating faith that young people are yearning for and seeking to find. For every young person who wants it, there is available the solution of their perplexity about their problems, the cure for their atrophy of conviction, true spiritual leadership, a creative faith to live by, and the only tenable and sound interpretation of life, God, and ourselves and the universe.

The world order waits for Christ. The world waits for youth to bring Christ, His spirit, His way of thinking, and of living, back into human life again. In a living and breathing Christian faith youth will find the answer to all its needs and hopes. Christ challenges youth to accept His faith, His convictions, His promises, His way of life and of thought.

CHRIST challenges youth to live and to die for what He lived and died and created.

The Kingdom of God (the reign of God) is Jesus' great work, a kingdom of men, built through men, with the God of Love reigning in the hearts of all its members. There is no parallel to His creation, so durable and so impregnable against the tides of time and the forces of the world.

Christ challenges youth to put all its weight and energies behind the spreading of the reign of God in human life. He challenges youth to give its all in the effort to make the world Christian.

The Christian Church is the instrument for continuing the life and spread of Jesus' divine kingdom among men. Christ flings His challenge in the face of youth to support the Church, to work with it and for it. If Jesus' way of living is to win this world, the Church will have to do the winning, for Jesus' program for mankind has no other entry.

We hear on all sides these days complaints, especially by the young, that the Church is dull or dead, fails to make contact with the realities of modern life, ignores the problems that beset the younger generation, is uninterested in the issues of this changing age. Young people fail to find in churches the welcome and fellowship which they feel should be the mark of the Christian society; the daily life of professed Christians they find doesn't accord with their religious declarations; church services of worship too commonly seem unreal, formal, unsatisfying; the un-Christian spirit of division among different Christian bodies and within denominations makes for scepticism among them.

Christ offers youth but another challenge, on this ground—to remedy the situation just described. The call of Christ to youth today is for youth to step forth and to win for itself leadership in the Christian Church that will lead the march into the new world.

And the youth of today have the opportunity of making Christianity again what it was in the beginning—a youth movement. Youth today in its 'teens and twenties can win the world for Christ, if it will.

Finally, Christ's great challenge to youth today is to enlist for active, personal service behind Him—is to become disciples.

Christ challenges youth to abandon religion of the sort which is, to use Matthew Arnold's phrase, "morality touched with emotion", and to follow His faith, which is a religion severe in its demands and no comfortable arm-chair philosophy or holy tea-party sort of thing. He challenges youth to be like the early Christians, men and women who outlived, out-laughed and out-died all others.

Christ offers youth highest adventure, a glorious task; and He calls for idealism, devotion, sacrifice, courage and reverence. His way remains the noblest way of life, and it still hurls its challenge at the youth of today as of yesterday and of tomorrow. May the spirit of young men and women leap to meet it!

The News of the Forward Movement

By ARTHUR M. SHERMAN,

Member of the Staff of The Forward Movement.

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT is not a spasmodic attempt at renewal. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit it represents a determination to bring a new and continuing spirit into the life of the Church which will give a deeper meaning to discipleship and greater power to the Church's service in the world.

As a help toward this goal the Commission on the Forward Movement has issued a manual for Church-wide use entitled "Follow On!" containing the Book of Acts and many other helps to Christian living.

How to Use "Follow On".

The Rev. Theodore Sinclair Will, rector of St. John's Church, Hampton, Virginia, established in 1610, gives the following fine suggestions to his parishioners for the use of this manual:

"I am enclosing the new manual of the Movement, for use through Trinitytide. It is priceless in its simple and practical usefulness. It is of convenient size to take with you every day. Carry it in your pocket or in your purse. Never be without it.

"May I say a word as to how to use it?

"For individual use: Read a section each day, according to directions in the inside front cover, and at some convenient time and place. Think over what you have read, and then turn to the back of the little book for your prayers and individuals acts.

"For family use: I hope that this book will commend itself for simple usefulness for family prayers. After the family is gathered together, let some one read a paragraph of the Bible, and follow the reading with one or more prayers, from the back of the book. Some families will prefer the breakfast table, some the supper table, before or after the meal. I guarantee that there will come a strengthening of the family tie with the restoration of this custom. I pray that more families will discover the great happiness of such united religion. I hope that young married people, starting out on their voyage of life, will realize the important need of such a usage.

"For organization use: Please use the group devotions on the inside back cover (page 13), at all organization meetings. The leader should take the invocation, the first half, to the semi-colon, and the group should repeat in unison the petition in the second half. The Act of Adoration is to be taken by the leader, and the group should repeat the ascriptions, 'Glory be to Thee, O God' This would be followed by one or more of the prayers.

"I sincerely hope that no meeting will be held in the Parish without these devotions, including the Prayer for the Forward Movement."

The Program of Western New York.

In carrying out the principle of the Forward Movement Commission that individual dioceses work out for themselves details of the Movement, the Diocese of Western New York, in addition to circulating the pamphlets of Bible reading, has adopted a program for putting the Forward Movement into effect in the Diocese, which includes the following points:

First, embracing the primary attitudes of discipleship it is recommended a rule of life (given below) be accepted in whole or in part as a guide to Christian living. To the observance of this rule is attributed, to a considerable extent, the increased attendance upon services, the larger confirmation classes and the deepened interest apparent in the diocese.

Secondly, that there be held by the clergy frequent quiet days or devotional hours, leading up, when the people are awakened to the value of such times of withdrawal, to diocesan conference retreats.

Third, that there be brought to the people the vision of a great need outside themselves, rightly believing that the greatest single influence in developing the spiritual life of the Church at home has been the call of the missionary enterprise, not only in lands abroad but in the desperate situation facing the Church in America.

Fourth, that each and all face and undertake the task of bringing the unchurched and the indifferent into the fellowship of Christ's religion by personal contact. To this end members should strive to reach the children in the schools by religious education in school time; and, second, that through the social agencies members of the Church be put in touch with those on relief by which a point of contact may be established and the unchurched brought into religious groups through the establishment of friendships; third, personal evangelism among lapsed or indifferent members by the channels of friendship; and, lastly, earnest prayer that the Light of the world may shine in the hearts of all and into every corner of the world.

The Rule of Discipleship:

"Desiring to learn from Jesus Christ the Way of Life, I renew my pledge of discipleship, and in order to make it effective, I will earnestly endeavor to:

"1. Worship in the church at least once every Sunday and use my Prayer Book and my will to make my worship real.

"2. Pray daily, at a stated time; and also spiritualize my activities by interspersing them constantly with brief prayers.

"3. Read the Bible, particularly the Gospels, daily, to gain new insight into the mind of Jesus.

"4. Serve, by (a) testing my mental attitudes towards social and personal relationships by the Mind of Christ; (b) striving to influence others to take part in the Church's worship; (c) setting aside a definite percentage of my income for the Church."

The clergy are urged to keep constantly in the front of their teaching, both in the pulpit and in parish organizations, the four points of the rule—worship, prayer, study and service, with their innumerable subtopics.

Pamphlet-ed to Death!

Fear has been expressed that the Forward Movement Commission might be pamphleting the Church to death. No, so thinks Bishop Stewart, "I do not think you are 'pamphleting the Church to death'. I think you are stimulating it to life. It seems to me your summer pamphlet is very timely."

Bishop Capers of West Texas writes to his clergy: "It seems to me that the Forward Movement Commission has placed in the hands of the Church literature of priceless value, for it breathes the spirit of the Christ Himself, and it should stir us all to resolute action. If this literature is given to your parishioners, I am sure that it will be of incalculable value to the spiritual life of your parish."

Parish Prayer Groups.

A splendid recommendation made by Bishop Fiske to his clergy is as follows: "In every parish appoint a group of people—maybe half a dozen in a small mission; half a hundred in a large parish; any number in between—to be pledged as a prayer group to use the weekly special intentions already announced for the whole parish. Let them learn to pray in their own words."

St. Paul's Church, Syracuse, formed a group of sixty persons, pledged to pray daily for the special weekly intentions. Other parishes have varying sized groups.

The rector of Emmanuel Parish, Baltimore, one of the fine old parishes in that city of vigorous Church life, writes as follows: "It may interest you to know that we are giving our entire thought in this parish now to the Forward Movement and I am delighted with the keen interest being manifested by our communicants."

Study the Books of Acts.

Representatives of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Province of the Mid-West from about twenty different dioceses, meeting recently in Chicago, have asked the Forward Movement Commission to supply the Church immediately with Leaders' Helps for group study of the Acts. This will be considered at the meeting of the Commision on June 12. In the meantime a limited number of the very fine Helps by Miss Grace Lindley, Executive Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, written in 1921, are available and may be had on application to the Forward Movement, 223 West Seventh Street, Cincinnati, Ohio. Ask for Miss Lindley's "Studies in the Acts". They are meant for leaders and are useful for any adult groups or older young people. A charge of five cents is made to cover handling and postage.

which could not be influenced. But not so with these good folk.

One of the heroes of the drought area is the Methodist minister, the Rev. R. L. Wells of Guyman, Oklahoma. He prayed for hours every day and for weeks till his voice failed him and he was taken ill with laryngitis. His congregation then took up the duty of continued prayer and when the rains began, he said the people must have a thanksgiving celebration.

A few weeks ago the first moisture this region received came in the form of snow and the people rushed out of doors and shouted for joy.

Some of the more enlightened class have admitted their farming methods have been wrong. The old Indians, the cattle-men, warned the homesteaders of fifty years ago, not to plow up all the land: not to kill out the fields of "buffalo grass," which used to grow to man's height and covered these vast prairies with a beautiful growth, the natural food of the buffalo, and one of the best cattle foods known. But, like all other pioneers, these last panhandlers would not heed this wise counsel and are learning now by the saddest of experience.

The agricultural colleges of the state, the largest of which is at Stillwater, are doing good service, teaching farmers how to prevent soil erosion and to do "row planting." Much praise is also being given the CCC camps and their work of tree-planting, trench-digging and other efforts to redeem the land.

Very few people are contemplating a change of habitat. There is a spirit of real optimism prevailing: They have weathered other depressions, other seasons of crop failure, and they say generally they are going to weather this one.

whether in our positions, either in the pew or at the Holy Table, we are dignified and worshipful, or blindly following something we know nothing about.

A story is told of a young priest at St. Patrick's Roman Cathedral in New York. He awkwardly stumbled at an important place in the service and fell. Apologizing to the cardinal, he received the following warning from that august bishop, "You'd better not do it too often or some of these Anglicans will be imitating you."

The question is whether we shall be blind imitators or real worshippers—that is all.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Splendid Tracts and Gospel Portions for Free Distribution.

Next to the preaching and teaching of God's Word, nothing in modern times has been so effective in bringing people to Christ and growth in Him, as Christian literature.

We missionaries in foreign lands find gospel tracts, booklets and gospel portions a tremendous help in our work. It seems to some of us that this phase of evangelism could be made more of in Western lands.

Attention has been drawn to the unusual opportunity which presents itself at this time, because, since cutting down of the hours of labor, the working classes in particular have more time to read. When such organizations as the American Tract Society, New York City, the Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, Nashville, Tenn., and other societies, are willing to supply good tracts and booklets free of charge, it seems a pity for churches, Sunday schools and young people's organizations not to make systematic distribution of this splendid literature in their communities.

In addition to the above, admirable portions of Scripture, such as the gospels and Acts can also be had gratis from The Scripture Gift Mission, Eccleston Hall, Victoria, London, S. W. 1. The scriptures are printed on the best of paper, are illustrated and most attractive. The Scripture Gift Mission has been generous to furnish us with many hundreds of these splendid little booklets in Chinese, Russian, Japanese, and English, for use in our work in Manchuria. They can be had in almost any language.

The blessings of such splendid literature as mentioned above when distributed judiciously, backed by prayer, and followed up with an invitation to Christian services, cannot be over-estimated at this time, when Satan is using every means possible to destroy or hinder the gospel. Surely God's people everywhere should avail themselves of this opportunity to present Him to the lost through the printed page, when it can be had for the asking and can be distributed so easily and effectively.

Good-bye to Opium.

Woman's Auxiliary Supply Department secretaries will like this little note from Blanche Myers whose office is in St. James' Hospital, Anking, China:

"Just now I glanced out of my office window and saw four men patients wearing our Woman's Auxiliary bathrobes, and having their pictures taken. It had been raining a little, but that did not affect their spirits; they were all smiling. Just then the hospital chaplain came in and told me they were saying goodbye to opium and this was a farewell picture. All are cured and they say they will never touch it again."

Real Lenten Offerings.

Apapahoe Indian children naturally don't have much money, but somehow at St. Michael's Mission, Ethete, Wyoming, they produce astonishing results in their Lenten Offering boxes. One girl this year had $19.50 in her box and five others each had over eight dollars. One of the girls began planning for her offering months before Lent, planting potatoes. She took the best possible care of her potato patch, won a prize at the county fair, and then presented two enormous bags of potatoes as her offering.

BOOK REVIEWS

METULAH. A Drama in Five Acts: By Erwin Tauscher. Cloth. Pp. 126. Published by The Christopher Publishing House, Boston, Mass. Price, $1.50.

This is a novel treatment of the time of our Lord, embracing the portraiture of the awful hours associated with the crime of Calvary. While it is called a drama, tragedy looms large in a certain section, where Metulah's normal feminine nature bursts into avenging fury.

The suggestive feature of this play is that Judas is delineated as the lover of Metulah, whose devotion to him cannot be quenched. By far too much stress uniformly is laid upon the sordid and sinister character which art and literature have framed about him. We must needs discover, as the creator of this production has done, the essential nature of the man. Judas is undoubtedly a winsome person. He is the only real Jew in the college of the apostles; he is chosen, because of his ability, to manage the finances of the Lord and His company. His weakness lay in his stressing the temporal things and getting but shadowy visions of the glorious message, which though not understood by the others, became in the future a stirring remembrance. Only pity becomes us as he is discovered self-murdered, the author believing that thereby he sought redemption.

Caiaphas and Pilate are well presented; a reasonable appraisal of the place the two men occupied would accord with the author's ideal. We may commend the tolerant view he takes of the Roman Governor, whom we may believe to have been swayed by the vexatious insistence of the high priest and his subordinate priestly cohorts.

There is a Shakesperian movement and terminology which adds to the charm of this play. It is a really strong character study; and will, in its rendition, justify the aim of the author to present life as it truly was lived in that epochal period of the world's history. Wherever in any parish the dramatic spirit is awaiting expression, this production will serve to engage the whole-hearted cooperation of the actors.

PREFACE TO RELIGION: By Bernard Iddings Bell. Pp. 198. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York City. Price, $1.75.

A typical Canon Bell's book of religious information and a good deal of inspiration. The book contains five lectures of the Lyman Coleman Foundation delivered at the Lafayette College this year. They are mainly analytical and informative.

The book is a history of religion rather than an interpretation of religious systems. The first Lecture is a brief outline of "Origins". The most outstanding theories of what is religion are carefully considered in this Lecture. The lecturer does not believe that scientific theories and discoveries will ever be able to eradicate the religious sense planted in human nature. "Development of Hebrew Religion," in the second Lecture is a study of the Old Testament revelation of God, followed by "The Emergence of Christianity," the author begins with the year of our Lord A. D. 33, with a brief but comprehensive outline of the development of the New Testament, Creeds, Cult, and Code in the Christian religion. "The Kingdom in the World." is an outline of thr outstanding sects within the Church and their doctrinal differences. A church history sketch. The last Lecture, "Now and Tomorrow," is a discussion of present religious problems, chief of which are the intellectual, the devotional, the moral and the ecclesiastical. These are well presented. The book is a source of information and of inspiration.

POETRY OF LIFE. By Rev. Walter E. Isenhour. Cloth; pp. 204. Pub. by the Meador Publishing Co., Boston, Mass. $1.50.

In these days of drab depression, one is challenged to find poetry in any of the sordid things which abound. To be poetical, one must think; we seem to have no time for that. The strife is too exacting. And yet, think we must; for the inner voice will not be silenced. Let us find time to read poetry.

The author has set to the task of affording us material for this part of our strenuous life, by the choice and treatment of such suggestive titles as, "It's easy just to quit;" "When is a man a man?" "It's easy just to criticise;" "The sweet hereafter;" "The worthwhile life here." He is a lover of nature and assays to interpret her winning ways to the comprehension of his fellowmen.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

St. Vincent of Paul

Within the past year we have had programs on a saint of England, St. Hilda, and one of Ireland, St. Columbanus. Tonight we have a French saint, who is said to be the Father of Modern Social Service.

Our hero's family name was "of Paul", but we shall call it simply "Paul", as French families coming to this country usually drop the "of" to their names. Vincent's father, Mr. Paul, was a farmer who lived at the foot of the mountains that divide France and Spain. He had quite a number of sheep, and little Vincent's task when a small boy was to watch them. He, Vincent, was very fond of dreaming and praying and he soon found a large oak tree that was easy to climb. So up this he used to go every day to watch the sheep and to pray and dream. As the oak was hollow, he soon built a little chapel for himself inside of it.

While very young he was once sent by his father to the mill to get some flour. When he got back his father asked him where the flour was. He said that he had met so many beggars on his way home that he had given all the flour away. His father told him hereafter to give only as much as he could hold in his two hands to each beggar. So the little tender-hearted boy could give some away, but his father was sure to get some of his own flour when Vincent was carrying it.

As he grew older it was decided that he should study for the ministry. He started at the age of twelve, and after twelve years was ordained priest. This was in the year 1600, an easy date to remember. He was twenty-four years old at that time.

Sold as Slave Three Times.

Five years after this he was fortunate enough to inherit some money, so he took a trip to Marseilles, about 200 miles from his home, which was at Toulouse at this time. There he decided to take a sea trip. No sooner was the ship out of the harbor, however, before they were captured by pirates from North Africa. So Vincent and his companions were given their choice of becoming Mohammedans and settling as free men in Africa, or being sold as slaves. Vincent was sold three times. His last master was a man who had given up Christianity to get freedom. He now had three wives. One of these asked Vincent to sing her a Christian song and to tell her about Christ. She was so moved by the story that she asked her husband about Christianity. The result was that he talked of Christ to Vincent and a little later the two of them escaped to Italy and freedom. We wish the lady in question could have become a Christian, but as the Turks punished any one with death who left their religion I am afraid she remained a Mohammedan.

On quite a number of occasions people wanted to make Vincent an abbot or a bishop, but he always declined the promotion. He now went to live in Paris and there did most of the things for which his name is famous.

Confraternity of Charity.

On one occasion he was preaching in a small town just outside of Paris when a lady came to him and asked him to appeal for some help for a very poor family. This he did in his sermon. The next day, when he went himself to call on the family, he found quite a procession of people had taken them help. He thought: "This family does not know how to manage or save; today they will feast, tomorrow they will starve. Some one ought to help them regularly." So the next day he started to form a kind of welfare association to look after such cases. He called it a Confraternity of Charity. Within a year the idea was copied in about thirty placed around Paris. Out of the movement grew the Roman Catholic Order of Sisters of Charity that do so much good in many of our larger cities today.

Chaplains of Prisons.

Another field soon opened. A friend of Vincent's was the head of all the prisons in France. He used his influence to have Vincent appointed Royal, or, as we would say, National, Chaplain of Prisons. He found that the conditions in the prisons were awful, and that the prisoners were hardened, depraved and blasphemous. But he went to the authorities and had many abuses remedied. Vincent now spent much time among the prisoners, listening to their stories, sympathizing with them and praying with them. Everywhere he went he had a wonderful influence over them. On one occasion he found a prisoner weeping to see his wife and children. The chaplain offered to take his place and did so, working in chains for some weeks at the hardest kind of labor before he was recognized and released.

Retreats.

He next noticed how tired and discouraged many of the clergy became in their parish work. So he organized a system of retreats, as he called them, where they could come aside from their work and rest and pray. These became very popular in quite a number of churches. We often have these, we remember, also in our church. Quite often they are held for a clergy of a diocese, or for all that will come.

Home for Lost Children.

Another matter now claimed his attention. Every year parents would abandon from three hundred to four hundred children on the streets of Paris. The police would pick these up and shove them into some shed where they would be so badly treated that many died in a few hours. It is said that many were even poisoned to get rid of them. When Vincent heard of this he could neither eat nor sleep until he had taken steps to remedy it. He called in his Sisters of Charity. They got about $3,000 from the queen and smaller amounts from others until a yearly income of about $10,000 was gotten. With this he built the first Foundling Hospital, or as the French call it, "Home for Lost Children."

Vincent Paul did many other fine things so that he is called one of the Fathers of Modern Social Service. I think that all will agree that he well deserves the title of saint that has been conferred on him by his Church.

The End.

Diocese of Atlanta.

Warrick Elrod was elected president of the Y. P. S. L. of the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, for a period of three months. Under the new ruling, there will be two groups of officers, a three-month summer term and nine-month winter session.

Elrod graduated from Boys' High, Atlanta, this June, winning a four-year scholarship, including $1,800 cash, to Harvard and a gold "B" for having an honor roll average for the entire three years.

The Y. P. S. L. edits the Church paper, "The Angelus," and is one of the most active organizations of the Church of the Incarnation.

Thomas Lee Hill, former president, was elected first vice-president at the Convention held in May. He also won a scholarship to Camp Mikell, having done the most outstanding work for the parish during the past year.

The Diocesan Executive Committee met at the home of the president, Robert M. Bandy, Atlanta, June 15.. Definite plans were made to continue the extension work which was formulated and started last year. Tom Hill, first vice-president, will head this committee.

Mary Louise Cordes, Cathedral, Atlanta, was appointed librarian to be in charge of material to help in building programs. Jessica Johnston, Grace Church, Gainesville, second vice-president, is program chairman.

Ben Beasley, Church of Our Saviour, and Bob Acosta, All Saints', Atlanta, were named as a publicity committee. An effort is being made to make the Y. P. S. L. as well known throughout the diocese as is the B. Y. P. U., C. E. or Epworth League to the reading public.

Bill Sparrow, St. Luke's, Atlanta, is in charge of the Personal Evangelism Committee. St. Luke's Y. P. S. L. acted as a testing ground for this department last year, and through the increased interest which this committee helped bring about the membership was tripled.

Summer Conference June 30-July 6.

Felowship—one of God's rarest gifts! In these bonds our Young People were privileged again to meet at the Annual Inter Diocesan Conference held at Alfred University, from June 30 to July 6. The conference was a full one, with splendid opportunities to learn about our Church and Her teachings. A variety of courses embracing every sphere of religious life were offered. They included Personal Religion, Problems of the Bible, Church School Teaching and Young People's Work.

A most capable group of lecturers conducted these courses. Discussion groups and forums proved splendid mediums for constructive expression, and the many devotional services developed a deeper spiritual trend. Recreation included a dance, tennis, baseball, hiking, archery and out-door bowling.—St. Paul's Chimes.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

DEAN WEST ELECTED DEAN OF THE PHILADELPHIA DIVINITY SCHOOL.

The Very Rev. Stanley R. West, B. D., Dean of the Convocation of Norristown and rector of Calvary Church, Conshohocken, Pa., was elected Dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School at a meeting recently of the joint Boards of Trustees and Overseers of this seventy-year-old seminary founded during the Episcopate of the late Bishop Alonzo W. Potter.

Election of Dean West marks another step in the plans for the reorganization of this school, which had their inception more than a year ago. While the Dean-elect has not as yet announced his acceptance, it is said, he is giving it his favorable consideration, and is being urged also by many members of the alumni to take over the responsibility. There is to be another meeting of the joint boards in the latter part of July, by which time it is hoped that the full amount of $70,000 necessary to guarantee the operation of the new plans during the coming school year will have been raised.

Dean West is an alumnus of the school and, in the event of his acceptance of the deanship, will bring to that office an experience gained in twenty-five years of a ministry in practical parochial work and in a Christian Social Service work which has brought him into intimate touch with virtually every variety of human problem in a community, and in both of which fields he has held a position of leadership. He is a native of Philadelphia and was born in this city in 1884. He is a graduate of Girard College of the class of 1899, and of the Philadelphia Divinity School in the class of 1910. His entire ministry has been spent in the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

His rectorship of Calvary Church has been marked by increased growth and development of that parish and by its expanding influence and leadership in the community, in which Dean West has been an outstanding personality. Throughout the years of the depression Dean West has been the head of the Conshohocken Civilian Relief Association, a community organization which has given a superlative service in meeting the many problems and human readjustments arising from the lack of employment, and in this service his parishioners have been generous sharers. In addition, he is also a member of the Montgomery County Relief Board by appointment of the Governor of Pennsylvania.

During the World War he served as a United States Army Chaplain at Camp Taylor in Kentucky and Camp Devens in Massachusetts. At present he is chaplain of the John F. De Haven American Legion Post of Conshohocken, named in memory of the youngest boy who made the supreme sacrifice in the war.

In the selection of Dean West the joint boards of the divinity school believe they have chosen one whose practical experience and personality provides the right man to head up the successful operation of the reorganization plans, especially the new departure which calls for a strong emphasis upon the clinical training of its students.

It is planned to give this clinical training of students a position of major importance in the school curriculum, without in any way minimizing the academic side. During the three-year course of each student at the school he will be required to spend a total of nine months in resident clinical training in mental and general hospitals, and in social agencies and institutions, under the immediate direction and supervision of a graduate in theology and also a physician, psychiatrist or other specialist in social work. In this way the student, before he receives ordination, will have had daily and intimate contact with the many and varied human problems he will, following ordination, be called upon to meet in his later ministry. In order to provide the necessary time for his clinical training, it is proposed to have the school year cover twelve months instead of the usual eight months.

ACTIVITIES OF THE BISHOP PAYNE DIVINITY SCHOOL.

Students from the Bishop Payne Divinity School at Petersburg, Va., the Episcopal Church's seminary for Negro candidates, have been maintaining a playground for children of the community. Among many other events they conducted a marble tournament which grew in interest until on the final day there were as many cars parked around the school as at commencement time. There has been no possible place for indoor activities for the children, but a vestry room recently added to St. Stephen's Church is to be used next winter. The rector of St. Stephen's, the Rev. Emmet E. Miller, is warden of the Divinity School.

Women in some of the Negro parishes in Philadelphia have promised the Divinity School a scholarship for next year. Scholarship aid is particularly important for the Negro candidates, many of whom are unable to bear all the expenses of the seminary course. Mr. Miller hopes to organize similar groups among the colored parishes in Washington, Chicago and New York. In Philadelphia there are four clergy graduates of Bishop Payne School, Washington and Chicago each have three, and New York five.

Besides assisting Mr. Miller in St. Stephen's, the students have preached and officiated in other churches, and in every instance, Mr. Miller says, they have given perfect satisfaction and have increased the good reputation of the school.

THE SEMINARY SUMMER SCHOOL.

The Virginia Theological Seminary Summer School held its second annual session June 17-21. Fifty-seven men were registered, of whom forty-four were full-time resident students, five part-time and eight non-resident attendants from nearby parishes. Fifteen dioceses and missionary districts were represented. Three men registered from the Diocese of Albany, one from Georgia, and one each from the Missionary Districts of Idaho and Kyoto, Japan. The nearby dioceses were well represented. The total enrollment showed an increase of some ten or twelve over last year.

The courses offered were valuable and ably conducted. Professor Stanley Brown-Serman lectured on Some Aspects of the Teaching of St. Paul. Rev. A. T. Mollegen's course on the Gospel of St. Mark was an interpretation of the mind of St. Mark, representing the Gospel as an early Christian apologetic for a suffering discipleship while preserving its historical value and factual integrity. Professor Clifford L. Stanley conducted his course, Christianity and the Modern World, with great skill, keeping a normally controversial subject well out of the realm of controversy, and making no attempt to offer specific solutions to specific problems, but presenting clearly and incontrovertibly the Christian philosophy and principles upon which the solution of all problems must be conducted. Dr. Charles Lowry, in his course on Present Tendencies in Theology, summarized individually the thought of the leading theologians of the day.

Coming at the most difficult hour of the day, that immediately preceding lunch, Professor C. Sturgis Ball's course on the Preaching Values of the Minor Prophets was one of the high spots of the session. He applied the prophetic teachings to modern problems, and generously garnished his lectures with keen wit and humor.

Rev. Thomas L. Harris, lecturing on Psychiatry and Pastoral Work, distinguished between the particular genius of the medical profession and that of the ministry, and suggested methods by which ministers might deal with human problems.

The third session of the Seminary Summer School will be held next year during the week immediately following commencement. It is hoped that many who come for the graduation exercises will remain for the Summer School.

KULING CONFERENCE.

The week of July 8, 1935, may become of a certain historical importance in the Chinese Church, for then is to be held the first general Chinese Summer Conference for Church Work, at Kuling. Funds were provided by an interested group at the Sewanee Conference last year ,who hope that the Kuling Conference may be as valuable to Chinese Church workers as Sewanee, Wellesley, Blue Mountain and the other summer conferences are in the United States. Bishop Huntington is chairman of the Kuling Conference; Bishop Tsen is chaplain. The daily program would be familiar to any who have attended the American conferences.

FROM THE BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS.

Notes of progress are always to be found in "Our Mountain Work", the monthly paper of the Blue Ridge Archdeaconry in Virginia.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Peters, the lay workers at the Cubbage Hollow Mission, say that "shooting, stabbings and crimes of that sort have not been so frequent as they were last year. If we could only get rid of the liquor traffic, fights and quarrels would soon be a thing of the past." The Sunday school at this place outnumbers the day school. It meets all the year round, rain or snow, missing only one session when there was a funeral not far away, "and nothing can compete with a funeral in the mountains".

A fortunate chance brought two pots of Easter lilies to St. Luke's Mission, Tanner's Ridge, Va., last Easter, where they had never been seen before. One of the boys said, "Ain't they the biggest morning glories you ever saw?" It was here, too, that the missionary, Miss Janet E. Walton, provided a birthday cake with candles for a family party, and that also was something unprecedented. "I'm sixty-eight years old," the grandmother said, "and I ain't never seen anything like that afore." Bishop Goodwin confirmed six people at this mission, including the most influential man in the community, with his wife. Their son-in-law shortly afterward followed their example.

Clothing provided through the Woman's Auxiliary supply department is indispensable here, making it possible for children to go to school who otherwise could not, keeping others warm and well through winter cold, and bringing in a little income for the mission through sales at low prices to those who can afford to pay. Miss Walton notes the gradual effect of the Church's life on the people—"To see them change from a religion full of emotion, loud and long preaching, and the raving on in prayers, as if God were deaf and couldn't hear, to a religion that is quiet and full of peace and love for all mankind! To see the faces of the children change from that of almost stupidity to that of brightness and intelligence!"

A visit to the National Church Periodical Club office at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, on a warm afternoon in early June discovered the staff up to its elbows unpacking a crate of new Christmas cards. The central office sells them to parish C. P. C. secretaries at a rate which enables the parish branches to resell at a profit for the benefit of their C. P. C. work.

Annual Commemoration, Order of Jamestown.

The first Holy Communion and the first permanent English settlement in America, will celebrate their three hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary at the Robert Hunt Shrine, Jamestown Island, the Third Sunday after Trinity, July 7, 1935, at 3:30 P. M.

The First Services at Jamestown.

'When I first went to Virginia, I well remember wee did hang an awning (which is an old saile) to three or foure trees, to shadow us from the Sunne, our walles were railes of wood, our seates unhewed trees, till we cut plankes; our Pulpit a bar of wood nailed to two neighbouring trees: in foule weather we shifted into an old rotten tent; for we had few better, and this came by way of advanture for new . . . . wee had daily Common Prayer morning and evening, every Sunday two Sermons, and every three months the holy communion, till our minister died (the Rev. Robert Hunt); but our prayers daily, with an homily on Sundaies, we continued two or three years after, till more preachers came."—Capt. John Smith.

Order of Jamestown.

E. Ruffin Jones, D. D., Rector.

The service of July 7 commemorates the first known celebration of the Holy Communion in the first permanent English settlement in America. The original service was on the Third Sunday after Trinity, 1607, which date may well be called the birthday not only of the American Episcopal Church, but of Protestant Christianity in America as well. This first Communion at Jamestown marked the settlement of disputes among the colonists, which were of such a grave nature that they bid fair to disrupt the whole enterprise. Their Godly Chaplain, the Rev. Robert Hunt, composed these differences, and administered the sacrament of peace and fellowship. "We all received from him the Holy Communion together as a pledge of reconciliation, for we all loved him for his exceeding goodness." "He planted the first Protestant Church in America and laid down his life in the foundation of Virginia." On the morning after the service, Sir Christopher Newport sailed for England, leaving at Jamestown one hundred five men, the first permanent English settlement in America.

Both the old Jamestown Communion Silver of 1661, and the new memorial silver, presented to the Shrine by members of the Colonial Dames, will be used. The music will be in charge of the choir of Bruton Parish Church, Williamsburg, Virginia, Mrs. J. N. Purcell, Director.

Possibly the Oldest Baptismal Font in the Country.

The baptismal font in the morning chapel of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, is at least 250 years old—undoubtedly one of the oldest and possibly the oldest, in constant use in the United States. For this information Richmond Parade is indebted to J. Jordan Leake of the legal firm of Leake & Buford.

According to a sketch prepared twenty years ago by the Rev. J. J. Gravatt, D. D., "the font was brought from Rochelle, France, in 1687, by a band of Huguenots, who, in that year, settled New Rochelle, N. Y. They placed it in a church built by them there immediately after their arrival.

"We may reasonably assume that they would not have brought so cumbrous a thing unless it was valuable on account of a previous history, most probably of long duration, long before 1687, for which they esteemed it very highly, This colony was later disbanded by deaths and removals, and the services of the church discontinued.

"The statement is that by common consent the font was given to Mrs. Wheat," the sketch concludes, "and Mrs. Wheat's husband, the Rev. John C. Wheat, formerly of Winchester, having been ordained by Bishop Richard Channing Moore, she gave the font to this church, which is a memorial to Bishop Moore."

The venerable font rests today on a new pedestal.—Clarence Boykin, in The Times-Dispatch.

On Thursday, June 27, in the parish house of St. John's Church, Roanoke, the Executive Board of the diocese held its first session since the election of several new members by the Annual Council of the diocese in May. The membership of the Executive Board as now constituted is as follows: Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, D. D., and Messrs. C. Francis Cocke and John McCleary, Jr., of Roanoke; Rev. Carleton Barnwell, D. D., Colonel William King, Jr., and Mr. Daniel A. Payne, of Lynchburg; Rev. Ambrose H. Beavin, of Hot Springs; Mr. Hampton B. Crawford, of Pocahontas; Miss Jane Byrd Pendleton, President of the Woman's Auxiliary, and Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, D. D., of Wytheville; Rev. John J. Gravatt, D. D., and Mr. Herbert McK. Smith, of Staunton; Mr. Charles P. Macgill, of Pulaski, and Rev. E. R. Rogers, Ph. D., of Covington.

Of especial importance in Thursday's meeting was the reorganization by Bishop Jett, of the several departments of the Board for service during the coming year. The first name in each group is that of the chairman:

Department of Christian Social Service—Messrs. Rogers, Gravatt, Macgill and Crawford.

Field Department—Messrs. McCleary, Payne and Crawford, Gwathmey, Barnwell and Berkeley.

Finance Department—Messrs. Payne, McCleary, King, Smith, Beavin and Berkeley.

Publicity Department — Messrs. Beavin, Barnwell, Cooke and Macgill.

Religious Education Department—Messrs. Gwathmey, Gravatt and Rogers, Cocke, Smith and King.

Also from outside the membership of the Executive Board, the Rev. Warren A. Seager, of Covington, and J. Lewis Gibbs, of Staunton, were elected as associate members respectively of the Social Service and Publicity Departments.

The Religious Education Department gave an interesting report on the recent Young People's Conference of three days at Virginia Episcopal School, Lynchburg, when there was an attendance of 121. The Rev. Theodore S. Will, of Hampton, was the leader of the Conference, and the Rev. Thomas H. Wright, of Lexington, was chaplain.

The Social Service Department has forwarded to the clergy in the diocese an important booklet entitled, "Questions and Answers Concerning Compulsory Block-Booking and Blind Selling in the Distribution of Motion Pictures". This booklet is published by the Motion Picture Research Council, 366 Madison Avenue New York, and explains for the layman many phases of these problems which are perplexing the public at the present time.

The Executive Board will hold its next meeting on Thursday, September 19.

Summer Work in the Diocese.

About the middle of June two Seminary students took up work for the summer in the diocese.

Mr. Edgar T. Ferrell, of Lynchburg, has charge of Christ Church, Marion, in Smyth county. Mr. Ferrell has just finished his second year at the Virginia Seminary. His present address is 100 Cherry Street, Marion, Va.

Mr. George F. Packard is in residence at Splashdam in Dickenson county. His home is at Ruxton, Md., and he has just completed his first year at the Virginia Seminary. Splashdam is a mining community in the coal fields in the southwestern part of the diocese and in the territory formerly known as the Associate Mission Field. Though residing at Splashdam, Mr. Packard will do general work under the three clergymen having charge of this field. The resident missionary at Splashdam is Miss Florence F. Pickard. It is only a coincidence that Mr. Packard will assist Miss Pickard.

The Rev. Mr. Burke at Altavista.

On June 17 the Rev. William Francis Burke assumed his duties, under appointment by Bishop Jett, as deacon in charge of St. Peter's Church, Altavista, the Church of the Good Shepherd at Evington, Christ Church near Gladys, and St. Andrew's Mission near Altavista. All of these are in Campbell county, in what is known as "Moore Parish". Mr. Burke is a native of Amherst, and son of Mr. W. Frank Burke and the late Mrs. Winefred Gregory Burke, was graduated from Virginia Seminary on June 6, and was ordained to the diaconate on the morning of June 7 by Bishop Jett. The Rev. C. Sturges Ball, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology at the Seminary, was the presenter.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon of June 7, Mr. Burke was married in Immanuel Chapel at the Seminary to Miss Elizabeth Walton Vaught, daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth (Ware) and the late Dr. Clarence H. Vaught, of Louisville, Ky. Since the death of her father, five years ago, she has resided in Jacksonville.

Bishop Jett officiated at the wedding, and the ushers were friends of Mr. Burke among the students at the Seminary: Messrs. James D. Beckwith, Henry Johnston, Jr., Thomas Bagby and Edmund Berkeley. Mr. Morris F. Elliott, of Philadelphia, served as best man, and Miss Mary Hardin Vaught, sister of the bride, as maid of honor. The address of the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Burke is Altavista, Va.

Stained Glass Windows Being Placed in St. John the Divine.

Fourteen great stained-glass windows are at this time being placed in the nave of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York.

These windows will be among the finest and also among the largest in any Cathedral in the world. Added to the eight windows previously placed, this will make twenty-two windows installed in the nave. The glorious color effects of these windows are attracting wide attention, and they are being visited and inspected by large numbers of people. They give striking evidence of the astonishing development in the art of stained glass, which has taken place in our country in the past five years.

These windows in the nave of the Cathedral are being erected by special memorial gifts and the work on them is giving employment to a large number of artists, craftsmen and workmen, who are greatly in need of it.

In the Churches.

St. George's Church will sponsor a sociological survey of the East Side from Fourteenth Street to Forty-second Street, east of Third Avenue this summer. The survey is to be undertaken by the Rev. Richard Lief. He will devote the summer months to a study of housing conditions, playground and recreational facilities and church and welfare activities. Mr. Lief is a member of the social service commission of the Diocese of Massachusetts. He has recently been connected with similar surveys in London, Paris and Berlin. He is a graduate of Columbia University and the Episcopal Theological School, and is a former rector of St. Luke's Church, Boston.

The Very Rev. Frederick W. Golden-Howes, dean of the Cathedral at Salina, Kansas, and former dean of Christ Cathedral, Mexico City, will be attached to the staff of St. George's Church, during the next three months. Dean Golden-Howes, an authority on Mexico, is completing a book in which he discusses the present controversy between the Mexican Government and the Catholic Church.

The Rev. John Philip Anshutz, for the past six years an assistant of St. George's Church, has resigned from the staff.

The Rev. John S. Willey, who for the past two years has been on the staff of St. Thomas' Church, has been appointed in charge of St. Martha's Chapel and the Chapel of the Atonement in the Bronx.

The Church of the Resurrection, of which the Rev. E. Russell Bourne is rector, held their final services for the summer on Sunday, June 30. The preacher at the closing service at 8 A. M. was the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs, D. D., Secretary of Publicity of the National Council. The church will reopen again on September 15.

The Rev. William Norman Guthrie, D. D., rector of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, preached Sunday morning, June 30, before leaving for his vacation, on the subject, "The Double Problem of the Spirit". During the summer the services at St. Mark's will be held at 9 A. M. on Sundays.

New Painting of Christ Exhibited.

"The Radiant Christ," a picture fresh from the brush of a Washington artist, has been on exhibition at the Church of the Epiphany for two weeks. It has been seen by scores of people from both artistic and religious circles. It is a puzzling picture and a fascinating one. It has aroused decided commendation. It has also aroused not a little adverse criticism. It depicts Jesus walking in the fields of Sharon, holding an infant in His arm and leading a small child by the hand. The painting represents Jesus as a sunny and joyous character, with a winsome smile on His face—a smile which is reflected in the faces of the two children. This picture is destined to create nationwide interest as it becomes better known. It will be exhibited in other Washington churches and will probably be taken to other cities for exhibition. It is understood that its promoter, William J. Moore, a well-known Churchman of Washington, has been offered an almost fabulous sum for the painting. He speaks of establishing a national shrine in Washington where the picture may be seen by pilgrims from all parts of the country.

Recently thieves entered old St. John's Church, Washington, the Rev. Oliver J. Hart, D. D., rector, and stole three valuable altar vases from the chancel. This is the fourth church in the metropolitan area to be entered by thieves in the past four or five months, two of these churches being historic old churches in Virginia, not far from the national capital.

Dr. William Jackson Morton, thirty-three years rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, Va., delivered his final sermon on June 30. He has resigned to retire from the active ministry and will live at the University of Virginia, where he has a son on the staff of the University Hospital. He was educated at the Virginia Seminary and has been in the ministry for forty years or more.

Summer Church Schools.

In common with the other Episcopal Church Schools of the city, St. Paul's, Savannah, has closed its Sunday sessions for the summer months, but a week day session of the Church School opened on June 20, to run through July and August. The school is held every Thursday morning; the rector, the Rev. Geoffrey Horsfield, is taking all those above the first grade, and the Little Helpers, kindergarten and First Grade children, are in charge of a kindergarten teacher.

The school is not at all like a Daily Vacation Bible School, but is run more on the order of a mission. Points, leading to prizes, are given for attendance, correct answers to questions, and bringing in note books, etc.

This is the first time that a week-day session of this kind has been tried out at St. Paul's and much interest is being manifested.

St. Michael and All Angels' Church, the Rev. Joseph Burton, rector, is trying a different plan with his Church School this year. There is no week-day session, but the pupils of the Church School are urged to attend the mid-day Sunday service, at which time the rector preaches a sermon applicable to the children as well as the adults of his congregation.

The Hasty Marriage Law.

Passed by the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and signed by Governor Earle, the Hasty Marriage Law becomes effective October 1. It requires three days' notice before the issuance of a marriage license. Sponsored by the Central Committee on Social Service of the five dioceses in Pennsylvania, the bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Miss Anna Brancato, of Philadelphia, member of the House. A similar bill has been passed by the House in other years, but the Senate always defeated it. The persistence of Miss Brancato prevented its defeat this year. At a recent meeting of the Executive Council of the Diocese of Harrisburg, a resolution was passed expressing appreciation to Miss Brancato for her efforts in behalf of the bill.

The General Assembly of Pennsylvania recently passed a bill which will permit the municipalities in the Commonwealth to vote on the question of allowing motion pictures on Sunday after 2 P. M.

Anniversary Service.

The fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Orlando H. Bridgman, rector of Mount Calvary Church, Camp Hill, was celebrated with a service of thanksgiving and a congratulatory parish meeting, at which a substantial purse was presented to Mr. Bridgman. Among the speakers were Bishop Wyatt Brown, the Very Rev. J. Thomas Heistand, dean of St. Stephen's Cathedral, Harrisburg, and Mr. Richard M. H. Wharton, treasurer of the diocese.

Tribute to the Late Bishop Darlington.

A monument in tribute to the late Bishop James Henry Darlington, first Bishop of Harrisburg, was unveiled Sunday, June 23, on the highest peak of the mountains overlooking this city. The monument, a five-foot limestone marker, was erected by the Blue Mountain Eagle Climbling Club, Reading, and the Paxton Rangers' Hiking Club, Linglestown, at the summit of the first mountain in the Blue Ridge Range above Fort Hunter. Bishop Darlington was one of the first persons to boost and finance the opening of a mountain trail across the State. The Rev. Elliott C. B. Darlington and Mrs. Joel E. Fisher, children of the late bishop, and Joel Ellis Fisher, Jr., and Eleanor Darlington Fisher, grandchildren, were present at the unveiling. Speakers at the exercises included Mayor William Shanaman, of Reading, president of the Blue Mountain Eagle Climbing Club; Nevin W. Moyer, president of the Paxton Rangers' Hiking Club, and the Rev. Elliott C. B. Darlington.

Acolyte Festival Under Auspices of Two Dioceses.

An acolyte festival under the auspices of the Clerical Union of the dioceses of Bethlehem and Harrisburg was held at Christ Church, Danville, June 7 and 8, with one hundred and sixty boys and twenty-five priests in attendance. Bishop Wyatt Brown was the preacher. The Rev. Rodney Brace, rector of St. Luke's, Lebanon, made a mediation on the first evening, and the Rev. Frederic Adams, S. T. D., rector of the Church of the Messiah and Incarnation, Brooklyn, N. Y., led a conference of boys. The Rev. George F. Davis, rector of St. Stephen's, Mt. Carmel, Pa., was elected president of the Clerical Union, and the Rev. Alan H. Tongue, rector of St. John's, East Mauch Chunk, Pa., was elected secretary-treasurer.

Cathedral Operates Kindergarten the Year Round.

A daily kindergarten for children from three to six years of age is held at the Pro-Cathedral of St. Philip each morning throughout the entire year. Mrs. Caryl Greene Vaughan is in charge of this work.

Learning to share, to play and live in harmony with others is one of the features stressed, for most of the children are an only child. Creative work, music and story-telling form part of the day's schedule. During the summer months the shady Cathedral Hill makes a grand playground for the little tots. About fifteen attend regularly.

Well-Named Poster.

The Thank Offering poster, "Relieve It Or Not," drawn by the Thank Offering Custodian, St. John Barnwell, St. Luke's, Atlanta, and depicting customs in foreign lands where the Thank Offering is sent, has been given each League. It hangs in every parish house of the diocese, reminding all of the offering to be taken in October.

The next meeting of the committee will be held in the fall.

Rt. Rev. George Craig Stewart, D. D., Bishop.

Christianity Must Take Issue With These Movements.

Christianity must always oppose the fundamental elements of Communism, Fascism and Naziism, Dr. Harold Holt, prominent Chicago clergyman, declared, speaking before the seventeenth annual summer conference of Episcopal Church workers at Kemper Hall, Kenosha.

"The rise of Communism, Fascism Naziism at the end of the World War was due largely to the determination of the soldier element to collect on the blank check which had been issued by the various governments in order to induce the huge conscripted armies to continue fighting," said Dr. Holt, who is rector of Grace Church, Oak Park. He referred to such elements as inflation of the currency and "confiscation of wealth through taxation" as contributing factors in their development.

Dr. Holt referred specifically to the Abyssinian situation as "all part of the emotional background of Fascism."

"In all these modern movements," continued Dr. Holt, "there are two elements in common: First, a materialistic Hedonism, which regards possessions as the highest good in life; second, the exultation of the State. The State becomes an entity existing in and for itself. It is almost deified and for its life the individual must be willing to sacrifice his own interest. It is through the building of a powerful state, claim the leaders of these movements, that the individual will secure the material benefits which are his highest good.

"On both of these counts Christianity must take issue with these movements. It is rightly recognized by their leaders that Christianity is not a friend nor can it become a friend of these movements. Christianity does not regard Hedonism as the proper goal for humanity. There are other values greater than material possessions. Neither is the free exercise of the soul of man to be hampered in its search for virtue. In Christianity the individual and his relationship to other individuals and to God is the all important thing. It is concerned with social conditions in so far as society is a framework within which the individual carries on his search for virtue and the development of a virtuous character.

"The State must be a fosterer of virtue and a protector of the good man against the evil man. But beyond that it has no function and no life of its own."

He has served as Secretary of so many organizations in the diocese that an attempt to list them would look like a resume of all the diocesan activities. This latest honor will enable him to have a part in the supervision of one of the most important financial responsibilities in the diocese.

Cuban Convocation.

The two outstanding events of the twenty-ninth annual Convocation of the diocese were the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Hulse as Bishop of Cuba and the ordination of the Rev. R. Heber Gooden to the priesthood by Bishop Hulse.

The Convocation opened June 21 with the Bishop's address in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana. The business sessions were held Saturday in the Cathedral School. Considerable time was given to the discussion of plans to make "The Forward Movement" effective in Cuba. At the end of the morning session Bishop Hulse was presented with a portrait of himself, the portrait being a gift from the clergy of the diocese. A book of remembrance containing letters from the clergy was also presented; the presentation was made by the Rev. Richardo Barrios, secretary of the Convocation.

The Bishop in his address pointed out the many changes which have taken place during his twenty years in office, the most noticable being the growth of the native work. The afternoon session was adjourned in time for the delegates to attend the reception given in honor of the Bishop by the Cathedral congregation. The reception was attended by more than three hundred representative Cubans, Americans and English residents of Havana. The Bishop and Mrs. Hulse received many letters from all parts of the United States and many foreign countries.

The Convocation was well attended and was marked by optimism. The contrast in the political condition from that of last year could not but be noted, as last year the Convocation was held during much street fighting and bombings. This year Havana was free from all disorder and an atmosphere of peace and order prevailed.

The Bishop held a conference with the clergy Monday, at which time some of the more intimate problems of the work were discussed. A pleasant addition to the Convocation was the wedding of the Rev. Romauldo Gonzales-Aguero and Miss Naomi Diaz. The ceremony was performed by Bishop Hulse in the Cathedral Tuesday morning.

150th Anniversary of the Building of St. Paul's, Woodbury, to Be Celebrated Again.

On April 1, 1785, the first load of logs was drawn across the snow for the building of the new church in the corner of Woodbury's village graveyard. Soldiers home from the War of the Revolution were ready to help with the work, for the plan was to erect a church which was to be worthy of its sacred purpose as the spiritual home of citizens of the new nation born as the result of the high resolve of the people of America.

By July the unfinished church was ready for use, and the Rev. John Rutgers Marshall led the worship with the newly revised Prayer Book, inherited through many generations of our English-speaking race. That church is still being used, with but little change from what it was 150 years ago. It has been modernized, but is still the same.

On June 2 this anniversary was recognized by the coming of a great throng from Bridgeport, the region from which the first settlers of Woodbury came, and we now plan to hold another special service in commemoration of this event at 4:30 P. M. on Sunday, July 14. The Presiding Bishop and the people of the other towns which once were a part of Woodbury, have been invited to this service, and we want to ask all our local neighbors to be with us on that occasion as well.

The North Texas Seventh Annual District Summer Conference at Seaman Hall, Lubbock, reached a high-water mark of fifty-six in attendance, the great majority being young people of high school and college age taking N. A. L. A. credit courses on The Life of Christ, as taught by the Rev. Warwick Aiken of Plainview, and Young People's Organization Program Building in Connection with the Forward Movement. The latter course was in the form of a seminar directed by Bishop Seaman, the principal leads being given by the Rev. P. Walter Henckell, the Rev. Philip K. Kemp and the Rev. B. W. Gaither, of the District Clergy Staff. The Rev. Lyle S. Barnett was Registrar, and Mrs. Seaman and Mrs. Aiken, Counsellors. Janice Lessing, Abilene, was Student Counsellor.

At the annual meeting of the District Y. P. S. L. the following officers were elected:

Dale Alderdice, San Angelo, President; Cy Patton, Amarillo; Lucien Upshaw, Amarillo; Katherine Creath, San Angelo, Vice-Presidents; Mabel E. Cooper, Colorado, Corresponding Secretary; Lee Michie, Lubbock, Recording Secretary; Gloria Lessing, Abilene, Treasurer.

INDIANAPOLIS.

Rt. Rev. Joseph M. Francis, D. D., Bishop.

Concludes Forty Years in Ministry.

The ministerial career of the Rev. C. E. Bishop, which covers forty years, officially concluded June 30, when he preached his farewell sermon in Trinity Church, Anderson, Ind. Although Rev. Bishop will conclude his activities as rector of the church, he will continue supply work in Anderson and various other cities, with the family residence maintained in Anderson. No announcement will be made of the new pastor for Trinity Church until the fall, when the new rector will assume his official duties.

Wide Experience.

Ordination of the Rev. Mr. Bishop as deacon in the church took place on St. John the Baptist Day in the chapel of the University, after which, while on a holiday in Quebec, in July, 1896, he was ordained as a priest in the historical old Episcopal Cathedral of Quebec.

Immediately following his ordination on July 2, he was wed in Garrettsville to Anna House, and the two took up their married life in the far north in the Dr. Grenfell Mission in Labrador.

While in the north Mrs. Bishop taught, while Mr. Bishop traveled hundreds of miles in his mission work, making the long trips in winter by dog sleigh and in the mission boat in summer, often as far as the Straits of Belle Isle.

House and Home.

These two things from one point of view may be identical, but from another they may be widely apart. The house is the physical shell of the home, and as such it is important. It differs widely in different climes and civilizations and may be only a hut or tent or a cave, but with us it is a more worthy and permanent structure. It is true that we can find in our cities human habitations that are unworthy of the name, unsanitary rattle-traps open to wind and weather in slums that are repulsive to every sense. Movements are under way in some cities to clear out these slums and replace them with modern dwellings in which people can live a decent life. But the typical American house is one of the best in the world. It is often located on a bit of ground with a garden and a sward and it is solidly constructed and has ample room for the needs of the family.

It is a deep root of domestic life to have such a house which becomes consecrated with the years. Many a family works hard and saves and sacrifices to the utmost even through years to acquire and improve a house, adding to it year by year some additional touch of use or beauty; and a young married couple does well to set up this goal and strive towards it as their guiding star and consummation of their dream. Let it be sanitary and comfortable and keep it in good repair, and be it ever so modest there is no place like it.

The word home has a different connotation and is related to the house as the jewel to the case and as the fragrance to the flower and the mellow music to the violin. It is the house as the home of the family in which every room and the very roof has become consecrated and precious with the associations and memories of years. In it parents are bound together in affection strengthened by all their happiness and trials and tears and the children have grown up in it in an atmosphere of love and care and mutual joy. The children play within and around it and every nook and corner becomes dear to them.

What makes the home as distinguished from the house? The house may be a very palace of marble, filled with the most costly furnishings and with works of art, and yet be no home but a hateful place of unhappiness and a prison of gloom. It is the spirit of confidence and love that transforms the house into a home. Let the house be ever so humble, yet if it is pervaded with the bright atmosphere of mutual trust and good will and patience and love, it is sweetened and mellowed and is rest to weary feet and joy to every heart. It may lack many comforts and be overshadowed with disappointment and even swathed in sable sorrow, yet its name is magic and its memories are unfading treasures.

It does not take great wealth and manifold means to make such a home, but love will build it, secreting it out of affectionate heart as the nautilus secretes its ivory palace of iridescent pearl or as the seed grows into the flower or as an old violin through constant use becomes crystallized into rich music, so that however rudely it is handled it gives out no discordant sounds but only deep mellow notes. We may all have such homes even without a house of our own ownership and then happy are we indeed.

Mr. Olin Downes, the gifted musical critic of the New York Times, gives an account in that journal of a visit he recently paid to Paderewski in his beautiful home on the shore of Lake Geneva. There the great artist has secluded himself for quiet and rest to his nerves and for practice in preparation for his coming tours. He had something to say on the subject of the home that is worth repeating. "The basis," he said, "of everything life holds that is good is in the family. Without it we are uprooted, socially and morally. If it should disappear, which it will not do, we could say farewell not only to civilization but to happiness. Make no mistake. The enduring basis of the family life will never, never be abandoned because—it cannot; because its disappearance is the last thing that humanity, at its core, desires." This is the word of this supreme artistic genius, a member of a class of people that are supposed to be more than ordinary careless of home ties and virtues.

One morning Mr. Downes heard music. "From an upper story, before luncheon, came the sound of a piano. Shall the nature of the passages be revealed? They consisted of scales, played slowly, legato and staccato. Then the octave passages from the Schuman Toccata, played also slowly, with an implacable, metronomic steadiness and force. The secretary rejoiced at the sound, for the piano had been silent for months. Paderewski was now beginning the preparations for concerts in Europe this winter, and America next. And the music was the sign of the renewal of his life and energies."

But how significant that he was practicing scales slowly and with meticulous care! Just what beginners and children do. One would have thought the great master of the instrument would have smiled at the idea of such childish work and would have begun to sweep the ivory keyboard with the grand chords and most intricate runs and trills of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody or Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. But no, the sounds "consisted in scales played slowly, legato and staccato." He made sure of the fundamental simplicities of his art and then he knew the complexities and rapid runs would come with unerring habit and instinct.

A great lesson in that for us: practice the fundamentals in art and in morals. When Paul bids us to "think on these things," what is he referring to? "Whatsoever things are true, honorable, just, pure and of good report." Just the scales of character and conduct "played slowly," in the quiet of the home; then we shall not forget them when we come out into society and meet the strain and stress of the world.

We may carry the lesson of that "upper story" a step further. Many of us have heard the great Polish pianist and can recall the air of majestic poise and calm with which he walks out before the great audience and with a modest bow takes his seat before the instrument. No music is on the rack or is present, for it is all written in his heart, where all great attainments are written. He pauses a moment, lifts his hands and strikes the keyboard, it may be, with thunder strokes and makes every iron string and atom of wood vibrate to its inmost core. Then follows a marvelous display of digital dexterity as with rapidity too swift to follow with our eyes he sweeps the ivory keys from one end to the other and wakes into music all the deeps of thunder and all the sweet melodies of birds and all the sighs and soughing of wind and sea, and weaves them into complex patterns of sound that stir our souls as deep calleth unto deep and we sit entranced not knowing what it all means but feeling that we are listening to something like God!

But where was it all learned and whence did it come? "From an upper story" in the quiet of a hidden home on the shore of that secluded lake in the heart of Switzerland. It all came out of that room where he had long and patiently practiced "scales slowly, with an implacable, metronomic steadiness and force." Had he not practiced there in secret, he could not have played in public.—From an Article in Presbyterian Banner.

A Lesson in Appreciation.

Helen Searles Marsh.

"What did you bring me?"

This was the greeting I received from my eight-year-old niece when I met her for the first time, upon my arrival for a visit with my sister in New England. During the ten years I had spent as a kindergarten teacher on the Pacific coast, I had anticipated seeing the little girl who had come into my sister's home.

Before my bag was deposited, she began trying to open it, saying again, in a commanding way, "Tell me what you brought me. Didn't you bring me anything? What did you come for, if you didn't bring something for me?"

The mother apologized. "Of course Joan is glad to see you, but she expects you have brought her something pretty from the coast."

Surely I had not forgotten to bring my only niece a gift. In fact, I had many in the trunk yet to come, and had been looking forward to the pleasure of giving pretty things, books and trinkets to my sister's child. However, the situation became less and less pleasing. Joan continued teasing and hinting for specific things. I took from the hand-bag a choice illustrated book for children. Seeing the disapproval on her face when I passed her the book, I felt uncomfortable, and was about to explain that I had other gifts in my trunk, when she broke out, "Is that all you brought me? I don't want that old book," and threw it aside. Running to her mother, she cried, "Auntie didn't bring me anything but an old book."

To my surprise the mother patted the child and told her not to cry, of course Auntie had other lovely things for her which she would get later.

I was deeply concerned by the child's conduct and my sister's attitude. I changed my mind about the gifts in the trunk. The child must be taught a lesson, even though it was not her fault that she was an ungrateful, spoiled child.

Her mother had encouraged her little daughter to hint and tease for gifts and had allowed her to think she should have whatever she wanted. It would be necessary for my sister to realize her mistake in allowing Joan to acquire such selfish habits. I knew I must help her correct them without interfering with that happiness and harmony of the home. She had seen her only daughter as about perfect, until Auntie came.

"I like that, Auntie," Joan would say of something that belonged to me, "Mother says it's going to be mine when you die." "When you get through with that gold ring is it going to be mine?" "I've got lots of handkerchiefs, but yours are prettier. I want this one."

Never a word of appreciation. She never expressed pleasure with regard to the many, many beautiful things she possessed, but teased constantly until she got what she wanted for the moment. Never was she giving anything but always taking. The situation was getting serious. I spoke to my sister about it.

"Why shouldn't she have everything she wants? She is an only child," was the surprised reply.

But one morning, Edna, a neighbor's little girl of Joan's age, called for her to go to school with her. "I brought you these daisies, because I haven't any Auntie," she said as she came toward me. "It must be wonderful to have an Auntie come from so far, far away," she added, turning to Joan.

Her words gladdened my heart, and I was especially hopeful of the effect on my niece when I learned that Joan admired this little schoolmate. Later, I gave Edna the book that Joan would not accept.

"It is a lovely book and now I have three all my own," she said.

I learned from my sister that Edna had very few things, but I found she was orderly, careful, and appreciative of what she had. The gifts I had intended for Joan, I gave to Edna, who manifested great delight and gratitude. And so it was that Joan began her first lesson. My sister noticed a change in her.

Gradually, Joan began to appreciate her Auntie's presence in the home. She had been reluctant to let even Edna share her dolls or playthings. Now she began to want to share with everyone and especially with the little girl who had won her Aunt's love because of her appreciation and unselfishness. Edna loved Joan and had never excited her jeauousy.

On Joan's ninth birthday, the usual party was given, but the invitations read, "No gifts, please." It was Joan's own idea to give each little girl who came, a present, instead of receiving one herself. I gave Joan a simple, inexpensive token and a card, "With love from Auntie."

"I like your card with 'love' on it, Auntie," she whispered affectionately. "I want you to love me and I'm-I'm going to be just as good as I can be."

Patient Well-Doing.

A valued exchange remarks that one seldom sees immediate results in Christian work, however faithfully done. As compared with work in which the results are material and tangible, the truth of this is obvious. Not only so, spiritual success remains largely intangible even when its deepest results are achieved. One might even be justified in changing the utterance we have indicated, and saying that immediate results seldom follow in Christian work, because and when it is faithful. The full truth is that "it is God that giveth the increase," and there is not a single Scripture that justifies our modern mania in religious work to secure and acieve material success.

The Son of God Himself found no way to save the lost world other than what the world counts utter failure. That is, He died on the cross at the hands of those He would save. "Success" achieved by His professed followers by lives centered first on material results that fill the eyes of men is not spiritual success. It is self-success seeking its ends through a spiritual medium.—Western Recorder.

Will you please publish this in your paper?

"My dear Mr. Schapiro,

"Your three volumes on studies of words in the Old Testament, have interested me deeply. As the study of Hebrew in our Church Seminaries has been abandoned by many candidates for the Ministry, such contributions as these from your pen become the more valuable as information. WORDS OF PRAYER.

Juanita Marquez.

Saviour, Lord, and closest Friend
Hear the prayers that now ascend.
Though they seem in Thy wise sight
Poor in faith, not made aright.

Cleanse me from all secret sin
Lord, Thy Blessing I would win.
May the light of Thy great Love
Shine upon me from above.

Let me serve Thee day by day,
Give me courage all life's way.
Find for me some humble task
Strength to do it well, I ask.

Guide and keep me from all harm
Help me banish fear's alarm.
Guardian Angels may there be Hovering ever close to me.

"Philip, what are you running on about? Let Mother finish her letter from Aunt Molly, precious—or, I tell you, go ask Father to come here, there's a big piece of news in this letter, and I think it will make him glad;—O Claire!" Mother called from the side porch, where she sat in the autumn sunshine, to Claire, wrapped, warmly in her hammock. "Come, hear what Aunt Mollie has to say!" Mother's eyes, bright enough with Aunt Mollie's news, grew brighter still to see Claire make her way so quickly to the porch. Then Philip was back with Father, and with Winnie and David, who had heard enough to come along.

Father took the letter, read a little, silently, and gave a low whistle.

"Well, this will settle the Far Ridge problem!"

"O, Father, what?" cried the children together.

"Why, here's Aunt Mollie saying she's willing to come as the missionary on Far Ridge!"

"She'd make the best in the world!" said David.

"And she'd be so near us!" Winnie added.

"I fought 'twas maybe anover Tom Bwown pony, or anyway a toad," Philip said, looking disappointed.

"Now Phil, how can you think of a toad or even a Tom Brown pony bein' like our own Aunt Mollie!" Winnie said, giving him a little shake.

"Never mind, Winnie, Philip is too small and the world too big for him to have got his values straight yet." Father sat on the step by Mother's chair and drew Philip to him. "You see, old man, there are a lot of small fellows on the Far Ridge that are better off for toads than for Aunt Mollies."

"Does dey know 'bout 'I see a cat'?" asked Philip solemnly.

"No, and there's a lot more they don't know. Think of having Aunt Mollie to teach them! Dear, we must go up there tomorrow and see how the mission house comes on. It's a curious thing," went on Father, looking over the pages of Aunt Mollie's letter as he spoke, "I started on the mission house with no prospect in the world of a worker up there, nor any way to pay one. Now here's Aunt Mollie, the best I could have wished for, and she's even taken care of her own salary, for she says the Auxiliary groups in her Church in the city are sending her—if I like. If I like! This is certainly the best news I've had for—well, let's say since Claire got better!" Father looked as excited as Philip and Kent had been over Tom Brown.

"You'll think it even more curious," Mother confessed, "that I thought of Sister Mollie from the first time I went up there. But I didn't ask her to go. I just wrote of the need and the chance—oh, I'm glad to think of those children and the poor mothers having her to teach and help them!"

"But isn't the mission house just a log house, Father?" asked Winnie.

"Finest white pine, notched just right, put up by experts, and without price, in the hope of getting a missionary some day. There are three good rooms and a fine stone chimney. The Trent ladies promised a stove for the kitchen, and the Bishop sent me fifty dollars, I can do all that's needed, with what Mollie will bring herself."

"It sounds pleasant," said Claire.

"What sounds p'easant?" Kent had come quietly around the house to the steps, "Muvver, Tom Bwown does like apple wif sugar on. What sounds p'easant, Claire?"

"For Aunt Mollie to live in the mission house on Far Ridge, and have a fine stone chimney and help the little children."

"She is a good person for helpin' bwoked arms," said Kent, who had a confused notion of the mission house, but a very clear one of Aunt Mollie.

Three weeks later Aunt Mollie was at the Rectory, and there were frequent trips of the Trent ladies' farm wagon to the Far Ridge, loaded with furnishings and supplies, some brought by Aunt Mollie, some contributed by the ladies of the village church. Mrs. Innis brought two crocheted bedspreads.

"They are quite new, dear Miss Mollie," she said, "I remembered you thought it entirely appropriate that our missionary box should have new things, and I would not do less when you're actually going to live on that desolate mountain yourself."

"Now, dear Mrs. Innis, it isn't going to be desolate!" said Aunt Mollie, "for instance, these lovely spreads, they'll put an air on any room they're used in. Some day you must visit me and show the mountain women how you make them."

"Perhaps, in very moderate weather, dear Miss Mollie, and with suitable escort for the journey," said Mrs. Innis, looking pleased and frightened at once.

A few days later Aunt Mollie was settled in her new home and news came back that a well was being dug under her direction.

"Dear Brother Kent," she wrote, "when you come up for the service next month bring Claire for a visit to me. We have struck water, a fine mineral spring. I took up a section of the kitchen flooring you know, and started the well there, so my new pump will be inside the kitchen, and it has been ordered from the city. The men work so well, led by the father of that Elmer who died last summer. Elmer's father says he will do anything to 'make out so the little uns kin larn'. The well is of stone and cement. Claire will be comfortable I know, and we'll see the first snow fly, from the mission house together. Do let her come."

So Claire was made ready for another journey, but how different from the one she had taken last winter! Mother knitted a warm hood, silk-lined and with a bit of brown fur that had done duty on a cape of Miss Alice's, around the face. Winnie's last year brown coat was just right for Claire, who had grown almost to Winnie's height since her illness. There were brown mittens and a brown scarf and even Winnie's boots to help in transforming Claire from an invalid into an outdoor mountain girl.

"If I use Winnie's boots, seems as if I should leave Noel for Winnie," Claire said, as they were packing in Mother's room. "They were both Aunt Mollie's presents for last Christmas."

Noel, hearing his name, came up instantly and put his head on Claire's knee, with a little whine.

"No, Claire," said Winnie, "Father said he'd get me boots, 'cause I do want to go with Miss Sarah and sketch from her stone fence when snow comes. She said we would. And you'd miss Noel. But with Noel and Aunt Mollie, and Mother coming up with Father sometimes you won't miss anything."

"You, Winnie," Claire said softly.

But it was a very happy little girl who started off with Father on a gray November morning, with only one pillow needed for comfort, with Noel on the seat beside her and the back of the buggy piled with her luggage and some extra good things, from a cooked ham to a cocoanut cake, which Cindy brought out at the last minute, for the Mission House family.

Summer Playthings.

Alice was going into the country for the summer. Aunt Elizabeth and Cousin Cora had come for her in the automobile and were to drive her to their farm, forty-five miles away. How Cora had laughed when she saw the big box of playthings that Alice had packed to go with her!

"You had better leave that box behind," she said. "You won't even open it, there are so many more interesting things to play with than those things you have played with all winter."

Aunt Elizabeth shook her head, too. "It is much too big a box for me to take," she said. "I have many things to buy and put in the car. Take Cora's advice and leave it behind."

So Alice had hastily picked up Coralee, her pet doll, and held her in her arms all the way to Aunt Elizabeth's.

Hardly had Alice's dresses been unpacked and carefully put away, when Cora seized her hand and cried, "Come, Alice, let's play with some of the nice outdoor summer playthings we can find." "I know," said Alice wisely, "daisy chains and daisy dolls and flower dolls of all kinds and things like that."

"Oh, those," said Cora carelessly. "Those are well enough if you have to play alone, or it is rainy and you have to sit still on the porch, but there are so many more other things to do when there are two of us. Come, and I'll show you."

Away the two little girls ran to the north pasture. Cora began picking up the cones under the pine trees. She gathered a lapful, then dumped them on a bit of level ground well covered with grass. "Wait a minute," she cried as she scrambled over the stone wall that led to the orchard. Soon she was back again with her hands filled with small green apples she had found on the ground under the apple trees.

"Help me set up two sets of tenpins, Alice," she said, "one set for you and one for me. We will see which of us can bowl our tenpins first. These little round green apples make lovely balls to roll. The one that wins the most games can choose the next game to play after we are tired of this one."

It was half an hour later that Alice suggested they play something else. "Pine cone tenpins is great fun," she said, "and I shall want to play it again. But let's play something else now. I think it is just as well that you have beaten me, for you know things to do that I don't."

Cora thought several minutes, then she said, "Let's go over by the burdocks and get burs to make baskets. We will line them with leaves and pick blueberries that grow in the pasture, too. You see, most of my summer toys grow in the pasture or in the garden. There is plenty of time in the winter to play with store toys."

Alice could not believe her ears when she heard the supper bell. They had spent all the afternoon in making their bur baskets and filling them with berries.

"I just love your summer toys," she said to Cora. "Are there any more of them?"

"Why, you haven't even begun to see them yet," laughed Cora, as she put her basket down carefully on the steps of the back porch. "Tomorrow we will go down to the brook and go in wading, and we will sail chips for boats. Father cut down an old tree last week, so there will be plenty of chips for us to use."

"Then I know how to make a doll's tea set out of the burs we used today. That will take a long time. And we can play jackstones with hazel nuts, and we can play store. We can have brown stones for potatoes and sand for sugar, and there are all kinds of wild flowers like butter-and-eggs that we can sell for vegetables and fruit. Why, summer isn't half long enough to play with all the things we can find right here on the farm.

"And," said Aunt Elizabeth, who had come up unseen in time to hear Cora's program for the coming days, "there are so many things you can make to take home for the winter to remind you of summer days. There are leaves you can press, and if you paste one of each kind carefully on a sheet of paper and bind the sheets together, and write underneath each kind of a tree it came from and all you can find out about it, you will have a useful picture book of some of the things from Mother Nature's summer playhouse. You can press flowers, too. Some pebbles from the brook, if you are careful to choose small round ones, can be put into a little bag made of cretonne or gingham and you will have a pebble bag with which to play beanbag."

Both little girls laughed at that.

"Oh, Cora, you were right," cried Alice. "With all the interesting things to do I didn't need any ready-made playthings at all."—Zion's Herald.

Catbird Learns Something.

Catbird had sung his last song of the day. It was time to tuck his head under his wing and go to bed. But something had just brushed against his lilac bush, and it had jarred him on his perch. He opened his sleepy eyes and looked around. Yes, something was flying in front of his bush. It was making a grand curve in the air. What could it be?

"Chirp, chirp, chirp," sang Black Cricket underneath the bush. "Chirp-chirp, chirp."

Catbird was glad there was somebody around whao was wide awake. "Good evening, Black Cricket," he said in his very best manner. "Won't you come up here with me? We might have a visit together."

But, of course, Black Cricket could not do that. Catbird should have known better. Black Cricket answered, "I'll talk with you right here, if you wish to talk. It's safe here, thank you!"

"Look at that thing flying! Look at it! It's the queerest bird I ever saw."

"Maybe it isn't a bird," said Black Cricket. "There are other things in the world besides birds, you know. For instance, I'm not a bird. I'm an insect."

Catbird did not answer. He knew all about insects, for he had them to eat every day in his bill of fare. But this flying thing was neither bird nor insect.

Perhaps Black Cricket was ashamed of himself for speaking the way he did. Anyway, he began a new conversation. "I think I know what is flying around this time of day," he said.

"But it isn't day," replied Catbird, "because I am sleepy and it's time for me to go to bed. It is almost night."

"I know that," answered Black Cricket, "and that is when Bat comes around."

"Bat? Who is Bat? What is he like?"

"I've never seen one," replied Black Cricket, "but I've heard that he flies like a bird, and that he has a body like a mouse, and that he can bite, with sharp teeth different from a mouse's. I'd hate to have his teeth in me!"

Catbird looked this way and that. "There he goes again right in front of my bush. He must be a bird to fly like that!"

Black Cricket said no more. He had told all he knew.

"Me-ow!" said Catbird suddenly. "Me-ow!"

"Jay-Jay-Jay-Jay!" screeched Blue Jay from a tree near the lilac bush. "What's the matter? It's time to go to sleep!"

"Me-ow!" said Catbird. Did you ever see a bat?"

"Yes, indeed. They fly at dusk. They sweep the air of insects. They sleep in the daytime and work at night."

"I wish I could see this one better," said Catbird. "I'll fly up to your branch a while if you don't mind." Just then the nicest thing happened. An automobile with the brightest headlights drove up the road and stopped. It looked like daylight all around. Bat flew right into the light, and Catbird nearly fell off her perch in surprise. Clinging fast to Mother Bat's breast, and closing its front teeth into the curiously roughened hair, was a baby bat, riding in perfect safety as his mother performed her acrobatic feat through the air! Catbird had never heard of such a thing and never had he seen such a performance.

"Pretty good sweeper of the night air," remarked Blue Jay.

"Yes, it beats anything I ever dreamed of," answered Catbird. "I should think the baby would fall."

"Not that baby," laughed Blue Jay. "He clutches his mother too tight to fall."

"Toot-toot," sang the automobile as it started off, leaving the place all around darker than ever.

"Jay-Jay-Jay-Jay. I'm going to sleep." Blue Jay tucked his head under his wing and said no more.

Silently Catbird slipped down to the lilac bush and without even a "meow" was fast asleep. Perhaps he dreamed of Mother Bat and her baby sailing through the air. Who knows? But in the morning he forgot all about his nighttime experiences, for he had a nest full of baby birds that he had to get food for, and that took all of his time.—Sunday School Times.

THE APPLE TREE.

Maude Forrest Mumma.

O give me a shining apple tree,
In the warm days of July;
That we may fill our pails in glee,
With fruit from its branches high.

For many days and many years,
We waited for this sight;
With lurking doubts and needless fears,
For its apples sweet and bright.

We thought at first it would not bear,
The crop was very small;
And then, perhaps, I shed a tear,
To have no tree at all.

But there is health and life renewed,
In my July apple tree;
And this is the finest of summer food,
I'm sure you will agree.

A Heart Full of Love.

Dr. Grenfell tells of an old fisherman, rich in trust, who was "given to hospitality". He was seventy-three years of age, and had fed many hungry folk during the "hard" winters; and when times grew unusually hard this old man of faith brought forth twelve dirty, well-worn five dollar bills, as a last resort. This money, his entire savings, he gave to the missionary to buy food for needy neighbors. But Dr. Grenfell remonstrated: "You are getting old, and you shouldn't cut the last plank away yet." Then the hardy fisherman of many perils answered: "He'll take care, doctor, guess I can trust Him. It wouldn't do not to have used that sixty dollars, and have sent folks away hungry, would it, doctor? It would look as I didn't have much trust in Him."—Exchange.

FAITH.

In every seed to breath the flower,
In every drop of dew
To reverence a cloistered star
Within the distant blue;
To wait the promise of the bow,
Despite the cloud between
Is faith—the fervid evidence
Of loveliness unseen.

—John B. Tabb.

MY CLOCK.

Magda Brandon.

My clock ticktocks both work and play;
She clearly ticktocks time away;
There's a rhythm there, in every tock,
Within her heart-beats tock—ticktock!

Her friendly tock—ticktocking soul,
Ticktocks of time, of life, a goal;
Of life, wherein we run a race
With speeding time's relentless pace.

I am very well content
To heed the tock on which she is bent.
My clock ticktocks her heart to me—
How lonesome clockless days would be.

The world should be won not by the preachers, though we must have these men of God for teaching, and leadership, but by every one who knows the story of Jesus telling some one and telling not only with his lips earnestly and tactfully, but telling with his life. That is the Master's plan of campaign for this world, and it makes a great difference to Him and to the world outside whether you and I are living the story of His love and power among men or not. —Christian Sun.

After two years in Labrador, Mr. Bishop returned and assumed parish work in the Diocese of Quebec. His last charge before leaving Canada was that of rector of St. John's Church in North Bay, Ontario. In 1911 Rev. Mr. Bishop came into the Diocese of Michigan and later in 1919 to the Church of the Advent in Indianapolis. Later he became rector of St. Matthew in Irvington. In the meantime the new St. Matthew Church was built, making three churches he had built during his ministry.

Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Bishop.

Commemorating Anniversaries.

Special services commemorating anniversaries of the foundation of two churches in this diocese were held June 16. St. Barnabas' Church in the morning at 10:30 o'clock commemorated the eighty-fourth anniversary of its foundation. The Rev. Joseph Manuel, chaplain of the Episcopal Hospital and a former rector of the parish preached the anniversary sermon. The services were in charge of the rector, the Rev. Charles H. Urban. Monday being St. Barnabas' Day, Bishop Taitt was the speaker at a congregational dinner in the parish house.

Trinity Church, Swarthmore, also commemorated the fortieth anniversary of its foundation, and at the same time the tenth anniversary of the ordination to the priesthood of its rector, the Rev. J. Jarden Guenther. Bishop Taitt was the special preacher at the anniversary services, where he also administered the rite of confirmation to a class which was presented by the rector.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Third Regional Rural Conference.

"One of the best Conferences on Rural Work ever held!" "The best Conference I have ever attended!" and many other statements of similar meaning were made about the Third Regional Rural Conference, held at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, and Holy Innocents' Episcopal Church, Auburn, Ala., June 11-21. The secret of it was that every Leader and Speaker was a Specialist in his or her subject. And in addition to this, the Leaders had spent three years in research of the subjects given them. There were three Leaders of the Research Series: The Rev. Val. H. Sessions, the Rev. George Harris, and the Rev. James S. Butler. These Leaders had worked over the three years in picking specialists in the various subjects. The result of it was all made a distinct contribution.

The Lecturer was Dr. Roy J. Colbert, one of the foremost Sociologists of our day, University of Wisconsin.

The plan was: Daily, 7:30, Celebration of the Holy Communion; 8, breakfast; 9-12, three speakers; 12, intercessions; 12:30, dinner; 2-6, recreation; 6:30 to 7:50, conferences on Findings of the leads in the morning; 8 P. M., the meeting thrown open to the community for the lecture of Dr. Colbert. The lectures were held in the church. The church was practically filled every night with those interested in solving the problems of the day.

There are fifteen dioceses in the Fourth Province. Ten of these were represented at the conference.

This conference was held by the Provincial Department of Christian Social Service. The Rev. Val. H. Sessions was the Director.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

"There are no boundaries to God's love and no frontiers beyond."—Everett Gill.

Religious liberty is the crown jewel of humanity.—Dr. George W. Truett.

The angels are still singing. It's our wave length that's at fault.—H. Bertram Lewis.

"Don't be alarmed by critics. Let them talk—but you live right while they are talking. Be your own severest, just critic; and keep on doing things that ought to be done."

If you may not pray in public,
If you cannot preach or sing,
You can surely pray in secret,
Face to face with Christ the King.
—R. L. W.

George Eliot said, "It is not true blessedness to be free from sorrow while there is sin in the world. Sorrow then is a part of love and love does not seek to throw it off."

Those who are accused of wanting to keep anybody from becoming rich are more frequently concerned with discovering how to prevent anybody from being, or becoming poor.

Voices said, "Stay!"
But the Voice said, "Go!"
Could I hoard the wonderful
Truths I know?
O heart, be strong!
O feet, be swift!
—From Men and Women of Far Horizons.

We are living the Christian life, because we love the God that first loved us and gave His Son for us. This is our reason for doing all things in the name of Jesus. All other motives for the grown-up Christian are secondary.

A firm, quiet, joyous faith is the very foundation of the Christian life. But it is not the entire structure. There must be a strong framework to hold the building true. This is the "virtue" which must be added to faith. In the Christian life virtue should include all those qualities which mean all-round manliness.—Today.

The House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church declares that "the cross is above the flag", and adds that "in any issue between country and God, the clear duty of the Christian is to put obedience to God above every other loyalty."

Self is the only prison that can ever bind the soul.
Love is the only angel who can bid the gates unroll.
And when He comes to call thee, rise and follow fast;
The way may be through darkness, but it leads to light at last.
—Henry Van Dyke.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

The Southern Churchman welcomes letters for publication on all subjects, though the views expressed may not necessarily be those of the Editor. The Editor reserves the right to cut any letter of length, exceeding three hundred words.

The Unemployed Clergy.

Mr. Editor:

I notice in your paper and others a number of letters urging that the age limit for retiring on the Pension Fund be lowered so as to make room for the unemployed clergy who can find no work. In my judgment, that would not help the matter one bit. There is not now and never has been too many clergymen in the Church. With few exceptions the clergy who are out of work are misfits or lazy. We might as well face the subject squarely and admit that neither college, seminary training, nor ordination insures success in the ministry. Does any one dispute this point? I never knew a Spirit-filled man who was long out of work of some kind. All this talk of over-crowding in the ministry is perfectly ridiculous. The over-crowding, if any, is from the dead wood, and men who entered the ministry, not from a strong belief that they were truly called of God the Holy Ghost, but who are looking for something easy in life where the old age will be taken care of by a rather comfortable pension. A few days in the Upper Room would work wonders in their lives. True. When fire falls on a man, he will cease talking of the treatment he has received at the hands of the Church and begin telling what a big, lazy loafer he has been for so many years, and how little real fruit he has gathered for the Lord. Then he will be used somehow, somewhere. It may not be in a comfortable rectory, with ample salary, but it surely will be equal to what St. Paul and others like him received with abundant blessing from the Lord Himself. I do not read of any unemployment among the Apostles or Elders in the New Testament, or anywhere else. They were filled with the Spirit; therefore, they filled the pulpit and the pews wherever they went. Too many are thinking more of what they are to receive rather than what they are to give in their ministry. We once had a "Bishop's Crusade", and likely it did much good, but there should be another crusade to get rid of the dead material in pulpit and pew and set the rest on fire and see what God can do with a truly converted Church. There are plenty of faithful men all over the country, but they are not the ones causing the trouble. I want to see their number greatly increased. Followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene and who live in ease and luxury are not apt to greatly impress or arrest a wicked and adulterous generation. It would be well for the Bishops to lead in all these things. I fully believe we all get all that is coming to us.

Kanuga Conferences.

Mr. Editor:

I understand that word is being circulated to the effect that Kanuga has not opened and will not be opened this season, because of the infantile paralysis in North Carolina. This report is probably due to the fact that the young people's camps in the other North Carolina dioceses, at Vade Mecum and Washington, N. C., have followed this course, as a large number of their registrations were from the east central part of the State, where the disease has been most prevalent.

As far as we can find out, there have been no more cases of the disease in this section than is normal for every year, and as Kanuga draws chiefly from South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, some parts of Virginia and the extreme western part of North Carolina, we have not felt that it was necessary to make any change in our program.

If the report as to the closing of Kanuga spreads to any great extent, it will, of course, injure our Adult and Clergy Conferences, and the Guest Period, which follow the junior conferences, now in session here.

I am, therefore, appealing for your aid in this matter, asking that you give this letter all possible publicity, and see to it that some notice to this effect be in your local newspaper if possible.

Faithfully yours,
K. G. Finlay, Bishop,
Director Kanuga Conferences.

The South and Literature.

The day has long since gone when the only literature put out in the South was of the romantic variety. In fact, many of us long for a little romance in a literary world that seems to have gone to extremes in so-called realism. Faulkner and Thomas Wolfe are the order of the day, and even though the popular authors may be good Southerners, the South has been getting a good bit of bad advertising.

Whether this bad advertising is the result of half-truth or all the truth is beside the point. There is enough truth in the stories that are told to let us know that a new day has found a large section of our country in a condition that needs better and truer leadership. The novels and plays are in themselves nasty, and yet by their very frankness and nastiness, they reveal that perhaps the authors are men who at heart have the Protestant sense of reformation and hope that in their revelations something healthier can be found.

To those of us who cling to the Church as the only hope of the world in presenting the full and healthful gospel of Our Lord there comes a particular challenge. Can we not enlist in our cause even these seemingly anti-religious authors? Can't we find a home for them in the Church of Him to whom the sinner has always come, even though the sin was hateful?

An older type of American religion has done little with the people about whom these authors write. Their lives are frustrated and devoid of beauty. Their ideals are shorn and little except the animal is present. There is no calm or security seen in their lives and religion, except as an emotional experience inherited at best from the past is absent.

Of course, we do not believe that this is the whole picture at all. There still are in the South men of the type of General Lee. There yet are many families—maybe most families—to whom God is real and in whom men find their "soul's sincere desire". But the fact that brilliant young writers can also find appalling conditions is in reality a challenge, and we should be glad that the facts are being shown to us that we might carry the healthful gospel of Jesus Christ to these benighted souls.

Can we not also challenge the young people who have reacted to the sad conditions which these books reveal, and have left the church of their fathers because they do not feel it in sympathy with them? Can we not believe that it is only in a deeper realization of the gospel story that any improvement can be made? Christ's real disciples were never narrowed, frustrated lives and in following their healthy attitudes may be found a better and finer civilization.

Sermons and Titles.

Again we wonder how much the modern title to a sermon helps either the preacher or the congregation. A list published recently in a New York paper intrigued our attention. We could not help wondering how many of these titles would attract us were we either a member of the church at which the sermon was advertised, or a stranger within the city. Our conclusion was none of them would prove very interesting.

We have been accused of living in an age when preaching was not what it once was. We wonder how much the sermon title has had to do with this decline in interest. Surely, with the increase of education, the preachers of today should, if anything, be better qualified to preach than those of an older generation. But the titles would lead most of us to assume that some subject had been frantically sought and then in a catch phrase given publicity and that, instead of religion, the preacher was interested in some topic about which in all likelihood he knew little.

If we would reason it out, is it possible to find fifty-two subjects a year that would be vital and on the minds and hearts of the congregations? Is there not in the topical sermon a great weakness in the temptation to bring out the particular bias of the preacher or even the virtuous thing for which he stands until it is monotonous? A friend of ours, very interested in sanitation, preaches about nothing else. Undoubtedly this is a Christian subject taken in the abstract, but week after week his sermons are advertised as "A Clean City", or "Does Wealth Mean Health?" until his long-suffering congregation sighs—and stays away. They have been talked to about sanitation so long there is no new way of presenting that fascinating subject.

And then there is the humorous side. We remember the writer a few years ago in a popular magazine who told "how to preach a sermon". And we remember his describing the sermon subject as advertised, "Shall we choose God or Mammon?" and then said, "We wondered if the preacher intended to come out strong for Mammon".

Many of our subjects are trite—in fact, most of them are. It would be far better for the preacher to announce his text and in this day of renewed interest in Bible reading, maybe a few would look it up. At best, most subjects are mere paraphrases of the Holy Scripture text, anyway, and as one wag has said, if a preacher uses a text, at least that much of the sermon will be sure to be good. Topics limit us narrowly and fail to interest. May we not hope for a revival of expository preaching, or at least textual preaching?

Bishop Rowe Writes of Emergency Schedule.

Spirit of Missions, July, 1935.

The Missionary Bishop of Alaska, the Rt. Rev. Peter T. Rowe, reporting on the effects to his work of the reduced appropriation required under the Emergency Schedule for 1935, writes:

"In reducing the appropriations, I refrained from cutting the salaries of any of the workers. Their salaries, reduced by previous cuts, are too small for any reduction. I would rather suffer myself. Hence, I cut my own salary. Then I cut such appropriations as I thought could be cut, but without eliminating any of the work.

"Those who desire the policy of cutting out whole areas of the work in Alaska may succeed in their noble endeavor. But no "areas" of work will be cut out, so long as I am alive and able to minister and serve. Were the whole staff cut out from under me, please God, I will minister to all, in all places, if alone.

"To sacrifice this work in Alaska built up from nothing, the work of devoted men and women and the sacrifices and offerings of thousands of children of the Church, as well as by the gifts of saintly men and women and the self-sacrificing work of knightly souls such as Hudson Stuck and A. R. Hoare, is just unthinkable. Before I yield to any such thing, I will live and fight. I may die, but I will die fighting, to the end."

For 1932, the Alaska appropriation was $93,770
For 1935, the Alaska appropriation is 61,865
For 1936, the appropriation is to be further reduced to 54,865

Communicants Must Be Missionaries.

By the Archbishop of York, in The Church Times (English).

The first thing which that self-giving love must long to do is to win others to seek it at its own source. It is not possible to receive Christ into the heart without a longing to draw others to the Father through Him. Because that is His longing; and where He is, that longing must be. How many of our communicants are in fact missionaries in their own parishes? How far have they even been taught that they ought to be? The sacrament of the altar may be the most august of all the means of grace; but it is not grace, it is means, not end. The end is the life in grace, and grace is the love of God active in men's hearts to the accomplishment of the divine purpose to sum up all things in Christ.

We must turn our congregations into bands of evangelists. We must proclaim the gospel to the people where they are. No one proposes to convert the peoples of Africa by elaborating the ceremonial or increasing the number of celebrations in our own churches. It is just as futile to think of converting the "detached" multitudes at home without going to them where they are. To convert the African, you must go to Africa; to convert the man-in-the-street you must go into the street. We must develop our open-air work, our evangelistic enterprises in public halls, in luncheon-hour assemblies at factories and the like. But the clergy cannot do it all. They may give a lead and inaugurate. But the laity must do most of it. And the clergy must be glad to see them do it. They will make some blunders, so do we of the clergy; but we are (like other folk) more apprehensive of the ill-effects resulting from other people's blunders than of those due to our own. It does very little harm if an eager layman talks heresy, provided he shows and imparts a love for the Lord Jesus; it does great harm if a priest talks orthodoxy in such a way as to make men think the gospel either irrelevant or dull.

Dr. Kinsolving Urges Clergy in Public Schools.

Christian Century, July 3, 1935.

With a startling headline, the Boston Globe reported the sermon by Dr. Arthur L. Kinsolving in Trinity Church on June 12. "If priests and ministers were given an hour in the public schools several times a week, to meet their own children and teach them the Scriptures and the way of life, it would cost government nothing, do the minister a lot of good, give many of them just what they crave, reduce juvenile delinquency, create a new church." Education, he said, gained its reputation as Christian. "It is secular education, divorced from religious impulse and moral objective, that is found wanting. Christian colleges have been engulfed by the secular or pagan influences of the larger places of learning. The Roman Catholic Church alone has been able to maintain its educational system, absorbing most of its effort, while Protestants have spent mainly for institutions of philanthropy. There never was a time when religion was given so little recognition in education. This situation is abnormal, unwise, unnecessary, shortsighted and doomed. Christ will return to claim the central city of education. We must reinstate religion in the public schools. A convention on juvenile delinquency noted a town free from it for a number of years, and found that normal attention to religion had been restored to its schools. Christ is crowded out of colleges founded in His Name: bring Him back!"

The Boy Scouts.

The Living Church, June 22, 1935.

We have been reading with interest the booklet entitled "Our Religious Principles," issued by the Boy Scouts of America on the occasion of the silver anniversary that that organization is celebrating this year. The Boy Scout organization is a notable example of the building of loyal citizenship on a solid foundation of religion. The first of the three points in the Scout Oath is: "To do my duty to God and my country and to obey the Scout Law." The twelfth Scout law is: "A scout is reverent. He is reverent toward God. He is faithful in his religious duties and respects the convictions of others in matters of custom and religion." This is a sound doctrine and the source of much of the strength of the Boy Scout movement. Scouting rightly recognizes the essential part that religion must play in character building. By the very nature of its organization it cannot iself provide this religious element, but it can and does cooperate with the Church in so doing. Scouting is willing to work with the Church and where the Church utilizes scouting the result is a powerful combination of forces for the building of character in American boys. Today in a greater degree than ever before this is a vital need of our country.

God's Garden

It is interesting to consider that every flower, no matter how highly valued, or carefully cultivated, came originally from God's Garden, that is, from Nature herself. Even the choicest orchids grown in the conservatories of the very wealthy, owe their origin to some far distant tropical forests. In fact, we may say that all our garden flowers, many of which, however, have been improved by cultivation, are but brothers and cousins of those which grow wild in God's Garden. It is the same with the trees which decorate our lawns, in all their beautiful variety and luxuriant growth; they can all be found somewhere in what we call a wild state upon this earth of ours. The flowers and trees, and the grass which carpets the earth, are all God's free gifts to us and we hold them in trust from Him. 'The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof.'' And again, ''The trees of the Lord are full of sap, even the cedars of Libanus, which He hath planted.'' These are but two of many passages which might be quoted to show the close relationship which exists between the Creator and the works of His Hands. To these might be added the following:—''He maketh the grass to grow upon the mountains and green herb for the use of men.'' The earth, then, is God's Garden, and like the Garden of Eden, He has placed man in it to tend it and care for it and to eat the fruit thereof.

The Lost Reverence for Nature.

It is sad to think how far men's minds have strayed from this beautiful conception of our relation to Nature and to God. The reverence with which we should regard Nature, as manifesting God's love and care for us, is almost entirely lost. We have forgotten that this is God's earth, and we have come to regard it as so entirely our own that we can rob it of its beauty, and to a large extent we have turned the garden into a wilderness. The trees of the Lord have been treated as a spoil by those greedy of gain, and if it had not been for the creation of National Parks by the government, the wonderful giants of the forest, which have survived the storms and winters of thousands of years, would have been swept away with a ruthless hand. Even our heathen forefathers had an awe and reverence for Nature which formed part of their religion, and the loss of this reverence on our part, can by no means be regarded as a mark of progress, but rather as a complete failure to understand that the beauty of Nature is one of the most important refining influences of civilization, a proper appreciation of which enriches our lives and characters.

The Judgments We Have Brought Upon Ourselves.

The severe judgments which have befallen us as a people, such as the dust storms, the destructive floods, and long continued droughts are, in a great measure, due to the reckless abuse of the responsibility which rests upon us as trustees of a great inheritance. That so large a proportion of our people should have been brought to the verge of destitution is due to the migration which has been going on during the last few generations, from the natural home of man, the country, to its artificial substitute, the city, where men walk the streets seeking in vain for work, or forming part of long bread lines, dependent upon charity. Nature not only provides food, but fosters true manhood and womanhood by the inspiration of independence and self-reliance, both of which are being sadly impaired, if not entirely lost, by continued unemployment.

What the Future Holds in Store For Us.

The hope that the various industries of the country will be able to provide work for the millions of idle hands now ekeing out a meager and miserable existence on relief, seems to be dependent upon a revival of our foreign trade. But here again we face a complete uncertainty as this revival depends upon the ability of foreign nations to buy our goods, unless we are willing to lend them the money to pay for them. It would seem as if the only way out of our difficulties is to seriously consider the possibilities which Mother Nature affords for providing not wealth but a comfortable living for those who will be content to live on the bounty which she is capable of giving us.

What Nature Has Done Elsewhere.

It is said that a Chinese family can support itself on an acre of land. In Belgium much of the land is worked like a garden, being divided up into lots of less than three acres, and the spade is used as a means of more intensive cultivation for the production of larger crops. There is no necessity, however, to restrict the family to so small a parcel of ground in this country. It was said years ago, that if all the people in the United States were moved to Texas, that state would not be more thickly populated than Germany. Nature is the source from which our chief blessings come, and a return to her fostering care seems to be the best way out of our present difficulties, at any rate, for a large proportion of our population. We have learned by sad experience what the reckless abuse and loss of reverence for the Garden of the Lord has brought us to. By clear thinking and careful planning, our country might become a paradise in which our people might live happy and healthful lives, with their children growing up far from the slums and criminal associations in which so many of them are now condemned to live out an abnormal and unnatural existence. It is a signficant fact that those who have gained independence in business, as a rule, want nothing better than to own a home in the country and find their chief pleasure and enjoyment there.

The Problem of Distribution.

It has been often said that the problem of production has been solved; that the difficuty lies in the problem of distribution. This is true with regard to the fruits of the earth. Crops are being restricted, and even plowed under, while people suffer hunger and their children are under-nourished, the evil effects of which bode ill for their future and that of the nation. The true solution of the problem would seem to be the proper distribution of the surplus population in such a way as to enable them to share in the bounty of Nature, as there is enough for all, if they can be placed where they can take advantage of it. Treat Nature with the respect and reverence due to her as the Garden of the Lord, and there will be no more desirable home for man than the country.

The sky above, the trees around,
The grass beneath one's feet,
With birds and flowers, this is the place
Where heaven and earth do meet.

Frederick W. Neve.

An Ordination Sermon

By JAMES R. SHARP,

Secretary of the Diocese of Tennessee.

Acts 6:5—"Stephen, . . . and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas."

HERE are seven names of seven men, written down, for the one and only time, as associated together for the furtherance of a certain task. Of the first and second named, we read somewhat more in the two following chapters. Of the other five appears in the record no further mention whatsoever.

The first named of the seven we remember as the first "martyr", the first follower of Christ to bear that highest type of witness, the surrender of life itself for a testimony of his faith. The second, Philip, we know as the first recorded foreign missionary, carrying the glad tidings of the Gospel of the Risen Christ, first to the neighboring nation of Samaria, and then to that representative of another race from another continent, the treasurer of Queen Candace. But Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas—no faintest hint of their activities as fellow-laborers in a particular task with Stephen and Philip, is vouchsafed to us in the inspired chronicle.

What was the task to which these seven men were assigned? It was just a bit of social service work: the oversight of a detail of administration in the almonry department of the infant Church. The Hellenist or Greek-speaking converts from Judaism had made complaint that in "the daily ministration" of assistance to the needy members of the rapidly expanding Christian community in Jerusalem, there was discrimination against them and partiality toward the Palestinians. The Apostles as the responsible heads of the community took cognizance of the situation, and to allay the dissatisfaction invited "the whole multitude of the disciples", apparently including both groups, to nominate seven fit men to supervise this particular activity, which they called "serving tables." It was a task to which they felt that their divine commission as spiritual leaders did not justify their giving personal time and attention, at the expense of their "ministry of the Word". Yet, it is noteworthy that in the Greek the words "serving" (of tables) and "ministry" (of the Word)—diakonein, diakonia—are but different forms of the same word. It is also noteworthy, that while the task to which the seven were to be assigned was primarily of a temporal rather than a spiritual character, yet the "form and manner" of their appointment was the same as that mentioned throughout the New Testament record as being used for appointment to distinctly spiritual functions: the Apostles "prayer, and laid their hands on them". We are also to observe, that while "the multitude of the disciples" made the nomination, the Apostles made the appointment. "Look ye out seven men . . . whom we may appoint."

This formal setting apart of the Seven has been generally, though not unanimously, considered by Christian writers as the beginning of that order in the Apostolic Ministry of the Catholic Church of Christ which we now call the Diaconate. Yet, nowhere in the New Testament are the Seven called "deacons". It may be that not from them, but from a quite different group was evolved the later diaconate. Unquestionably, in the development of Christian institutions, including the Ministry, it is true as it is in human life generally, that things came before names. This is, of course, strongly exemplified in the New Testament use of the words elder, presbyter, and bishop.

There is another point we may well bear in mind as we read our New Testament. The Acts and the Epistles are not a set of directions for forming a society of believers, a "constitution and by-laws" for organizing a Church. That they have sometimes been so regarded is due to a chronological misapprehension. The New Testament (including the Gospels in written form) did not come before the Church; the Church came before the New Testament. This is elementary, of course; yet it has sometimes, in some quarters, been overlooked. The references to the Ministry, for instance, especially in the Epistles, are to a ministry already constituted and functioning. We raise questions of interpretation that probably never even occurred to those to whom St. Paul wrote; and we seek for the completeness and definiteness of a scientific or philosophical treatise in passages where the original writer and the original readers were alike content with mere allusion to matters already familiar to them both.

Thus it is that we cannot draw from the New Testament a precise diagram of the organization of the early Church or the constitution of its ministry. Thus it is that four theories of the Ministry, papal, episcopal, presbyterial, and congregational, each have their adherents among the Christian peoples of the world today; and each of them is claimed by its own adherents to be "apostolic".

TWO facts do, however, stand out in the narrative of the appointing of the Seven. These were assigned to their specific work by the Apostles, the official leaders, those to whom had been given by Our Lord Himself the Great Commission, "Go; Teach; Be My Witnesses". And their function transcended the "serving of tables" which was the immediate occasion of their appointment; Stephen became a notable apologist, Philip a successful evangelist. Whether their ministry was actually the germ of what afterward became known as the Diaconate, or not, is of little or no moment. That it was an "order of the ministry" distinct from and subordinate to that of the Apostles, is unquestionable. That either from this or from some similar delegation by the Apostles to others of a portion of their plenary authority bestowed in the Master's "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you", arose the Diaconate of the sub-apostolic and post-apostolic documents, is an apparently inescapable conclusion.

As we pass from the obscurity of early dawn in the scanty records of the first century after Pentecost, into the clearer light of day in later history, from Ignatius and Irenaeus on, there emerges this picture of the Ministry of the Christian Church, everywhere recognized and accepted, and regarded as of apostolic origin: the Bishops to govern, to confirm, to ordain; the Presbyters to absolve, to bless, to distribute the Bread of Life; the Deacons to serve, to attend upon, to assist in divers ways, the other two in their ministrations. As the Preface to our Ordinal, bound up with our Book of Common Prayer, says: "It is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the Apostles' times there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church—Bishops, Priests and Deacons". This is the formal, official, authoritative statement of this our Church in America, as of the other national Churches in the Anglican Communion, of her belief and teaching on the subject of the Ministry; and this is the basis of her practice with respect to this feature of her ecclesiastical polity.

What a sane, conservative, balanced statement it is! There is neither condemnation nor criticism of any other form of ministry. It is a fact that this Church did consider it worth the effort of many months, a century and a half ago, to procure, through the consecration of Bishops Seabury, White, Provoost and Madison, the unquestioned transmission to America of this ministry. And this fact may suggest the thought that this Church did, and does, deem this to be the only ministry which adequately assures her own continuity with the primitive Church, after whose doctrine and practice she claims to pattern hers. Yet, this statement of the Preface in no wise asserts that this particular form of ministry is the only one for Christian people. Nor does it aver even that it is the best form; though the tenacious way in which this Church clings to it may suggest that she herself does find it, in theory and practice, that which is best adapted to her own progress and development. No; as Dean Hodges expressed it, this Church does not claim that her way, with its ministry of the three orders, is the only way, or that it is the best way; but that it is the old way. We find, upon pursuing our study of Church History, down through the nineteen centuries since the days of the Apostles, that always, since its emergence from the first period of development, there has been such a ministry. For a millennium and a half, until the religious cataclysms of the sixteenth century, with scarce a dissenting voice, the threefold ministry met the Vincentian test of acceptance always, everywhere, and by all; and it is still maintained by more than three-fourths of all Christendom today.

So, in those troublous times of ecclesiastical revolution four centuries ago, when many good Christian men elsewhere, despairing of any effective reform from within, broke away altogether from the past and set their feet in new and untried paths, our Mother Church of England steadfastly adhered to what she believed to be the more excellent way, retaining her organic connection with the past by the continuance of the historic ministry, and returning to the earlier purity of teaching and practice by the discontinuance of medieval errors and abuses. And so she affirmed, as the Preface goes on to say, her intention that "these Orders" (the ancient threefold ministry which had been from the Apostles' time) should "be continued, and reverently used and esteemed in this Church."

THIS, then, is the Ministry, to the first Order of which these candidates are to be admitted today.

We are here to make of these two laymen, communicants of St. James' Parish, Deacons. Not deacons of this parish; we do not ordain a deacon as minister of a particular congregation. Not deacons of the Diocese of Tennessee, or of the Province of Sewanee. Not even deacons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America—though each of them will be required to make a solemn promise of conformity to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of that Church. But they are to be made "Deacons in the Church of God"—ministers in and for the whole body of the faithful. It is, of course, profoundly true that their loyalty to the whole Catholic Church of Christ will be best exemplified and most clearly manifested in their loyalty to that portion of the same wherein it shall fall to their lot to minister. One who lives in and gets his support from this community, cannot be a good citizen of the United States, if he be a bad citizen of Tennessee or of Knoxville. The primary loyalty to the whole Body of Christ will inevitably involve an immediate faithfulness in the local task, and an immediate loyalty to the work of evangelism and education and service to mankind as set forth in the diocesan and general Church program of this our own particular portion of "the mystical Body of Christ, which is the blessed company of all faithful people".

The functions of a layman, of a Deacon, of a Priest—and, we may add, of a Bishop—in the Church of God, are diverse one from another. Yet, in their diversity is an underlying unity of purpose and of plan; and each and every one of them has one thing and one alone to do: to be a witness to Christ, to make Him known, that the knowledge of Him and of the Father Who sent Him may be life eternal for every man everywhere. This is not the task of the Clergy; it is the task of the whole Body of Christ, Laity and Clergy together. It is true that there are certain functions within the Body reserved to those members who are of the several Orders of the "Sacred Ministry", technically so-called; it is not true that the proper functions of the Laity are any less a ministry or any less sacred—or any less binding an obligation on the conscience of the individual.

These candidates for the Diaconate will presently stand before the Bishop to make their vows of faithfulness in performance of their specialized duties. The rubric requires the vows to be made "in the presence of the people". You their fellow-members of the Body of Christ, are here specifically as witnesses—attestors—of the making of these vows. You will naturally expect of these men, that they shall faithfully and loyally fulfil these vows. But remember this: you, each and every one of you, took vows at your baptism and confirmation of performance of certain specific duties. Just how faithfully and loyally are you performing those duties?

The Deacons will be licensed to preach the Gospel from the pulpits of the Church. You, no less, are charged to spread the good tidings by word and example in your daily life. They will take part in the sanctuary with the Priest at the Altar, in the offering of the "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving". You, in the pews, have just as real and just as necessary a part in that offering. The "we" used throughout in the language of the Liturgy is the whole body of the faithful.

I might go on at length and multiply comparisons, but these should suffice. Let me but beg of you, good Christian people of the Order of the Laity, to reflect earnestly and seriously upon these things; and may God give each one of you grace, in your own vocation and ministry, to serve Him just as faithfully as you, their witnesses, shall pray this morning that these your brethren, in theirs, may "both by word and good example, faithfully serve God in their office, to the glory of His Name and the edification of His Church".

AND now to you, my brothers, I would say a few words in a more personal vein.

It will presently be certified, over the signature of the Bishop, that you have been tried, proved, examined, and found fit for admission into the Order of Deacons.

It is true (unfortunately, I think) that the Diaconate as a distinct Order has well-nigh fallen into disuse in the actual practice of Western Christendom. It is true that you yourselves are today being called to the Diaconate only as a preliminary to being called some months hence to the Priesthood. It is true that our Anglican Ordinal says in effect to every Deacon ordained that his is an "inferior office", a mere stepping-stone to a "higher ministry".

Yet, it is also true that this Diaconate upon which you are entering offers you a real opportunity and a real field for real service. Instances are not wanting in Church History of Deacons who, never advancing to the Priesthood, have left behind them names honored for achievement in Christian witness and service. Such were Lawrence of Rome and Vincent of Saragossa in the early centuries; such was Nicholas Ferrar of Little Gidding in the seventeenth. Notable examples in our own diocese are within the memory of this present generation.

So, while you look forward eagerly, and quite rightly, to your future work as Priests, I charge you that you despise not the challenge and the opportunity of your present commission. Let not your spiritual vision suffer the all-too-common defect of hyperopia, far-sightedness, which sees all the beauty and splendor of the distant prospect, but fails to focus clearly on things at hand. Do not think the humbler tasks of your subordinate ministry unworthy of your keenest attention and your best effort. They are your schooling for larger tasks ahead. The heroes who win renown by brilliant achievement in time of crisis are usually not of those who have shirked or scamped the performance of their ordinary duties in time of commonplace routine. Lindbergh did not fly the Atlantic the first time he handled the controls. Many a mail plane pilot today, who will never make the front page unless he should have the misfortune to crash, is quietly and unostentatiously carrying on, doing just that daily work which gave the Lone Eagle his training for his more spectacular but not more useful exploits. So, in your service for God and His children, dream not overmuch of greater opportunities to come, but labor diligently to seize the lesser ones at hand. Ask not, "How big a thing can I find to do for Him hereafter?" but rather, "How well can I do that thing, small though it be, which He has for me to do now?"

The Greek word diakonos, the lexicons say, is of uncertain derivation. We may say that it is at least possibly akin to dia konios, "through the dust" of toil. Your service as Deacons may call for much of humble and of laborious effort, with little of immediate or of apparent result. Let not that dishearten or discourage you. It has been a source of much consolation to me throughout my own ministry, to remember that God does not hold us responsible for visible results. One may plant and another water, but He—and He alone—gives the increase.

You will not, probably, be called upon to give up your life for the Master as was Stephen. You are called upon to give out your life for Him in service—faithful, humble, self-denying service to mankind.

You may not be called upon to bear the message of evangelism to Liberia or China or Brazil. You will, not once nor twice, but repeatedly, meet opportunity to tell it to those whose character and temperament and habit of thought are as truly alien to yours as was Samaria or Abyssinia to Philip.

Much of your work, perhaps all of it, will make no more noise in the world than did, so far as we are told, that of Prochorus and Nicanor and Timon and Parmenas and Nicolas. Yet, if you do that work earnestly and faithfully and loyally, your names, too, will be written, as are theirs, not in an earthly record only, but in the Lamb's Book of Life.

And finally, I would point you, not to the Seven, but to Him Whose they, and you, are, and Whom they, and you, serve. Among His sayings while He was here in the flesh are two notable antitheses.

He said, "I came, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." May this be a guiding thought of your ministry as it was of His.

And He said, "The Son of Man came, not to be ministered unto, but to minister"—diakonesai, to be a deacon.

He is indeed the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls; but He never called Himself a Bishop.

He is indeed our Great High Priest; but He never called Himself a Priest.

He called Himself a Deacon.

And in that lowly path of service He calls you to follow Him.

On Growing Old

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,

Bishop of Washington.

AS THE YEARS MULTIPLY, when physical strength wanes and fails, to feel that we are actually accumulating strength, strength of will and of purpose, brings a satisfaction that excels all else. We know and have known men and women whose inner qualities and graces seemed to become more evident with the passing of the years. What we call personality, that combination of mental, cultural and spiritual qualities, becomes in certain people more fascinating and more compelling when the hairs are whitened and the brow furrowed. Such men and women possess an aura, a subtle quality that has more persuasive power than any spoken word or any spectacular act. Some of our mothers possess such a quality and in their presence we feel a sense of inexpressible admiration that approximates reverence. It was said of Washington by his confreres, that his presence was such that he seemed to overtop all his associates and to out-rank all the men of his generation. "Trailing clouds of glory do they come," a poet thus speaks of children; it might more fitly be applied to those of whom we write.

What we have in mind does not necessarily issue from rare intellectual gifts, nor does it belong solely to physical beauty. It may be something we cannot adequately define, but only experience. There is a passage in the book of Job that expresses it, when in his grief and deep reflection the author writes: "The righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall grow stronger and stronger." Righteousness, which means the highest standard of right living, is essential to what we have in mind. Surely clean hands and clean thoughts are also indispensable concomitants also. It is a combination of all of these that produce the composite character we have in mind. When the Master would speak of supreme excellence in character, He gave purity a first place, saying: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." As He appraised life He conceived that fitness for the greater vision of its ultimate purpose, was clean thinking and a life regulated by clean standards. All our observation and experience confirm His lofty conception. We cannot think in terms of ideal attainment without these imperishable qualities. It is men and women whose minds are occupied with the best, that reflect it in their characters. Such people, even when age is upon them, disclose all the spontaneity and resourcefulness of youth. They grow old gracefully and with increasing beauty of character, because they enjoy a serenity that comes from perfect trust in the outworking of a divine plan and the assurance that they are nearing the consummation of their highest hopes and expectations. Another passage, in the prophecy of Isaiah, thus graphically describes the renewal that issues from such an unfailing trust, "They that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint."

What a contrast this suggests when we think of those whose lives are increasingly burdened with cares

New Calendars for Old

By MARY F. GOODWIN,

Historiographer of Diocese of Southern Virginia.

IN THESE DAYS of bewildering changes and inevitable chances we are apt to think that mankind was never before confronted with so many readjustments, such strain and mental stress. Among the changes confronting us now is the adoption of a new secular calendar. There are many arguments pro and con such changes as are proposed. The fixed and rigid calendar which is championed by the League of Nations would simplify many business problems, we are told. Our General Convention, as well as the Universal Christian Council has endorsed this calendar. The changes to be made were fully set forth in an article published in the Southern Churchman of December 29, 1934. The chief objection to the new calendar is the fixed date for Easter, regardless of the Paschal moon. Who could really feel that it was Easter if a new moon were hanging in the west?

But it is not of this calendar we would write, but of the agitation over the acceptance of the present Gregorian calendar more than two hundred years ago. Great Britain retained the old Julian calendar until 1752, she was the last of the great powers to make the change. The Roman Catholic countries had adopted the Gregorian calendar at the beginning of the sixteenth century, when it was sponsored by the Vatican. Protestant Germany had accepted it in 1700, and Russia only gave up the Julian calendar when the Soviet government threw out all reminders of the former Christian regime a few years ago, and substituted a calendar of their own.

For many years before the Gregorian calendar was accepted by Great Britain, much was written and published on the subject. Among the advocates for a change was a young professor of mathematics in "His Majesty's Royal College of William and Mary in Virginia". The Rev. Hugh Jones got his M. A. at Jesus' College, Oxford, before coming to Virginia, where he became the head of the Grammar School and Professor of Mathematics in the College in Williamsburg, and also preached in James City County. In 1724, while on a visit to England, he wrote a long treatise on the changes of the calendar, which today is kept in the MS. Division of the British Museum. As far as we know, this has never been printed.

Being a scholar, Mr. Jones went into the history of calendars in general, he considers the mathematical side of the question, with great detail, working out Golden Numbers and Dominical Letters with precision, proving again that the Julian Calendar had fallen behind by twelve days. While accepting the Continental calendar "in principle", Mr. Jones thought that a Christian Country should emphasize its creed in the names of the months and days of the week, as well as in other respects. He, therefore, proposed a lunar calendar which had, from time to time, been considered whenever revisions had been made. His calendar was to have thirteen months with an odd day between the thirteenth and the first months. His originality showed in the names he proposed for the months. He suggested that they be rechristened—or christened, we might say—with the names of the twelve apostles, the thirteenth month to be called "St. Paul". Appropriate names were also suggested for the days of the week, in place of the Norse gods and goddesses whose names were perpetuated by the names then—and now—in use. So far so good, there remained only the naming of the extra day at the end of the year. In the present proposed calendar, which also has an extra day at the end of the year, this day has the characterless name of "Year End Day". Not so with Hugh Jones' plan. Being a true son of Albion, as well as of the Church, he suggested that this extra day be known as "Briton's Day", and if the rest of the world did not like the designation, they could, for all he cared, rename it to suit themselves. But this "American Plan", as Will Rogers would have called it, was not acceptable, and fell into the discard, as many other suggestions did, when the Gregorian calendar was finally adopted in Great Britain. For two centuries this calendar has been in use in English-speaking countries, and now we are faced with another change.

AS WE mentioned before, Russia has an entirely new calendar. Her week has only six days, which are not named, but are designated by number. The sixth day is generally observed as a rest day. Germany, while not making any radical changes, is emphasizing as far as possible the ancient heathen origin of the names and festivals which the Church took over when Northern Europe was Christianized. Such Christian designations as Easter are omitted as far as possible in the official calendars authorized by the Government, or such explanations as the following are made. Christmas is called "Baldur's light-birth and mother-night, and the visit of the female yule and Christ-Child"—and this in the land of Luther and of the Christmas tree! The Epiphany is the festival of "the day of the three mythological heroes". Ash-Wednesday is "Ash Woden's Day", Palm Sunday and the Sunday after Easter are for the consecration of Youth. On Good Friday Germans are admonished to "think of the 4,500 Saxons murdered by Karl, the Butcher (Charlemagne), and nine million others". Easter Day is characterized as "The Festival of Ostara of the Sunrise end of Spring, of young trees, etc." Ascension Day is the day of "Donoa's entry into Heaven".

Thus has the Nazi government bent for their own use the Christian festivals which they retain in the calendar.

In face of the use Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany are making of the universal Holy Day, recognized in the old calendar, should not the makers of the new pause before advocating such meaningless names as "Year End Day", when the opportunity has presented itself to use some Christian designation, which might be acceptable to the whole Christian world? Do we always do well to ignore the wisdom of the children of this world? Perhaps Mr. Jones' suggestion might prove a happy one; when we consider how much the peace of Europe and the fate of civilization hang on the policy of Great Britain—which is truly a Christian policy—we might do worse than commemorate her efforts towards keeping the peace by naming this extra day "Briton's Day".

I may not ever see
All that He does through me,
But just a tiny part
Will warm and cheer my heart.
The life which He can give
Is the true life to live,
And though my faith be dim,
I will believe in Him.

THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY

Latin America: Missionary Theme, 1935-1936.

THE SPECIAL MISSIONARY theme for next winter is Latin America. Although emphasis will be laid upon the relation of Christianity to modern movements in South America and Mexico, the Caribbean area may be included in the study. The chief source book recommended is "That Other America," by John A. Mackay (New York, Friendship Press, sixty cents).

Among the books for collateral reading which may be borrowed from the Church Missions House Library are:

"The New Map of South America," by Herbert Adams Gibbons. (New York, Century, 1929. $3.) This book deals with the political development of each nation in Latin America with the two concluding chapters on relations between the United States and Latin America.

"The Two Americas," by Stephen Duggan. (New York, Scribner's, 1934. $1.75.) An interpretation for the general reader of the principal social, economic, and political factors affecting inter-American relations.

"Peace by Revolution," by Frank Tannenbaum. (New York, Columbia University Press, 1933. $3.50.) A discussion of Mexico in terms of race, religion, politics, revolution, land, labor, and education.

"Bright Mexico," by Larry Barretto. (New York, Farrar and Rinehart, 1934. $2.) An account of the author's travels in Mexico.

"Women Under the Southern Cross," by Margaret Ross Miller. (Boston, Central Committee, 1935. Fifty cents.) A general survey of conditions in South America showing the important contribution of Christian missions to the life of women.

For a fuller reference list write to the Educational Secretary.

The Handbooks on Episcopal Missions in Brazil, Mexico, and the Caribbean will be available in revised editions in September.

Leaders expecting to conduct discussions or plan programs on Latin America may wish to carry out some of the following suggestions during the summer:

Collect newspaper clippings, arranging them in a scrapbook according to theme or country.

Study the map of South America. Test your knowledge by drawing an outline map and filling in the countries from memory. Locate places referred to in current news articles. Dr. Mackay's book contains an excellent colored map of Latin America. A picture map of Mexico is available through the Church Missions House Book Store (fifty cents); a wall map of Latin America at sixty cents. The National Council will issue maps showing our mission stations in Mexico and the Caribbean, and Brazil.

Look up articles on Latin-American missions which have appeared in The Spirit of Missions within the past two or three years. An index will help. Make a packet of the articles to circulate in your parish.

Send to the Pan-American Union, Washington, D. C., for a list of its publications, among which are leaflets descriptive of the Latin-American countries.

Send to the Foreign Policy Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, and to the World Peace Foundation, 40 Mount Vernon Street, Boston, Massachusetts, for a list of recent pamphlets on Latin-American affairs.

Search back numbers of The National Geographic Magazine, if available, for pictures to use in making posters.

Send to the Book Store after July first for Fun and Festival from Latin America, by Winifred H. Hulbert (25 cents).

Consider how you answer such questions as the following (discuss them with your friends): What are some of the differences between North American and Latin-American civilization? What causes account for the cultural differences? Is there any justification for the Monroe Doctrine today? What has been the effect of the present "good neighbor" policy of our Government upon inter-American relations? What attitude should Christian forces take toward the new movements of thought in Latin America? Toward the social revolution in Mexico? How would you answer the objection that evangelical missions have no place in Latin America? What should be the objective of Christian work in Latin America.

The Fifty-third Annual Convention of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Western Michigan met recently in St. Paul's Church, Muskegon. Considerably over one hundred women were registered and many of the diocesan clergy were in attendance. Speakers from outside the diocese were Bishop Roberts of South Dakota; Miss Winifred Moore of the Liberian Mission, now on furlough, and Mrs. W. L. Torrence of Detroit. There was a Quiet Hour on Tuesday afternoon conducted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. John K. Coolidge, and on Wednesday morning there was a Celebration of the Holy Communion conducted by Bishop McCormick, with special recognition of deceased members of the Auxiliary. All the meetings and services were of unusual interest and the hospitality of St. Paul's Parish was most adequate and gracious. Mrs. M. V. Burlingame of Grace Church, Grand Rapids, was re-elected president, and St. Mark's, Grand Rapids, was chosen as the meeting place for next year. At the installation of the officers for the next year, conducted by the Bishop, the form of Service set forth by the Auxiliary headquarters was used and was found very appropriate. On both days prayers were said for the Forward Movement and in all the addresses and discussions the Forward Movement was kept prominently before the Convention. The Convention also resolved to cooperate fully with the Diocesan Summer Conference to be held the last week in June at Rochdale Inn.

Dr. Elliott on Furlough Speaks to Mission Study Class.

Dr. Mabel E. Elliott, a medical missionary on the staff of the famous St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, and a native of Philadelphia, made the special address at the Closing Sessions of the Mission Study Classes of the Woman's Auxiliary in this diocese in the parish house of the Church of the Holy Trinity.

Dr. Elliott, who has just returned from Japan on furlough, is a communicant of the Church of the Saviour, in West Philadelphia, and for a number of years prior to volunteering for missionary work in Japan, was a medical practitioner in this city. During the World War Dr. Elliott served in hospital work overseas and following the war served with the Near East Relief in Armenia. About eight years ago she volunteered for service under the late Dr. R. B. Teusler, founder of St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo, and was one of his chief aids in the development of the new St. Luke's following the earthquake of 1923, when the first St. Luke's Hospital was virtually destroyed.

The Mission Study Classes to whom Dr. Elliott spoke comprised women who are members of Study Classes in the various parishes. During the past year they have been studying Japan. The Mission Study Classes Offering, which was presented at this meeting, will be sent to Mrs. Charles S. Reifsnider, wife of the Missionary Bishop of North Tokyo, and the money will be used for children's work in the slums of Tokyo.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Is There No Longer Any Self-Denial in God's People to Relieve a Situation Like This?

Under date of May 15, 1935, Dr. Grafton Burke writes from the Hudson Stuck Hospital, Fort Yukon, Alaska:

"We reached the absolute minimum before this last slash. In my effort, going on now to thirty years in this work, to spare Bishop Rowe from all financial worries of this medical mission station (which it has been a privilege to do), I am faced constantly with matters that entail unavoidable expenditures.

"For instance, there is no appropriation for our hospital servant girls, nor for the engineer in the power house—and I'm on the jump for that money.

"Here's a white man down and out, brought to us by plane nearly dead with pernicious anemia. Fresh liver extract costing $10, I telegraphed for. I paid the airplane $2 for bringing it, and I paid the telegraph bill and I paid the drug bill. And this is all in the job. There's no side-stepping—if the Church is going to save lives.

"A medical post has no option. It cannot do otherwise. The sewers give trouble and have to be dug up. A crew of men costs money. Now I am having one sewer thawed with a boiler, and that costs. This morning I bought ten gallons of gasoline ($7.50) and charged it to myself, to run the tractor and haul gravel, so that the nurses and the cook could go to the clothes lines back of the hospital without sinking in mud up to their ankles. Solarium glass is broken, the nurses windows are smashed by ice, the roof leaks, screens must go up, an Indian woman is in urgent need of a special gland extract preparation, and I wire Parke Davis Company. To feed a man raw liver cocktails, I have to buy catsup, Worcester sauce, orange juice every day or two. What can a medical post do? Health is paramount. There is a steady drain that is utterly unavoidable. Take it as you please, I've pondered, studied, worried, specialized on this work all my life. And I've also weeded out. I know the loss of a $1,000 for incidentals means rustling, and I don't must doing that. But an absolute necessity as fuel—the keeping of the institution warm for the sick—ought to be forthcoming without causing one grave anxiety as it does me.

"In countering the throttling suffocating circumstances of financial worry, I cannot—must not spend all my time fighting for breath. There is God's work to be done here by saving lives. And surely without the Episcopal Church they would not be saved. Recently we removed a cancerous breast bone (sternum), collar bone and rib, and discharged a woman, rejoicing that she is happy and healthy and praising God that she feels so well. On week days there are baptisms, and marriages and meetings, and on Sunday I conduct two services in Indian, one Indian Church School, one English-speaking Church School, and an eight o'clock service for the whites.

"I could go on, ad infinitum. But now, the one o'clock clinic awaits, and I must stop."

Writing on May 7, from Point Hope, Archdeacon Goodman says: "It seems a long time since I heard any news from the outside world. Just about two months from now our summer mail should be nearing Point Hope, and sometime later, perhaps early in August, Bishop Rowe should be appearing."

BOOK REVIEWS

CHRIST'S ALTERNATIVE TO COMMUNISM: By E. Stanley Jones. Pp. 302. Published by The Abingdon Press, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. Price, $2.

This is the most challenging book on Communism and Christianity we have ever seen so far. We also consider this book to be the best of Dr. Jones' writings. He describes Communism as the greatest rival to Christianity today. He gives us a fine hisrorical account of the influence of Communism in Russia and how it has reached the Far East. He thinks that Russian Communism will cause a great aawkening in Christianity that will release its power in the world for an economic revival along the teaching of Jesus Christ. This is his "Alternative to Communism". Dr. Jones sounds the alarm that "Russian materialistic Communism does present an issue—a real issue. Object to it as we may, and as I do, on the basis of its lack of liberty, of its compulsions, of its ruthlessness, and its materialistic atheism, nevertheless it has founded society on a higher principle, namely, that of cooperation" (p. 17). This is stirring, coming from the pen of one of the outstanding missionaries of our modern Christianity; but it is a true picture of conditions as they are in Russia today.

Dr. Jones' expositions of the teaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus Christ with regard to wealth and its distribution are most suggestive and illuminating. They are sources of much pulpit material. The book is a real challenge to our modern Christianity to meet its most powerful rival, Communism. The war is not between sects, nor between schools of thought, but between Marx and Christ. But, as in other ages, Christianity is able to meet Marxianism, if only rediscovered and will put into practice the teaching of its Divine Founder. This is a real prophetic book that will stir the reader.

STUDIES IN THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MATTHEW: By E. Schuyler English. Pp. 226. Published by Fleming H. Revell Company, 158 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Price, $1.75.

This is not a technical commentary on the Gospel, nor is it an extensive exposition, but a devotional discussion. There is nothing new in it, yet there is a deep feeling of reverence displayed throughout th whole book. There is no critical analysis of the material or the sources that made up the Gospel, just a conservative interpretation—in many places just a re-statement of what is in the Gospel.

The author does not seem to connect the Church with the Kingdom of God at all. We read, "Where the Church is mentioned in the Word of God by a name . . . is not the Kingdom of Heaven". The Gospel According to Matthew, Studies by English. "By the Church is meant not the great ecclesiastical organization, but the body of believers, but that it represents Christendom, that is professing Christianity" (page 93). This book will supply much help to Bible class teachers and others who love devotional studies on the Bible.

WHY GOD BECAME MAN: By P. B. Fitzwater. Cloth. Pp. 79. Published by The Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago, Illinois. Price, 60 Cents.

Dr. Robert Norwood issued his popular treatise on our Lord by the title, "The Man Who Dared to be God". In that volume he built from the ground up, finding on earth a man who, above all other men, vindicated the claim to be one with God on earth.

Our author reverses the process and brings God down to us in the Incarnation. Both systems of thought are consistent with our ideas of what and how our Lord accomplished, in His earth-mission and subsequent activities.

Dr. Fitzwater traces the Incarnation all the way from the manger in Bethlehem to its sovereign consummation in the credal statement: "He shall come again with glory to judge the quick and the dead." For he holds that the Incarnation can never cease. Unto the ages of ages, the human body of our Lord, glorified humanity, must ever attest to the fact that God became Man.

The why is the contention of the writer. As we all know, the Incarnation involved the craving of God to reveal Himself to humanity; to meet the problem of sin; to satisfy the craving of the spiritually-minded for fellowship with God; to give access to God in prayer and service; to vindicate the essential prophecies of the Old Testament regarding His plan for the world. This is traced with fidelity to the testimony of the Scriptures and in a so-simple way as to make most easy the pathway of the reader in his pursuit of a definite conviction of the truth concerning the Son of God, who in turn is, as well, the Son of Man.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

Dancing and Religion

In a section where churches have been accustomed to frown upon the dance and consider it as a great sin, it comes to us as a surprise to hear that dancing began as a religious custom. Religious dances always were a prayer of some kind. The first two kinds were soon divided from what is called the distinctively religious. These first two were the social and the warlike.

The Social dance began as a kind of prayer for sociability and soon developed into such comic and peculiar movements as to break down the solemn faces of people who were looking on so that they were soon regarded as non-religious, as being more meant for men than the gods. But social dances have quite a history of their own. At their inception they were solemn things. But they gradually lost this solemnity. In the early days of the Egyptians, the higher classes did not indulge in it in person, so that it was simply spectacular, just as the ballet is with us. Those who have ever been to the grand opera in France, will remember that there they must always have a ballet even in the midst of the most solemn opera.

In the Greek dances the social dances began to take on the nature of the portrayal of emotions and ranked with poetry and music. Indeed, music and dancing were called "the married pair". In it the cheerfulness of the Greeks was shown.

Then we began to have the individual dances, whose modern day representative we see in the tap dance and folk dances, like the Irish jig or the dances of Eastern and Central Europe.

Then, too, there are their more sedate cousins which we practice in the waltz and its more modern sisters which are combinations from many streams, and whose names are too numerous to even mention.

Warlike dances began by being prayers for victory, either in warfare or in the hunt. But again they became so animated that people considered them more for men than for the gods. So they became a separate division.

These war dances, while beginning as a devotional practice soon became a method of stirring up the passions of the tribe, so that they would be more willing, yes, and anxious, to forego the comforts of home for the joys of combat.

The nearest analogy we get to this today is the marching we do to warlike airs, or our feelings when patriotic music is played like our National Anthem.

In the Religious dancing among savages the dancers are most solemn. The dance must be done exactly right. If a dancer made a single mistake, he might offend the gods, so that to show the mistake was not intentional, his tribe put him to death. One of the most striking of these dances was the one the women did when the men went away to war. It was a prayer for their safety and was kept up by groups the whole time until the men came home. Other religious dances among the savages with which we are familiar are the snake dance, sword dance and fire dance among the American Indians. Also the rain and corn dance were prayers for the rain and harvest.

When we leave savages and come to civilized people, we think naturally of the Egyptians. They had dances that would seem monotonous to us, with many postures of hands and the body. The most important of their religious dances were funeral dances in honor of the dead. They were slow and gliding. But the Egyptians had also many lively forms.

Hebrew dances were essentially religious rites. Each sex danced by itself, but no religious festival was complete without its dance. This they did probably first to a singing accompaniment, then with a harp, then with a flute and finally with the drum which was probably a hollowed-out small log with a skin stretched over it, played with the hand. Then also they had timbrels, with which we are best acquainted in the minstrel shows. The dance itself consisted of moving about in a line and then whirling around in more or less complicated fashion.

It may be of interest here just to mention a few of the references to dancing in the Bible.

Of course, we remember that David danced before the Lord. But often we do not remember that the man who is called in our versions, "The Preacher" in the book of Ecclesiastes, says: "There is a time to mourn and a time to dance". (Eccl. 3:4).

The Psalmist tells us also in Psalm 149, "Let them praise His name in the Dance", and in Psalm 150, "Praise Him with the Timbrel and Dance".

And Jeremiah, the weeping Prophet, did not always weep, for he tells of the joys of the Redeemed, "Thou shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry" (31:4), and, "Then shall the virgin rejoice in the dance, both young men and old together" (31:13).

And even Christ mentions dancing without condemnation in the story of the Prodigal Son. "He heard music and dancing" (Luke 15:25).

When we come to Christian times, it comes as a surprise to hear that the early Christians had the dance in their services. Special dances were held each feast day and on every Sunday. Indeed, St. Basil says that Christians ought to dance, as it is the principal occupation to the angels in heaven. Probably it is a relic of this idea that we see when angels are pictured with harps. But no one would dare today to picture angels in a dance.

Yet, in the Cathedral in Seville in Spain, twice annually the choir boys perform a sacred dance in the church. The same thing is done in front of the Church in Italy near Naples.

It must be confessed that these sacred dances among Christians are more in the nature of processions than we usually think of in connection with dancing. But dancing is really movement to music and when we consider that dancing is walking, or movement of the arms to music, the processional choir is really the modern representative of these stately religious dances of the past, accompanied by vocal and instrumental music. So also when we see the choir leader beating time, we may go back in our imagination to the Hebrew dances with their great use of the arms in religious dances.

Then, that we may complete the picture, we may mention that in the fifteenth century all dancing was at a very low ebb in Europe. It was revived at about the time of the Reformation in two dances, known as low and high dances. Low dances were stately dances, like the minuet and high were so called because they had people kick high in them, as they do in the jig of Ireland, or the Spanish Fandango, or the Highland Fling of Scotland. With these the Church would have nothing to do.

The two-step is of American origin, but the majority of modern dances are a combination from the jungles of Africa's religious or hunting dances, where they showed their gods what animal they were hunting, like the Turkey Trot, Bunny Hug, etc., and the imagination of white people in North and South America.

Nevertheless we should remember that the dance was originally religious and in some places is so today. Though we may make evil of the dance, yet many people have found it draws them closer to God. It depends on ourselves whether we let it harm us or help us.

ON GROWING OLD.

and the pursuit of material things and the acquisition of riches. To such there can be little of serenity and nothing of peace. As they grow in years they can live only in the recollection of days when ambition and desire had their satisfaction; everything is in the past, only shadows rest upon the days that lie ahead. Nature furnishes her most appealing and gorgeous picture in golden sunsets and in the rich coloring of autumn foliage. It would seem that God has reserved the choicest exhibitions of His handiwork for periods that suggest maturity and ripeness. It is when the sun is setting, when summer days are ended and the shadows of impending change are imminent, that the colorings are richest and most alluring. God so ordains man's life to be. There is nothing in old age that is repellant, nothing that suggests weakness or the near approach of failing powers. Where the life is stimulated and refreshed by a sublime hope and a perfect trust, where it lives in the consciousness of a continuing strength that sustains it on its way, to be able to say: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him," is to live triumphantly and without fear. The Psalmist had this in mind when he wrote: "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace." Surely the poet had it in mind when he wrote:

"Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be;
The last of life for which the first was made:
Our times are in his hand
Who saith, 'a whole I planned',
Youth shows but half; trust God, see all, nor be afraid."

Such a happy consummation is the deep desire and ardent hope of all men. It is possessed by those who in the confusions and distractions of a changing world, have reposed their security in Him who is the same, "yesterday, today, and forever".

ADDITIONAL COURSE TO SEWANEE CLERGY SCHOOL.

The management of the Sewanee Clergy School announces that another course has been added to the school's curriculum since the issuance of the printed program.

This course is: "Present-Day Meaning of Faith," by the Rev. Victor Lyle Dowdell, Ph. D.

Dr. Dowdell has recently returned from Puerto Rico, where he was dean of St. Michael's Seminary. This course will offer an evaluation of new theories of science according to sound principles of philosophy, in contrast to current compromise between religious truths and various theories of the empirical sciences. The course will include a critical appreciation of modern ideas; and will treat of the value of the traditional ideas of faith, the place of reason, and the psychology of mysticism.

The Sewanee Clergy School courses previously announced are: "Personal Religion, Prayer and Meditation," by the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, of Atlanta (a Forward Movement course); "Present-Day Social Movements in Relation to the Church", by Prof. R. J. Colbert, Ph. D., of the University of Wisconsin, and "Some Pastoral Opportunities", by the Rev. E. P. Dandridge, D. D., of Nashville.

The Clergy School opens on the night of July 30 and closes at noon on August 9. It is a part of the Sewanee Summer Training School, which is in session during the month of August. The Bishop of Atlanta is Director of the Clergy School, and the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, of Birmingham, Alabama, is Associate Director.

THEIR FIRST CIRCUS.

The circus came to the village of Kangra in northern India and settled down not far from the English mission hospital. It was the first circus ever seen there, and drew throngs from villages near and far. Many arrived early and spent the day watching the animals. The circus people had the bright idea of charging a fee to see the animals, and they made a further profit when they learned that the simple villagers believed their sick children would improve in health if they were passed under the elephant, who was to them a god. The circus charged eight cents a child for this office.

Crowds of people who had never seen the hospital visited it, and the staff was kept awake far into the night by the circus band playing Tipperary and the Stein song.

This little hospital has done pioneer work in that region in the treatment and prevention of a bone disease and hook worm disease. Three Cesarean babies have been born in the hospital, and are regarded with wonder by the whole countryside. One of them was named Missionary by its grateful parents, in honor of the Mission.

Y. M. C. A. GRADUATE SCHOOL TRAINING COURSE AT BLUE RIDGE, N. C.

Perhaps one of the most comprehensive attempts ever seen in the Southern States to bring religious thinking up to a position on a par with modern scientific and industrial knowledge, will be made at Blue Ridge, North Carolina, from July 25 to September 1, when the Y. M. C. A. Graduate School will bring a corps of the most eminent religious thinkers in America to that beautiful mountain resort to lead the five weeks' training course directed toward that end.

The idea of affording Southern religious leaders an opportunity to assemble and consider the great issues involved in this problem under the leadership of these outstanding teachers and thinkers had its inception during the past summer, when a group composed of professors, deans of men and executives expressed the desire for such an institution to be held. In accepting the challenge of these forward-thinking Southern educators, the Y. M. C. A. Graduate School is seeking to lessen the ever-widening gap between economic and religious thinking and planning amid the complexities of modern life.

A number of recent significant studies shows conclusively that social and religious thought lags far behind the scientific and industrial advance. Further, the report, "Social Trends", by the recent Hoover Commission so conclusively showed that religious life in our American colleges is at a crisis, that one of the South's most eminent educators was led to remark: "Surely there was never a time when religious workers need more to get together, take counsel and think together about the great issues involved."

Included in the faculty of the Graduate School during the five weeks' term, beginning July 25, are Dr. Gaius Glen Atkins, of Auburn, N. Y., one of the foremost interpretors of Social Thought in relation to religious life; Dean Francis F. Bradshaw, of the University of North Carolina, perhaps the best authority in the South on Life Guidance; Dr. Ralph Harlow, of Smith College, Northampton, Mass., a professor who interprets religion constructively in one of the most difficult centers of New England; Mr. Henry Wilson, of the University of Illinois, perhaps the most successful director of a religious program on a great college campus in America, and Dr. W. D. Weatherford, president of the Y. M. C. A. Graduate School, author and teacher, who will interpret present racial trends and their bearing on religious thinking.

The session will be held at the summer headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. Graduate School at Blue Ridge, N. C., where fifty-six buildings, representing an investment of almost one million dollars, are located in the most beautiful section of the Blue Ridge Mountains. Long famous for its sheer natural beauty, combined with its inspirational and thought-provoking atmosphere, this beautiful and popular mountain resort will provide a perfect setting for the consideration of these religious and social problems which are so vital to our colleges and churches in their future effect upon American life.

Advance registrations have already assured a large attendance during these five weeks of thought and discussion at Blue Ridge, though the registrar of the Graduate School is daily receiving additions to this number.

Publicity Director.

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT AND THE PARISH.

How may the Forward Movement function in a parish? This is the way Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., set about it. A meeting of the Parish Council was called to discuss the whole matter of guild and parish plans for the coming autumn and winter. It was resolved that a unified parish program be drawn up, which would mean a forward movement of Grace Church in 1935-1936. As a preparation some very definite questions were put to the various guilds in the form of a questionnaire to be returned on or before a fixed date. Some of the questions were: How many new members shall our guild set as its objective for the next year? How many for confirmation? What shall our educational program be? How can we further steady church attendance in the guilds?

At a special parish meeting, called by the vestry for September, the objectives of the parish as a whole will be formally discussed and officially adopted. This will constitute a fall rally—the beginning, it is hoped, of a common task undertaken with joy and enthusiasm. Incidentally, the vestrymen have decided that the Forward Movement for them will mean among other things, the calling upon the parishioners by the vestrymen as a fixed policy in the parish, and that the endeavor next season will be to make four hundred visits.

Interviews With Each Communicant.

The rector of St. Luke's Church, Chickasha, Oklahoma, introduced the distribution of the first Forward Movement pamphlet, "Discipleship", by sending a letter to one hundred and forty communcants asking for half hour appointment with each one in the church. This meant four weeks devoted to this personal pastoral service. Some days the rector was in the church for as much as twelve hours. The procedure was as follows:

"Provided with copies of Discipleship, copies of the National Commission on Evangelism leaflets, "Self-Examination and Rededication" and "Personal Evangelism", and many books for devotional reading from his library, the rector sat in the front pew. As each person came in he or she was asked to kneel in the pew directly behind the rector. After a prayer he handed the Forward Movement leaflet to the person, and explained the origin, purpose and aims of the Forward Movement Commission. Ten minutes were then given in explaining the use of the manual. The next step in each conference was a consideration of personal religion, giving the person ample opportunity to express himself as to his own needs, and asking him in what ways the Church might be more helpful to him in his daily life. Many took copies of the other leaflets available, and many others took a book to read. After this personal conference all that was necessary in the distribution of the second and third pamphlets of the Forward Movement was to announce that they were available.

Writing of this experiment in the pastoral method, the rector, the Rev. D. R. Edwards, says: "The results achieved were far in excess of the cost in terms of time, effort and planning which it took to execute the idea that had come to me as I puzzled and thought and prayed of how best to put into the hands of individual members of my flock the Discipleship Manual and to insure their use of the future publications of the Forward Movement Commission.

The Forward Movement Takes Hold in Alabama.

Bishop McDowell writes: "It looks like I am to have a very busy summer because the Forward Movement has really taken hold in Alabama. This spring there has been a large call for parochial missions; there have been many interesting results, one of them being that a church, long vacant, has raised the money to call a minister.

"An indirect result of the Forward Movement is that most of the congregations have changed their defeatist attitude, and accordingly are planning new work or are restoring old work, dropped because of the depression. Their movement is distinctly forward. I shall soon have four more clergy in Alabama, and a number of projects under development."

Stimulates the Sale of Bibles.

"One of my clergy," continues Bishop McDowell, "who has been faithfully distributing the Forward Movement pamphlets, realized that some of his people did not have Bibles to use with the second pamphlet. He, therefore, got samples from the American Bible Society and put them on display at his church door. To his vast astonishment he got sixty-three orders for Bibles and New Testaments. I believe the Forward Movement will find a smilar condition in many places and could stimulate the personal possession of Bibles and Prayer Books by our people."

Cincinnati, Ohio.—An American clergyman was visiting a Soviet museum in Moscow. As he left the museum the curator accompanied him to the door, continuing the conversation they had had on developments which were attributed to fine leadership. As they were about to part, the curator said to him, "To my mind the three greatest men mankind has produced have been Lenin, Tolstoy and Jesus Christ. But," he added, "nobody practices Jesus Christ." This is a serious endictment. How far is it true? How many nominal Christians in your parish?

The Forward Movement hopes first of all that we may reach the indifferent two-thirds of our Church membership and bring them into a living Discipleship. How do you plan to reach these people in your parish?

BISHOP OF LONDON'S JUBILEE.

£18,231 Received in Gifts.

The Bishop of London is this year celebrating the jubilee of his ordination. In commemoration of the event he sat in St. Paul's Cathedral last Tuesday to receive gifts for the work of the Church in the new districts of his diocese. Dr. Winnington-Ingram sat at a table at the foot of the chancel steps for seven hours. At various periods during the day he was relieved by one of his suffragans.

There was a steady stream of visitors from all parts of London throughout the day. These included the Acting Lord Mayor (Alderman Sir George Truscott), the Sheriffs, the Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex, Masters of City Companies, poor folk from East London. In fact, people came from all parts of London and others sent messages of good-will and gifts. Among the telegrams the Bishop received was one from eight lepers whom he had baptized when on a visit to Japan.

A service of thanksgiving was held on Tuesday night at nine o'clock, when it was announced that altogether £18,231 had been received, of which nearly £9,000 had been handed to the Bishop during the day.—Church of England Newspaper.

WHERE MAGNA CARTA WAS SIGNED.

So Runnymede Island is safe. It has been bought by Mr. P. J. H. Hannon, M. P., who intends to reside in the beautiful house on the island. In the house is the Charter Room, with a stone-topped table in the centre bearing the inscription that "On this spot Magna Carta was sealed, June 15, 1215."

The Charter Room was built by members of the Harcourt family, one of whose ancestors was present on that fateful day. The house also contains some beautiful panelling and other treasures, which will be carefully preserved.

It is not always realized that Magna Carta can be seen (between 2 and 4 P. M.) in the museum of the Record Office in Chancery-lane. King John did not, of course, actually sign it—not knowing how to write—but merely made his mark".—Church of England Newspaper.

CHURCH ARMY CAPTAIN MAKES PROGRESS.

Hot weather does not seem to count where Captain R. Lewis is concerned, for he gathered 1,201 persons around him for one purpose or another during the month of June.

Old St. Luke's Church in Cincinnati had become an empty shell when Bishop Hobson appointed the young Church Army Evangelist to take charge and the Bishop re-named the Church St. Barnabas.

During February, 1934, the total attendance was twenty-eight. Exactly a year later, 975 people visited the church during the corresponding four weeks.

In a very needy section of the city, Captain Lewis is the big brother and friend of all and sundry.

An interesting feature in the report for June is that those attending the Church for worship and religious instruction outnumber those present for recreation outnumber those present for to one. To have 786 adults and children attend services in June in a downtown church is surely an evidence of how acceptable Church Army missionaries are to the city poor.

In the Churches.

The Rt. Rev. Warren L. Rogers, D. D., Bishop of Ohio, will be the special summer preacher at St. Barthelomew's Church during July and the first two weeks in August.

The Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, D. D., Canon of St. John's Cathedral, Providence, will be the special preacher until August at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. On Sunday, July 7, at the morning service he began a series of morning sermons on "The Liturgy and Life", and at the vesper service he began a series of vesper sermons on "That Science Has Abolished God".

The 11:00 o'clock service on Sunday mornings has been discontinued for July and August at the Church of the Ascension. Instead of the 11:00 o'clock service, the rector, the Rev. Donald Aldrich, D. D., will hold special evening services. The general theme will be "Better Life for Everybody".

The Rev. Clifton Macon, D. D., formerly on the staff of St. Bartholomew's Church, will be the special preacher for July and August at the Church of the Incarnation. E. F. K.

Grace Church School Announces Openings for Additional Students.

The Grace Church School, founded in 1894, which up until last year was conducted as a boarding school for the boys of the church choir, is now a boys' day school, attendance at which is open to those outside of the choir, it has been announced. The fall term begins September 16. The school is located in the parish buildings of Grace Church, at Broadway and Tenth Street, and is carried on under the management and supervision of the parish.

The curriculum includes the subjects taught in the best preparatory schools in the grades from the fifth to the ninth, inclusive. The school assumes care of the pupils from 9 A. M. to 4:30 P. M. daily. The boys who sing in the choir receive special musical training and all instructions on a non-tuition basis. Harry N. Russell, formerly head of the Rowe School in Indiana, is headmaster, and Ernest Mitchell, organist and choirmaster of Grace Church, is in charge of musical instruction.

Since the school is under the direct supervision of the church and its rector, Dr. W. Russell Bowie, one of its fundamental principles is the development of fine character through the ideals of a genuine Christian manhood. Religious instruction is given at stated periods during the week.

In the lower grades, work in preparation of lessons is done during a supervised study period. All classes are limited to ten students so that individual attention can be given. Applications for admission should be made to the headmaster, 802 Broadway, New York.

Dr. Newton to Preach in Grace Church.

Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, pastor of St. James' Church of Philadelphia, one of the largest churches in that city, and former pastor of the City Temple in London and the Church of the Divine Paternity in New York, is to preach in Grace Church on July 21 and 28 and August 4 and 11.

Dr. Newton, who has been pastor of the St. James' Church since 1930, recently announced his resignation to take effect on November 1. At the same time his church agreed to join forces with the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany in Philadelphia and operate under an "Agreement of Association", to meet the needs as a "City Church" open at all times. These are two of the most prominent parishes in the diocese of that city, and include in their membership many of Philadelphia's old and important families.

Dr. Newton has not announced his plans following his resignation. He was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1893, and has been minister in the Baptist, Liberal Christian, Unitarian and Protestant Episcopal denominations. He was founder of the People's Church in Dixon, Illinois. He served as pastor of the City Temple, London, in the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York, and in the Memorial Church of St. Paul, Overbrook, Philadelphia.

He is associate editor of the Christian Century and an author of many books, the most recent being "Altar Stairs".

Rt. Rev. Henry J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

Sewanee Clergy School.

The Director of the Sewanee Clergy School, the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., LL. D., issues the following communication:

"We are again inviting the clergy to be with us at the Sewanee Clergy School. This is the fourth year it has been held and each year with increasing numbers and success. I am sure that all who have attended in previous years will say that they have found the course interesting and stimulating and the fellowship congenial and happy, and that they have returned to their work with renewed determination and enthusiasm. We hope that many of our old friends will return this year and that many who have not come before will give us the added pleasure of their presence."

Three courses of study are offered: "Personal Religion, Prayer and Meditation," by the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, Dean of St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta; "Some Pastoral Opportunities," by the Rev. Edmund P. Dandridge, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Nashville; "Present Day Social Movements in Relation to the Church," by Prof. R. J. Colbert, Ph. D., of the University of Wisconsin.

The school will begin July 30 and extend to August 9.

House Party.

The Builder's Bible class of the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, was guest of Miss Barbara Anne Cohen at a week-end house party, at the Cohen summer cottage at Mountain Park, thirty-five miles north of Atlanta, June 29 and 30. Forty young people enjoyed the outing. Early Sunday morning the teacher, Mr. T. Ernest Williams, Jr., and Mrs. Williams, motored up to Mountain Park in time for breakfast and to teach the lesson. The class returned to the city Sunday afternoon in time to attend the Service League meeting at 6:30.

League to Redecorate Church.

The Young People's Service League of the Church of the Incarnation has assumed the cost of redecorating the interior of the church, the work to be done during the absence of the rector, Dr. G. W. Gasque, while on vacation in August.

A new heating plant is to be installed during the summer, and expensive repairs on the parish house are to be made.

Change of Diocese.

Bishop H. J. Mikell has given a letter dismissary to Bishop Benjamin T. Kemerer of Duluth for Mr. Henry Keissel, a lay reader.

Mr. Keissel will be ordered to the deaconate in the fall and then be in charge of the Church of Our Saviour at Little Falls, Minn.

Mr. Keissel, a member of the Church of the Ascension, Cartersville, has taught at the DeVeaux School, Niagara Falls, and just recently at the Martha Berry School, Rome, Ga.

Sister Sophi Retires After Thirty-One Years of Duty.

Thirty-one years ago, a quiet, sweet-faced woman came to teach at Appleton Church Home in Macon, Georgia. She was a probationer in the order of Saint Catherine, and within two years she was to become a deaconess. Even at that early time, the girls of the Episcopal Orphanage discovered that the gentle Sister Sophi was a friend.

A few weeks ago, Sister Sophi resigned from the work as head of the Appleton Church Home. Children of the children whom Sister Sophi had loved and taught were ready to weep at the thought of her going. The woman who had left her mark on so many groups of girls asked to be relieved of her duties.

The Right Rev. H. J. Mikell, Bishop of the diocese and president of the board o ftrustees at the Home, wrote of her going:

"The long and faithful service rendered to the Appleton Church Home by Sister Sophi makes some public comment appropriate and fitting.

"For years Sister Sophi has served the Home in many capacities, has been a friend and valued mentor of successive groups of girls, and has left her mark upon their lives for good.

"Sister Sophi has now asked to be relieved of her duties and retired, and the board of trustees of the Home, at its last meeting, with many expressions of appreciation of her long service, accepted her resignation and granted her a pension.

Influence Felt Keenly.

"But no words of Bishop or board of trustees can express the love borne to Sister Sophi by her girls. No words can tell of the fine influence she has had upon the lives of the hundreds who have come under her influence."

When Sister Sophi became head of the Home in 1920, she began at once to carry out the plans she had for making the place beautiful. It was not enough that girls should be fed, clothed, taught. They must have "white lilacs for their souls".

Always Thrifty, Capable.

Always thrifty and capable, Sister Sophi worked hard at raising chickens. She provided ample eggs and chickens for table use, and the surplus she sold. Thus she acquired money to provide for the girls little extras, which meant so much in the lives of young women. The cultural values meant much to Sister Sophi. With the extra money she bought books for the library, shrubbery for the grounds, musical instruments for the Home. With such donations as friends made she purchased violins and viola for the use of girls who showed talent in that direction.

She was a muiscian and a teacher of music and played the viola and violin in addition to possessing a lovely contralto voice. It was in 1920 that she formed an orchestra in the Home and made it an important part of the lives of those who resided there.

"There were always flowers upon the dining room tables," said one of the women who had been brought up under Sister Sophi's tutelage. "She wanted things to be pretty for us. She wanted us to live in an atmosphere of culture and refinement. I have heard her laugh and say that some girls might never be really cultured, but at least she would provide for them as much of a veneer as possible."

No Flurry, Excitement.

There is no such word as flurry or excitement in the life of this remarkable women. She is always calm. She is unruffled by any experience.

"Why, if a girl came to her with a foot cut off, I don't believe she would have been excited," reported one of her girls. "She would have done just the right thing while she waited for the doctor to arrive."

When the Home burned in 1921, her unflurried attitude carried on. She saw that the girls were quietly retired from the building. She saved with her own hands the cross from the chapel and the musical instruments, which were so treasured.

Other Activities Stand Out.

Besides her work with chickens, gardens, flowers and fruit trees, the supervisor of the Home did exquisite needlework. She not only made all the underwear for the girls for many years, but during the time they wore uniforms, she made their capes and the caps they wore. For their chapel exercises, morning and evening, she made dainty white caps and aprons, which the girls adored.

Proof of the love borne her by the girls lies in the fact that almost every one of them called upon her when they needed a godmother. Of the babies of those girls who married and made homes for themselves, she always spoke as "my grandchildren". For she served so many times as godmother that she had to call a halt. "Let me just be grandmother to all of the children," she told them.

The spiritual welfare of each girl was close to her heart, and she never missed an opportunity to help them to realize the need of God.

Now that she has retired, Sister Sophi has gone to live in Atlanta with her sister. But she has not given up all work. She is assistant with the junior choir at St. Luke's, and she is a member of the choir of All Saints. She also is in charge of a sewing project for the children at the Scottish Rite Hospital.

Memorials That Add to Beauty and Usefulness to Their Church.

The Rev. Gustave H. Caution, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Savannah, celebrated the fourth anniversary of his rectorship on June 30, at the mid-day choral Eucharist and at Evensong in the late afternoon. The guest preacher at both services was the Rev. C. H. Richmond, pastor of Butler Memorial Presbyterian Church, a close friend of the Rev. Mr. Caution. Special music was sung by the mixed choir under the direction of Alice M. Ellis. The fourth anniversary of the rector was marked by the completion of the interior and exterior painting and decoration of the church, done mostly by the men of the parish; a new modernistic lighting system, divided into three sections of three lights each, was given as a memorial to the following: Central lights, in memory of Albert Jackson I, a former vestryman and treasurer of the parish, by his children, Georgia, Albert, Sidney and Mrs. Mary Habersham. The right section in memory of Mrs. Charlotte Ashton by her (3) children, Rosa and Earl Ashton and Mrs. Chippey. The left section, in memory of "Jim" (James) Davis, by his widow, Mrs. Rosa Davis. Conference of Religious Education.

The second Summer Conference of Religious Education was held from June 24-29, this year at Chatham Hall.

This proved to be an ideal setting for such a conference, anda fine student body showed its appreciation by earnest work in classes and enthusiastic cooperation in the entire program. Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., was dean of the faculty, and his veteran experience was equal to every emergency. Rev. P. H. Sloan was chaplain in charge of all services, which were an Early Communion service to begin the day aright, and an inspiring vesper service after supper.

Rev. J. Keith M. Lee and Mrs. Lee were counsellors for young people, which meant nearly two-thirds of the student body.

Besides being "made for the job", as some one said, they also added much interest to the programs of the week, by presenting, with the assistance of the young people, a missionary pageant, a nonsense play, and a religious drama, on three nights.

Other members of the faculty were Rev. T. S. Will of St. John's Church, Hampton, who taught History of the English Church; Rev. Taylor Willis of St. Luke's and Christ's Church, Norfolk, teaching "The Pupil"; Dr. E. R. Carter, D. D., had a large class studying "The Teachings of the Church". Miss Cornelia Harris of Richmond taught the class studying Program Building for Young People; Mrs. C. F. Ruan, Diocesan Educational Secretary, led a class in Christian Stewardship, and Mrs. C. E. Stewart had an interested class in "Hand Work in the Sunday School".

One hundred and twenty-five credits were given to eighty-five members of the conference, while many more attended the classes without taking them "for credit".

But all are enthusiastically hoping to attend another Conference next year at Chatham Hall.

Anniversary Services.

Congregations of two Episcopal churches held special services July 7, commemorating anniversaries of the foundation of their respective parishes. St. Mark's Church, Honeybrook Chester County, commemorated the one hundredth anniversary of its beginning, and the Church of Redeemer, Andalusia, marked the seventy-fifth anniversary of its organization. Bishop Taitt was the preacher at the anniversary service in St. Mark's in the afternoon. The Rev. W. W. Williams, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, preached the anniversary sermon in that church in the morning, and Bishop Taitt made a special address at a reunion dinner in the Andalusia parish on Wednesday evening. In connection with the anniversary at St. Mark's the rector, the Rev. George S. McKinley, also presented a class to the Bishop for confirmation.

Rt. Rev. Elmer N. Schmuck, D. D., Bishop

"Spiritual Recovery in the Gospel of Jesus Christ Lived Out Among Men First," Declared Bishop Schmuck at Convocation.

The twenty-sixth annual Convocation of the district was held in St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie, June 9-10. The Rt. Rev. Robert N. Spencer, D. D., Bishop of West Missouri, was the preacher at the opening service. Bishop Spencer preached a stirring sermon on the witness of the Holy Spirit in human life to bring in God's kingdom among men. In the evening Bishop Schmuck delivered his annual address to the Convocation, in which he stressed the fact that social security, so much hoped for in the country and the world, could only be accomplished and realized first through spiritual recovery in the Gospel of Jesus Christ lived out among men. He emphasized the great opportunity that lay before the Christian Church today to inculcate the great spiritual values of life as revealed in the Gospel to make this a better world. He said that "experimental ideas in politics and the industrial order were not sufficient, but would only prove as effective as antiseptic pledgets of cotton in the attempt to cure smallpox". He urged a greater cooperation with the Forward Movement inaugurated by the General Convention in creating loyalty and renewed life among our Church people. The Bishop's report showed continued strengthening and growth of the Church's work in Wyoming and reported full activity in every field and the continuance of all diocesan institutions during the past year.

The Council of Advice was continued as in the past except with the addition of Dean Montizambert, of the Cathedral, who was appointed a member.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod are the Rev. Messrs. Pawls, Dr. Tyler, Lewis, Abraham and Chowenhill.

Bishop Spencer and Mrs. D. D. Taber, of the Woman's Auxiliary, addressed the Wyoming Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, and also spoke at the Convention dinner held Monday night. Miss Ruth Osgood, of the National Council, was another speaker at the Woman's Auxiliary. Bishop Spencer made a profound impression on the Convocation, showed institutions to be in very good shape, and Dr. Tyler's report concerning the Indian work showed that the Church was meeting the changing situation in the Indian field in a most adequate, effective way. Much of the business of the Convocation was routine.

THE OPEN DOOR.

(Revelation, 3-8.)

Elizabeth Palmer Tyler.

I thank Thee, Father, for the open door
Which Thou hast set before me. Where I stood
Was all dark night, and prison walls, and floor
Of hard, cold stone to make my bed; nor could
A single ray of light pierce that damp gloom—
Ne'er would I see again the roses all in bloom.

But where I crouched, bowed down by black despair
And sinful pity for myself, I heard
The voice of One, man's glorious Hope and fair,
Within me, say as plain as spoken word,
"Look up! Go out upon the sunlit way
With cheer and hope for others, so thou may Find no one e'er can shut thee in once more."
I give The thanks, Lord, for the open door.

Welcome the Real Hero Home!

I went down to the great Tokyo Union Station to meet him. The large concourse was thronged with people, many of them carrying the familiar military banner, of all sizes and shapes. Pressing my way with difficulty through the milling crowds, I finally reached the platform ticket window and bought a ten-cent ticket which you must have in order to pass through the gate and on to the platform for the arrival of trains.

The whole station which is always noisy was most uproarious today. The clack-clacking of hundreds of pairs of geta, or wooden shoes, and the blare of loud speakers overhead that announce with nasal squawkings the pulling in of each electric train, city, interurban, or long distance—it was deafening!— It seemed that the whole population of Japan was traveling, and the rest of the people were either seeing the others off or welcoming them home! Now a loud speaker was advising the passengers in a fatherly way not to forget personal baggage in transferring. But this was "special" today.

Evidently a military hero was coming home to the capital. Perhaps tomorrow he was to appear before His Highness, the Emperor, "Ten no Heika," the Lord of Heaven; and receive a decoration for some great deed done for his country. Certainly today, the station was decorated with flags and banners. Many soldiers and other uniofrm men were in evidence. But not alone men and women. Large groups of boys and girls were joining in this tribute to an idol of their hero-worshipping hearts. Alas, that they have no place for the Prince of Peace; because He has not been presented to them!

But with all due respect to the general, I had not come down to meet him. I was expecting a third class passenger, not a first class passenger! What I mean is, of course, I was down to welcome a little man who always travels third class! The man I had come to meet was one who has written eighty books which have sold into the tens of thousands of copies and have been translated into a dozen languages. The most popular speaker in Japan, though his subject, "Christ and the Kingdom of God," is not popular with the masses. I had come to meet a man whose name and writings are revered and read, whose sacrificial life of love is an inspiration to the entire Christian world. Of course, you know the name of this man who stands with the two or three greatest Christian personalities living today, Kagawa!

Just as when Jesus returned to His home town after a preaching tour, there was no band, no banners, no welcome much for Kagawa. Only a few of us who had some favor to ask of him, some speaking engagement, some interview we wanted, some request that he would honor us with his presence, that's all.

And yet, thought I, after all the cheering for the big general had died down, and the third class passengers were allowed to get off the train and proceed along the platform, we who had come to meet the tired little man with the radiant face, in spite of the eyes that are nearly blind with trachoma, we had come to welcome the real hero home!

The general had distinguished himself in the cause of war with China; Kagawa our Christian leader in Japan in the cause of peace had gone to Shanghai and stood in a church where the Chinese pastor had been killed by a Japanese bomb, and with tears in his eyes, had asked forgiveness for his country, and taken the guilt upon his own heart with such sincerity and loving earnestness that the Chinese Christians had taken an offering and given it to Kagawa for his great work of redeeming and revealing to Japan the Prince of Peace who makes of Japanese and Chinese brothers in Christ, yes, of Americans and Japanese, too!

"You must be tired, Kagawa Sensei," I said, as I took his arm and walked along the platform with the man who reminds me so of Jesus.

"Oh, no, I have too much to do to be tired. We had such a good hearing for Gospel, I am going back in three days." As we walked, one after another came up to the great teacher to make sure of some speaking engagement Kagawa had promised him at his church, his school, or society. To each the weary man nodded an eager, "Yes, I'll be there!"

It seemed almost cruel as I realized how busy he was, to ask for another interview when he had granted several to me already in recent months, one for Dr. M. E. Dodd. But I knew Dr. Maddry and Dr. Weatherspoon wanted one, so I asked him.

"I shall be so happy to see them. Yes, bring them to my house. Yes, all Saturday morning you may have. I will just get up earlier and finish other work."

Welcoming the real hero home? Yes, welcoming Kagawa back to Tokyo, to more!—H. S. Ray.

BROKEN CISTERNS.

Grace French Smith.

You've deserted the living fountain of spraying silver,
As Jeremiah and later Jesus said,
You have carved out broken cisterns that hold not water,
Your inner fountain of love and peace is dead.

The selfish worldly pleasures are the broken cisterns—
And millions bale the dregs and gulp them down,
But peace and love will spring from inner fountains,
For hearts that are touched by God, they remain the crown.

The Place for Worship.

Jesus emphasized that God was a spirit and could be worshipped everywhere. Neither Jerusalem nor Samaria could claim a monopoly on God. Nor can any denomination nor any church claim unique privileges of worship. Amid the inspiring beauty of nature, in humble opportunities of helpfulness and in reverential meditation at home, the earnest soul can receive from God the true blessing of worship. Some of the most soul stirring experiences of worship have come in unanticipated moments and places.

But the average individual worships most effectively when on a day set apart for worship, he puts forth special effort to enter a sanctuary consecrated to God and filled with hallowed memories and religious symbolism. The church was built with the purpose of helping the worshipper concentrate on the spiritual. In the architecture and ritual, however simple it may be, the Christian spirit of the age finds helpful expression. The worshipper responds to the law of unconscious influence and returns to his home with a glow of spiritual uplift.—Dr. Wm. McKinney.

Time to Attend Church.

His is a very active business. His business keeps him in the city month in, and month out. It keeps him in the office for many hours of every day of the week. He has built up a very long list of friends who consult him about almost everything in ordinary life. His judgment is sought in every field of church, business, and politics in his community. He keeps in active touch with what is going on in the political and religious, as well as the business world. He needs a great deal of time for his reading, and for his correspondence. He should have more time to rest. But one thing I have noticed about him: He has time to attend church.

He gives a great deal of time to church boards and committees both conference and convention wide. He gives unending services to churches that are in financial distress, or without pastors; and he serves as chairman of the most important worship committee of his own local church. It would seem that he could sometimes excuse himself from attendance upon at least the prayer meeting of his church, but he does not; for he has time to attend church, even every mid-week service!

For many years he has been one of the political leaders of his state, and one of its best and most honored servants. Some of the wisest legislation of his day in his state began in his own thinking. Long has he been in demand as a speaker and orator of the most stirring and vital type. It would seem that he might excuse himself from some work in his local church, but he does not, and it is hoped that it will be many years before he does; for he has time to be teacher of one of the finest classes of women in the State.

It is a delight to know him and honor him. He has a very wide circle of friends who love and honor him, but those who know him best and live closest to him love him most. This word is not written to add any luster to his already unforgettable name, either in Church or State; but it is written to urge the laymen of the church to take time to attend church. It is written to suggest to them that after all they are not too busy to attend church. For here is one of the busiest laymen I know, and yet twice every Sunday, and every Wednesday night he has time to attend church!—Christian Sun.

PRAYER.

I kneel not now to pray that Thou
Make white one single sin—
I only kneel to thank the Lord
For what I have not been;

For deeds which sprouted in my heart
But ne'er to bloom were brought,
For monstrous vices which I slew
In the shambles of my thought—

Dark deeds the world has never guessed
By hell and passion bred,
Which never grew beyond the bud
That cankered in my head.

Some said I was a righteous man—
Poor fools! the gallows tree
(If Thou hadst let one foot to slip)
Had held a limb for me.

So for the man I might have been
My heart must cease to mourn,
'Twere best to praise the living God
For monsters never born;

To bend the spiritual knee
(Knowing myself within)
And thank the kind, benignant God
For what I have not been!

Charged With Power.

Theodore Cuyler delighted to tell how, in his student days at Princeton, Professor Henry had so constructed a large bar of iron, bent into the form of a horseshoe, that it used to hang suspended from another iron bar above it. Not only did it hang there, but it upheld a 4,000 pound weight attached to it. The great horseshoe was not welded or screwed to the metal above it, but through the iron wire coiled round it there ran a subtle current of electricity from a galvanic battery, which converted it into a magnet. Stop the flow of the current for an instant and the huge horseshoe dropped. So does the lifting power of the Christian's life come from the currents of spiritual influence which flow into his heart from the living Christ. The strength of the Almighty One enters into the believer. This was Paul's secret.—Rev. G. Howard Jones, in the London Sunday School Times.

Trials.

Trial is the food of faith. Let us leave ourselves in the hands of our Heavenly Father. It is the joy of His heart to do good to all His children. But trials and difficulties are not the only means by which faith is exercised, and thereby increased. There is the reading of the Scriptures, that we have them may acquaint ourselves with God, as He revealed Himself in His Word. And what shall we find? That He not only is God Almighty, and a righteous God; but we shall find how gracious He is, how gentle, how kind, how bountiful He is; in a word, what a lovely Being God is.—George Muller.

MY FATHER'S WORLD—AND MINE.

My Father's world— and yet
For me He leaves some stirring mighty tasks;
And bids me share with Him
In building love and truth and joy
To make His dream come true.

My Father's world—and yet
On me waits part of all the beauty, love,
And tenderness the world
Might use in building other powers
To make His dream come true.

My Father's world—and yet
Not His until each willing child of His,
For Him and for His dream,
Gives love and toil and sacrifice
To make His dream come true.

THOSE RECTORY CHILDREN.

Chapter XXVI.

The Call.

M. L. G.

It was the time of service one bright December morning, a few weeks after Claire had started on her visit to Aunt Mollie on Far Ridge. David, Winnie and Kent were seated in the Rector's pew, while Philip sat with Mother in the choir. Philip innocently supposed that this was a tribute to his singing, but Mother had known that Philip might easily prove too much for Winnie's power to quiet him. Kent was full of eagerness in finding the hymns, and now and then he would nudge Winnie.

"Looky dere, Winnie, I see 'me', an' I see 'in'. What does 'w, o, e', mean, Winnie?"

"It spells woe, Kent; but don't whisper in church."

"I know, like Father says, 'Whoa, Frank!' an' Frank whoas."

"Sh-h!' Not quite that, but I'll 'splain later."

"I'll sh-h, Winnie, but who's those mens I didn't ever seed in our church, an' looks at Fadder so hard?"

Winnie had wondered somewhat herself at the four gentlemen sitting together, dressed in a more formal style than were the other men of the country community, and with another manner and air.

"I don't know, Kentie. Anybody can come to church."

"But why does dat one put a horn in his ear? He mustn't blow horns in churches, an' not wif his ear, anyway."

"Sh, Kent, Mother's looking at us. I think it makes him hear better, but be quiet."

Kent was quiet until he caught sight of Philip, who, sitting in perfect silence by Mother's side, had folded his Sunday-school leaflet into the shape of a cone, and put the small end into his ear, holding his head forward and with a little frown in exact imitation of the old gentleman whom Kent had noticed, Philipe was perfectly grave, but a good many of the congregation were not.

"Look, Winnie," whispered Kent, "Phil is twyin' to hear better, too."

"Oh, my! And Mother doesn't see him a bit!"

"Let us pray," said Father, and down went Winnie on her knees, trying with shakes of her head and frowns to catch Philip's attention. But Philip knew better than to look her way. It was Mother, who, a little uneasy as to Kent, looked down at the children and then back to Philip, who had to hear, from then on, as best he could, without his ear-trumpet.

After service the men of the congregation welcomed the strangers with the hospitality that judges every man to be a gentleman and so an honored guest. They gave their names; they were from the city, and must return by the afternoon train. They would not accept any of the invitations to dinner kindly pressed upon them, but must hurry to the village inn where they had ordered a hasty dinner and a "hack" to get them to the station.

Miss Parmenter looked sharply after them as they took their dignified way toward the church-yard gate.

"I myself believe they came with no good purpose," she announced. "Why aren't they at their own churches and listening to their own ministers?"

"But, dear Henny," objected Mrs. Innis, "it is surely an allowable thing to attend divine service wherever one may be."

"My name is Henrietta, Cynthia, I thank you!" snapped Miss Parmenter, "and as for attending divine service, stuff and nonsense! They had a reason for coming to this village on a Sunday morning, and we'll be put to it to circumvent them, with their swallow-tail coats, and their ear-trumpets!" Miss Parmenter stalked down the path, missing Mrs. Pace's cheerful greeting, and Mr. Gray's outstretched hand.

A few days later Father took the mail from Uncle Danger, and brought it into the study where Mother sat with her sewing, now that there were no children at all in the house during school hours.

"Well, dear, a good fat letter from Mollie for you, and one, two, three bills —glad we can cut down a bit on fuel this winter, for there's Tom Brown to feed and I hope to get clear of the last medicine bill for Claire—bless her—well, sir! What's this?" Father came to his last letter, opened it with his pipe-stem and sat down absorbed to read it.

"O darling, Sister Mollie says Claire has actually run, with Noel, to the road to meet her when she came in from visiting, . . . and there were thirty-four at Sunday school! . . . oh! the sick baby is going to get well! And here's a note from Claire herself—her writing is certainly improving—"

"Take a look at this!" said Father, waving the single sheet of his letter in Mother's direction.

It seemed to Mother later as if peace departed with the reading of that sheet. It was a call from the Vestry of St. Barnabas' Church in the city to the Rector of Grace Church in the village to come to the great city, at a salary three times the size of his present one and to an "increasing sphere of usefulness and attainment," as the letter made clear.

"Those four men!" Mother fairly sputtered.

"I must think it out, dear. It is a fine field; and the children are getting bigger. This salary is a tight fit. But then!—the mission just beginning so well, and Mollie there—and I've thought I was getting hold of some of my big boys—I don't know. We'll think and pray it out."

The whole parish and neighborhood joined to help Father think and pray it out. Father went down to the city and was met on his return by an anxious station-master.

"I hope them city fellers ain't persuaded you away from us," said Mr. Acres, as Uncle Danger, with a "Sho' glad you'se home, Marster," took the valise from Father's hand.

"Hello, Uncle Danger! Glad to be back, too. No, Mr. Acres, I've not decided yet. It's all the Lord's work, you know, and if I go you'll get another man, and a better one, I don't doubt."

"No sirree, Reverend! My wife's Ma, she claims they ain't no preacher this side the Apostles and Martyrs theyselves can beat you on the prayin'. An' I enj'ys your preachin' myself, when Mrs. Acres thinks well of my goin'."

"And I your good bass, Mr. Acres," said Father heartily.

Miss Parmenter, calling with Mrs. Innis, found Mr. Gray and two more of the vestrymen closeted with Father in the study. Mother took them up to her room, since it was chilly in the parlor.

"I myself think it a piece of impertinence!" cried Miss Parmenter, seating herself on a hassock, which brought her knees nearly to the level of her face. "Isn't the Seminary turning out deacons as fast as they can and the Bishop at his wit's end to find work for 'em?"

"But these city churches wouldn't want a very young man, Miss Parmenter," Mother explained. "They told Mr. Duncan they thought his twelve years of experience here fitted him to take charge of a large city parish."

"Foolishness!" snorted Miss Parmenter. "Are we to be a nursery for them, with their airs and their graces?" She pulled out a large handkerchief from her pocket.

Philip, occupying the hassock across from Miss Parmenter, asked gravely:

"Has you got a bad cold, Miss Parmenter? 'Cause Muvver rubs us wif mutton suet—"

Miss Parmenter wiped away a tear quite openly.

"And these Rectory children—what should the city do for them, pray, that would take the place of our country air? No, child, I have no cold, I am only overcome with the absurdity of the whole proceeding."

"Yes, and fresh butter and eggs, dear Mrs. Duncan," added Mrs. Innis, her tears flowing gently and unheeded down her soft wrinkled cheeks.

"Dear friends," said Mother earnestly, "I can tell you very honestly that I don't want to leave here, and not one of the children does. Nor Mr. Duncan. He must only be sure of what is ought to do."

Mrs. Innis and Mrs. Parmenter, driving out, met the Trent ladies driving in. And as Mother welcomed her new guests, the three gentlemen came out of Father's study.

"I hope, Mr. Gray," said Miss Alice, with her most stately air, "I hope you gentlemen are leaving no stone unturned to persuade our good minister to remain with us."

"None, none, Miss Alice," boomed Mr. Gray. "We can't match the other fellows in salary or numbers. But I tell the parson here that we'll back his plans and schemes—missions and what not—better than we've done. The old Bishop came from this parish and we've some good blood still." His voice thickened as he wrung Father's hand.

The next Sunday, after Father had given out the notices, Auxiliary and Choir Practice, Vestry meeting and a gathering of the larger boys to go to the woods for greens for the cedar-picking, he told the congregation in simple and quiet words of his decision to decline the call to St. Barnabas and remain as their minister. There was a moment of silence, and an audible sigh throughout the congregation. Then Mr. Gray arose.

"I never interrupted a church service in my life," he said in his big voice, "but friends and neighbors, I consider this parish has passed through a crisis, and the words we've just heard from our parson—I mean, our Rector—are like music to us all. And so, if you will, let's all sing the Doxology!"

Mrs. Pace found the place in her book and attacked "Old Hundred" with energy. The little church rang with music, and Old Phineas from his place in the gallery added to the Amen his own eloquent, "Praise de Lawd!"

SHOOTING STARS.

Jack and some of his friends had gone out into the country for a hike. After a while they came to a hole in the ground with fresh dirt thrown out around it.

"It must be an animal of some kind," Jack suggested.

"Let's dig it out," said one of the others.

They dug it out all right; but what they found was far more interesting than any animal. They found a curious rock—small, but very heavy. Just twenty-four hours before, this same rock had been more than three millions miles away from that spot. That is so far away that if Jack's father had gone after it in his automobile and had been able to drive a thousand miles a day, it would have taken him twenty years to make the round trip.

But Jack's father could never have gone after it, for this strange stone came not from any place on earth at all, but from millions of miles out in space among the stars.

In fact, it was a piece of a star or a smaller heavenly body that had exploded a long time ago and still continued to travel through space. There are untold millions of these heavy rocks flying through space all the time. The earth travels through showers of them constantly; and it is estimated that thousands of them strike the earth's atmosphere every day. Only a few of them are seen, and still fewer are found. They travel so fast that most of them burn up when they strike the earth's atmosphere. Indeed, they travel as far in a second as you drive a car in an hour, or about thirty-six hundred times as fast as you go when you're out for a brisk drive with your father and mother.

The ones that burn up as they speed through the air are called meteors, while those that strike the earth are known as meteorites.

Some of these meteors appear to be small points of light traveling across the sky. They look like lightning bugs flying high, or like stars falling from the sky. But others streak halfway across the heavens like great sky-rockets, leaving brilliant trails of sparks behind them.

You are liable to see these meteors or shooting stars on any clear, moonless night during the year. I have seen them while on a sleighing party in January and while camping out under the stars in August. One night a group of us counted nearly five hundred of them in a single night. Another night not long ago a friend and I had climbed a hill to watch the sunset. The stars were out when we started back home. "It ought to be a good night for meteors," my friend said. Hardly were the words spoken when a brilliant meteor shot out of the east and blazed across the northeastern sky. It left a dazzling trail of sparks behind it, and a bright path of light that glowed for several seconds. It seemed almost to hiss through the air, though it was probably fifty miles high.

But while you may see meteors any night during the year your chances are much better in late summer or fall. The middle of November is probably the best time of all, for that is when the Leonid meteors appear. Some of them are seen each year, and about three times in a century thousands of them can be seen. A hundred years ago there were such great numbers of them that people who saw them said the stars fell as thickly as snowflakes all night. It was estimated that more than two hundred thousand of them were seen that night.

This November, astronomers will be watching again for another great shower. There is no way of being sure about it, but it is too thrilling an adventure to miss.

A shower of shooting stars is likely to occur this year, the night of November 13, 14, or 15. Many boys and girls will be looking for them all three nights; but if you can watch only one night, the fifteenth is the best.

Astronomers will be watching with expensive equipment, such as great telescopes and special cameras. But you need no equipment except a pair of eyes that can stay wide awake. A good plan would be to have your family go for a picnic the night of November 15 and stay out a while after dark. Still better, arrange to camp out that night.

Let me repeat that there is no way of being sure of a meteor shower; but if one occurs I guarantee you will have no trouble keeping awake. And even if you see only a few dozen shooting stars, it will be a night you will never forget.—Ray M. Johnson, in Advance.

THE WIND'S A BOY.

Magda Brandon.

I know the wind's a boy, for he
Is fond of climbing up a tree;
And like a boy, his great delight
To sail a boat and fly a kite.

He's boisterous; and that's the way
Most boys are, too, when out to play;
He'll thow my hat—and race to meet
Me; try to push me down the street.

His saucy tricks don't mean a thing;
The wind's a nice boy whistling;
He'll slap my face—but I don't care;
His hands don't hurt me anywhere!

DANDELION DAYS.

Back of the house where Robbie lived was a large field. Part of the time it was covered with green grass, part of the time it was yellow with dandelion blossoms. Robbie just loved the dandelions. He called the field his golden carpet. His father said he liked the dandelions very much but he did wish that when they changed their yellow flower hats for hats with white plumes, they would not get so careless and let the plumes blow off into his lawn. You see, the white plumes carried tiny seeds on them, and the seeds started new dandelion plants in his lawn, and he did not like them there. He used to take a knife and dig them out, roots and all.

"Well," Robbie's mother said, "I like the dandelions, too. They are the children's flower. There are always enough of them for everybody, and the children can always pick them without being scolded."

One day Robbie's father called him to look at something in one corner of the lawn, near the big lilac-bush.

It was a big dandelion plant, very tall and long-stemmed. It was so close to the lilac-bush that it had not been seen when the lawn was cut, and so it had had a fine chance to grow just in the edge of the grass.

"Isn't it a beauty, father?" said Robbie. "How tall its leaves and flowers are! But I suppose you will dig it up because it came over the fence."

"No," said Robbie's father, "I am not going to dig it up. I want you to watch it and notice something about it. See, I am going to cut it off just as the lawn-mower would have done. Now, we will come back in a few days and see it again."

So, in a few days they came again to look at the plant.

"It has grown," said Robbie in a delighted voice. "It has new leaves and buds. It is not nearly so tall, though, father."

"No," said his father. "It is not nearly so tall, but it is a good strong plant, and it is getting ready to bear blossoms and have seeds. I'll cut it off again, Robbie."

"It seems too bad when it is trying so hard to grow," said Robbie. "Do you suppose it will try again?"

"We'll see," said father. So they left it again, and this time Robbie could not wait so long. He ran every morning to look at it, and very soon he told his father that the plant had grown again. It was very short this time, but it had new leaves and a bright yellow flower. His father pushed the mower over it and cut it off close like the grass.

Robbie did not watch it so closely this time. His mother had been away a whole long day and when she came home she brought Robbie a fat puppy. Robbie forgot everything else for a few days, the puppy was so much fun. But next time he saw his father get the mower out, he ran very fast to the lilac-bush to look for the brave little dandelion. For a minute he could not see it. Then he discovered it. It was not tall any more. It was just about as high as the grass. Its leaves were not long, but they were thick, and when Robbie stooped down to look closely he found two tiny green buds with hardly any stems at all hidden close to the ground.

"Oh, look, father," he said. "It has been trying again."

"Yes," said his father. "It is a brave little plant trying to do its work, no matter what happens to it. That is why we have to dig up a dandelion, roots and all, to stop it."

"Are you going to dig this up now?" asked Robbie rather sadly. He liked the brave little plant very much.

"No," said his father, "I don't believe I want to do that to this little friend of ours. I'll leave it here if you will try to pick off all of its yellow flowers before they make seeds to scatter over the lawn."

"I'll do that," said Robbie. "I'll take the flowers to mother. She likes the dandelions."—Our Little Ones.

THE POSTMAN'S CONFIDENCE.

A postman was telling me what a sense of security he felt in his work of delivering the mail. "Why," said he, "all the resources of the Government are pledged to support me in carrying on my work. If I have only one small post card in my bag, no man dares to molest me in its delivery. All the federal police powers of the United States, including the army and navy, would be thrown into action if necessary to secure the safe delivery of that post card."

And that led me to think how confidently you and I may set forth with our life, our personality, our equipment, such as it is, to deliver the flaming truth of the Gospel. The word of our Lord is just as much for us today as it was for the disciples, when He said: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. . . . and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end."—The Sunday School Times.

DEATHS

MRS. FRANCES BROWSE McDONALD.

MRS. FRANCES BROWSE McDONALD died in Rochester June 13, 1935. She was born at Spring Run, W. Va., educated at the Virginia Female Institute and at Radcliffe College.

In 1910 she married the Rev. Peerce N. McDonald and they went to live at Anchorage, Ky., where her husband was rector of St. Luke's Church. Later they moved to Morgantown, W. Va., where her husband was rector of Trinity Church. She remained at Morgantown while her husband was a chaplain in the army. Afterwards they moved to Christ Church, Macon, Ga., for a short residence, moving in 1919 to Montgomery, Ala., where they have lived until her death, her husband being rector of the Church of the Ascension.

She was a woman of charming personality, interested and active in many things in the Church and in the community.

After her death her body was brought to Montgomery, where a service was conducted by the Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, Rev. Richard Wilkinson, and Rev. E. M. Parkman. The interment was in the cemetery surrounding Zion Church, Charles Town, W. Va., with the rector, Rev. J. W. Gummere, officiating, assisted by Rev. A. B. Mitchell and Rev. Paul Micou.

She is survived by her husband; by three sisters, Mrs. D. L. Jamison, St. Davids, Pa., Mrs. L. S. Linson and Miss Winifrede Browse of Charles Town, W. Va.; by two brothers, Dr. Henry N. Browse, New Martinsville, W. Va., and Robert T. Browse, Charles Town, W. Va.

A TRIBUTE.

In the entrance into Eternal Life on May 24 of MRS. FRANK M. RANDOLPH of "Cloverfields", her family, Grace Church at Cismont, Va., the old neighborhood, and her many relations and friends all over the country, have sustained a great loss. In her lovely old home she came in contact with numerous people who will long remember her bright and cheerful disposition, her ready sympathy, and desire to help those who were in trouble—her fund of humor and interest in all around her. To her children and family our heartfelt sympathy is extended. In the words of the old song, it may always be said, "Her bright smile haunts me still".

ONE WHO LOVED HER.

NEVADA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas Jenkins D. D. Missionary Bishop.

Church Total Loss by Fire.

Fire totally destroyed All Saints Church in the little mining town of Dayton, Nevada, on June 26. Ten houses and the Miners' Hall were also destroyed. The wind was raging so that even furniture rescued from the houses was burned. Miss Ruth Jenkins, the district treasurer, went at once to Dayton, arriving at midnight to find only a heap of ashes. Even the bell, a rather large one, was destroyed, twisted and broken in the heat and fall from the tower. There is insurance of $1,000. The church is a mission under the care of St. Peter's Church, Carson City. Bishop Jenkins has his summer office headquarters at the Lake Tahoe Summer Conference grounds, called Galilee, at Bijou, California, near the Nevada State line.

Word had just previously come to the treasurer of the National Council that the Nevada Lenten offering, amounting to $541.19, was the largest ever given by that missionary district.

Retired.

The Rev. Irving E. Baxter of St. Helena and Calistoga has gone on the retired list. The Bishop was present at his last service, and the members of our Mission at Calistoga joined with the parishioners at St. Helena, in helping to make the occasion a memorable one. The Bishop paid tribute to Mr. Baxter's saintliness of character and told of the love and esteem of the entire community. He also expressed the appreciation of the diocese to Mrs. Baxter for her fine work not only in St. Helena but in diocese and province. The Rev. Ralph H. Cox of the District of San Joaquin has been temporarily appointed to take charge of St. Helena and Calistoga.

Heroic Work.

The Humbolt Times records this piece of heroic work on the part of our Physician-Priest at Orleans: "Three persons were miraculously saved from certain death when the car in which they were riding failed to make a turn on the Klamath river road and plunged over an 800 foot grade. Rescue was effected under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. Silk, who was summoned from Orleans, and who was lowered by rope to the bottom of the cliff. He gave first aid to the severely injured and then succeeded in hoisting them up to the road, when they were rushed to the County Hospital." This is but an instance of what our medical missionary is doing among the Indians along the Klamath. We hope before long to report the construction of an emergency hospital unit with community social center. The plans have all been drawn, two-thirds of the amount required is in the bank, and the remaining one-third New York promises to send us just as soon as certain investments can be liquidated.

The Sacramento Missionary.

SACRAMENTO

Rt. Rev. Wm. H. Moreland, D. D., Bishop.

The New Dean of the Cathedral.

The Bishop is happy to announce that at a meeting of the Cathedral Chapter held on Monday, June 17, 1935, the Rev. Emile S. Harper was elected as Dean, and will begin his duties in Sacramento, on October 1.

The Rev. Emile Sherwood Harper is a native of San Francisco. He graduated from St. Matthew's Military Academy of San Mateo and studied at Leland Stanford University, and graduated in divinity at the University of the South. He began his ministry in Christ Church Cathedral in St. Louis under the great Bishop Tuttle and the Dean was the Very Rev. Carroll M. Davis, who had formerly been rector of St. Paul's, Sacramento, from 1833 to 1887. Mr. Harper's chief ministry has been at All Saints, Brooklyn, New York, where he was rector from 1910 to 1931.

ALASKA

Rt. Rev. R. T. Rowe, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Rowe's Summer Trip.

Bishop Rowe is planning another extensive visitation through Alaska during the present summer. Leaving Seattle early in April he spent Easter in Wrangell, then visted Ketchkan, Juneau and Anchorage. While there he looked somewhat into conditions of the new settlement under Federal auspices in the Matanuska Valley. As most of the settlers come from regions in Wisconcin and Minnesota, where the Lutheran Communion is strong, and as there is a Lutheran clergyman in that part of Alaska, it is probable that the Bishop will not find it necessary to assign a missionary for the spiritual care of these pioneers. From Anchorage the Bishop traveled to Nenana and Fairbanks. When last heard from he was en route to Fort Yukon on the Upper River. He hoped there to arrange for a plane to fly him to Nome. If he finds it possible to communicate with the revenue cutter leaving Nome about mid-July for Point Hope and the north coast, he will travel by it. Otherwise he will again use the plane for the 700 mile journey to Point Hope. The Bishop has not decided upon the time of his return.

The Rev. David Kemble Montgomery, formerly rector of Emmanuel Church, West Roxbury, Mass., has accepted a call to be rector of St. Peter's Church, Morristown, N. J.

The Rev. J. Clarence Jones, Ph. D., S. T. D., has resigned the rectorship of St. Mary's Church, Brooklyn, the resignation to be effective October 15 next, when he will have been rector thirty-six years.

Dr. Jones is the senior active presbyter of his diocese. He has been for many years a member of the Standing Committee of the diocese, and a trustee of the estate belonging to the diocese; he is a deputy to General Convention, and was so in the Conventions of 1907, 1928 1931 and 1934; he is chairman of the examining chaplains of the diocese, and has been a member of that body for many years; he is chancellor of the Cathedral of the Incarnation; a trustee of the General Theological Seminary and past president of its Associate Alumni.

Beside all these interests, he has presided over a parish that is one of the busiest and most successful in Brooklyn, is widely known as a scholar, and has been active in civic as well as in ecclesiastical relationships. Before coming to St. Mary's, he was for ten years in charge of St. Thomas' Church, Brooklyn, which he raised from the status of a mission to a strong parish.

After his retirement from his rectorship, Dr. and Mrs. Jones will live at 478 Washington Avenue, Brooklyn. It is to be hoped that Dr. Jones will continue some, at least, of his diocesan activities.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

Dead is the religion which does not aim at these two things, personal purity and active charity.—Thomas Guthrie.

"He is a soul most base
Whose love of right is for himself
And not for all his race."

Surely the loyal believer will not count it treason against human nature to take up arms against himself at the call of Christ, if it is by self-subjection that the Kingdom of God is to be set up in Him.—Gordon.

Love may pass by, with its sun and shine,
The goal be missed with victory nearly won,
Lord, make my face deny Fate's power to cheat,
Keep my heart strong, and keep my spirit sweet.

—Anonymous.

We should live and pray for the same thing. We pray against pride and ambition, but nurture them all the day long against appetite, but pamper it; against temptation, but brave it. This is in fact, an insult upon God, and acting as if we thought we could impose upon Him.—Exchange.

This is a day for fighting for God and for standing for righteousness as never before in our lives. It is a day when no Christian can honorably go through without the scars of battle.

He stands as the all-inclusive answer to every difficulty and problem. His life, His teachings, and His way have never failed. The pattern, the ideals, and the example He set have never been equalled. His love, and service, and mercy have never been duplicated. His power, and healing, and triumph over death transcend all others. Why do we seek other answers and other ways?

—W. S. Wise.

The aim of education should be to teach us rather how to think than what to think—rather to improve our minds, so as to enable us to think for ourselves, than to load the memory with the thoughts of other men.—Beattie.

I do not wish to see my sins more plain,
But this: to know Thy life without a stain.
I would not see the vileness of my heart,
But this would know: how pure and true Thou art
I would forget my paltry life, so small,
And know Thy greatness, Thou, my all in all.

—Thomas Curtis Clark.

Forty years long I have loved the Word of God. I feel the blessed pages under my hand with special thankfulness, as a rod and a staff to keep firm my steps through the valley of the shadow of the depression and world calamity. Truly, the Bible, the teaching of our Saviour, is "the only way out of the dark."—Helen Keller.

The Christian man may accept and give full weight to all the arguments which speculation has developed in favor of the doctrine of immortality; but although all these are estimated at their highest value, it is chiefly the calm look of Jesus into that world of mystery and His reassuring word which carry firm conviction to his heart and in which he securely rests.—Dr. George B. Stevens.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Prayer For Those At Sea.

Mr. Editor:

Church people still travel by sea!

Your issue of March 2 carried a short letter from Mr. Frank L. Moore of Chatham, N. J., suggesting that the Prayer Book prayer For a Person, or Persons, going to Sea, may be needed again.

Several years ago the clergy of your Cathedral here in Manila realized that practically all of the time members of the Cathedral Parish or of the Mission Staff were at sea. We were at that time using the Prayer for those at Sea rather frequently. Bishop Mosher then compiled and authorized for use in this diocese the collect, epistle and gospel for Travellers by Sea, a copy of which I enclose. Each week one of the daily celebrations of the Holy Communion is devoted especially to remembrance of and prayer for those who are travelling. In addition to this, we post at the entrance to the Chapel where the service is held a list of those who are sick, and those who are travelling, that they may be remembered. This list is also posted in the clergy vestry, and is used in the Bishop's oratory at Bishopsted.

If there are those who wish copies of this special collect, epistle and gospel, I shall be pleased to comply with their request.

Virginia Churchmanship.

Mr. Editor:

I read Dr. Tucker's sermon on Virginia Churchmanship with interest. His apology for Virginia ideals in Churchmanship is like that of a Most Excellent Theophilos. A case for Calvinism might be ably presented by a Van Dyke or for Independency, by a Fosdick, or Liberalism by a Reiland or a Bowie.

I was here on the Platform with a Jewish Rabbi and a Roman Priest last summer in a meeting to promote religious goodwill of all. I feel there is a larger fellowship that mere sectarian ideal misses. With profound admiration for my Oxford Graduate, Virginia Seminary mate, I am yet aware of a larger liberalism than that of Virginian non-Sacramental fellowship. Bishop Brown once called me a friend of The Sacramentalists. So, said I, I am—a Prayerbook Churchman, who uses and loves sacramental religion and the unity of the whole Body of Christ.

Washington revolted against insistence of England on despotic control of Church and State, and rule over the colonies. One of my ancestors was with the Twelve immortals who burnt the agent of the Stamp Act in effigy in Frederick, Md. Another was engaged with seven sons in the Revolution against British tyranny. America was planted by those that revolted against crown domination of the colonies. One of my ancestors in 1659, Governor of Virginia, son of an Archbishop, resigned as agent of the Crown and accepted the Governorship of Virginia from the hands of his compeers, the gentlemen of the House of Burgesses. England built her greatness on this nationalistic despotism of Monarchs and Big Business. Today the great hope for World Peace lies in abolition of this overgrown nationalism.

Better the acknowledged unity of an international Catholic Church. American Episcopacy has a million or so. Anglicanism thirty or more millions. Catholicism with its tenets holds perhaps nearly two-thirds of the Christian people of the globe.

Science, Philosophy, all may be studied and incorporated in the essential truth found with the faith of Christians—but Christ is One Head with One Body—and that is the Catholic Church. It is not just Virginia Clergy!

"Ritual—Fancy and Otherwise."

Mr. Editor:

When I read your editorial, "Ritual—Fancy and Otherwise", in the issue of July 7, it reminded me of the second lesson for the Second Sunday after Trinity, when John talked about being lukewarm. A few years ago I returned to New York for a visit and was invited by an old friend to dinner. Shortly after my arrival at the home of my friend a second guest arrived, and during a brief absence of our host I picked up the Southern Churchman, which was on a table close to my chair.

Purely from the standpoint of conversation, I asked the other guest if he knew anything about the paper, and he replied, saying it was an unexceptable Low Church paper. I immediately told him his answer would make me a subscriber to the Southern Churchman. About this time our host returned, and, after a little more conversation about the merits of the Southern Churchman, I told them about a Parish Dinner I attended in the Chicago Dioceses in which the speaker of the evening proved to his own satisfaction that the World War could be traced directly to the unexceptable low churchmanship of the late Queen Victoria. This was almost more than I could bear. You may say what has all this to do with ritual? Well just this, when I came to this country every relation I had was a member of an Episcopal Church. Today I am the only member of my family, on either my father's or mother's side, who is still an Episcopalian. Even my dear old father, who is still living, severed his connection with the Episcopalians years ago, although he was the rector's warden for years in the old country. Extreme ritualism, as we know it today, has done more to drive people out of the Episcopal Church than any other force that I know anything about. When you read about a group of men in a procession following a hair out of the beard of Charles, and other un-Christ-like things, it is high time to be hot or cold, certainly not lukewarm. My own feelings are best described in that good old hymn, which I am sorry to say is not being sung in the Episcopal Church, "Dare to be a Daniel, Dare to Stand Alone." If I could not be an Episcopalian in accordance with the Prayer Book, then I would much rather be a devout Roman Catholic. I have no quarrel with our Roman Catholic brethren, in fact I have a great admiration for them, but I have no sympathy with any group who try to imitate another group, because their dress is different.

Would you in your kindness tell me where this so-called High Churchmanship has anything in common with the lessons taught by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ?

What Is Our Goal?

Every church should have a program. This should include an immediate goal and an ultimate goal. The immediate goal can be the program of the next few months and, in keeping with the ideal set for itself in the ultimate program, will deal with immediate necessities.

Of course there are those who would vaguely say that Our Lord gave us the ultimate goal and there is no need of anything else. And indeed there is not! But that program of Our Lord needs to be urged into every day living for the average Christian, and since there would seem in parish after parish to be no real reason behind the various sermons and activities, it is small wonder that many people fail to find where the church either challenges them or interests them. In those exceptional churches that seem to know what they are doing and have a real program, there is an evidence of activity and life that is thrilling.

The clergy course put out by The Forward Movement urges as an important part of the program, the "bringing about of relationships". And what could be a better program in every church than that?

We find that most of the trouble of the world is fundamentally an inability to understand one another and a complete ignorance of the struggles of any part of humanity, except that in which we have our every day life. Misunderstanding results in strained relationships and hatreds. It is the background of war, labor troubles and economic strife. If the healing hand of The Christ is needed anywhere, it is needed in the promotion of better relationships.

It would seem that when people really work together, and not merely for somebody, the relationships improve. Here is the greatest weakness of the church. Many people regard the church as the sole business of the clergy and the thought that it belongs to each of us, either as individuals or as families, has never occurred to many of our people. If by some method of participation the problems could be thought out and through by groups, a new sense of relationship and participation would be evident.

We have often wondered even in the matter of sermons what opportunity is given laity to discuss and suggest to the preacher the problems which he considers in his sermons. Here relationships seem to be strained, and it is almost a taboo subject resulting in much indifference to an important part of the church's life.

A little more opportunity to discuss problems and a place where rich and poor, high and low, would have a common meeting ground could be supplied by the church. The result should be better understanding and improved relationships. Is not that a goal in keeping with the mind of Christ?

The "Religious" Life Today.

The death of the saintly Father Huntington of The Order of The Holy Cross reminds us all of the work of the order which he founded and the special type of work which he tried to do. With all of the Church, we rejoice that a great man has lived and by his saintly life given expression to the Faith, and we know that in peace he goes on to his reward with the Master Whom he served so faithfully.

The Holy Cross fathers, like several other orders, were founded in the belief that laxity of discipline had made a lazy Church and that a special emphasis was needed where complete consecration could be applied to the task of the church today as well as the medieval church. They have done good work. Father Huntington especially showed his zeal to reach the poor and in the early days of the order, the slums of New York served as the field where his fine religious devotion was manifest. It was a good group of men and a good ministry that began this order as well as the others.

Without meaning to reflect on Father Huntington or his order, we wonder whether the so-called "religious" life is the one that can appeal to the modern world. We feel that it too often has the tendency to look backards to an age where a dualism was the dominate philosophy of life and we wonder whether at times such orders were not more interested in re-establishing a type of worship rather than in service, because it would appear at a casual glance that it was the costumes and manners in the middle ages that mattered in the success of such orders rather than in the service rendered.

It was in his complete consecration to his work that Father Huntington gave the world his best example, and it is in such a deeper consecration that we still need the emphasis placed. But a medieval theology that could only look upon organization as divine is too far from the thought of the world today, and (dare we say?) from the scholarship of today, to wrap around such consecration. Whatever failures such movements as represented by Father Huntington have had can be placed upon an over devotion to the organization

The Value of a Vacation.

Canadian Churchman, July 4, 1935.

The rest value of a holiday is soon satisfied. What we seek then is a change of scene, of climate, of people and of work. A long holiday of complete idleness and the seeking of pleasure soon proves to be a burden. Most university students with their four months' vacation discover this truth.

Dr. Johnson took a holiday in Scotland in the year 1773. He produced as a result his "Journal of a Tour in the Hebrides". It has been said that never were ninety-four days better spent or better recorded than between August 18 and November 22, 1773. Wordsworth also went for a holiday to the Highlands of Scotland and during that visit wrote the lyric which begins:

"Behold her single in the field
Yon solitary highland lass."

His sister, Dorothy, tells the setting of these lines in her journal. "It was harvest time and the fields were quietly enlivened by a small company of reapers. It is not uncommon in the more lonely parts to see a single person so employed." Wilberforce took a holiday once in Europe. He had as his companion a brilliant young scholar. On that trip through the mutual study of the Greek Testament, the sight of majestic beauty or some casual remark in conversation, a great change took place in Wilberforce. The story of his life took on a new character and the story of mankind knew the difference in the freeing of the slaves.

A holiday can be a great event in anyone's life. The disciples had Jesus with them on their holiday and there lies the secret of the matter. We can all work for God on a holiday as well as in the winter. We can say a good word for Jesus Christ at any summer resort. A Christian is a Christian all the time.

Why Missions?

Bishop Abbott in Spirit of Missions, July, 1935.

It is impossible to be a Christian and not to be missionary-minded. To be a Christian is to be a follower of Jesus Christ, and the preeminent purpose of the life of Jesus Christ was to proclaim the Gospel. To follow our Leader is not only to emulate His example. It is, also, to obey His commands. And, Jesus said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." To disregard the orders of the Commander-in-Chief is to imperil our discipleship and to elevate our personal prejudices to a height whence we look down disdainfully upon the practice and conviction of God.

To say, "I do not believe in Christian missions," is to say, in effect, "Jesus Christ was mistaken in His conception of the absolute importance of humanity to God. The Divine favor rests, as a matter of fact and of experience, upon the relatively few, and when we include ourselves and the fortunate minimum, we exclude everybody else." In other words, "Christ is the Light of my parish, my diocese, and my countrymen. He is not the Light of the World."

To state such an attitude in black and white, even in brief, is to shudder at the logic and the spirit of consecration of the person who utters it. With St. Paul, we may "suffer fools gladly," or, with Mr. Chesterton we may "enjoy fools uproariously"; but our hearts are saddened, even as our minds are bewildered, at the realization of the spiritual loss involved in such a policy of widespread and stupid self-pleading.

Professor Barth.

The Guardian, June 28, 1935.

No German teacher of this century has brought such renown to the chair that he holds as Dr. Karl Barth, Professor of Evangelical Theology at Bonn. His lectures and books, whether readers agree with them or not, are welcomed throughout the world as those of a man of great intellect and piety. But his self-respect and his high estimate of his duty to God and man as a theologian forbade him to show a blind subservience to the Nazi State. The Minister of Education has therefore ordered that he shall retire from his chair. The scandal of this kind of persecution will ring through Europe and react upon the heads of the Nazis. Persecution of those who stand for liberty of thought brings sympathy to its victims and spreads their opinions. New scope will readily be found for Dr. Barth, and the contempt of the religious and intellectual world will be poured out upon the stupidity of the rulers of Germany.

How a Village Church Educates Its Children.

The Christian Century, July 3, 1935.

But in its regular services, cannot a church do much for religious education? In the May Pilgrim State News Letter, Rev. H. E. Martin of Foxboro, Mass., reports his plan. "I have been director of religious education in two large city churches. We had good equipment, trained personnel Yet I never felt that we accomplished what we should. Youngsters joined the church in droves, but never quite became part of the church fellowship. Here we have little equipment, only a tradition of teacher training. For four years I have tinkered with the church school. But I have constantly faced the fact that we fail to cultivate religious convictions and habits of worship. I was prepared to abolish the whole school, but when I saw how few children received any religious instruction in their homes, I reorganized it.

"There are three aspects of the child's life—social, training in worship, instruction in the factual data of Christianity. To care for the social, leaders were secured to promote clubs, activities and socials. For worship, the morning service seemed the best. All children above the third grade were invited to attend. To my amazement, they were well-behaved, reverent and participated wholeheartedly. They have pledge envelopes. It seems to me that they will continue to participate as they grow older. For instruction, just before the sermon, the children go to their classrooms for study, boys and girls together according to grade. The church year, October 1 to the second Sunday in June, is divided into three sections of twelve weeks, each with a different teacher. I have never seen a more enthusiastic group of teachers. We have had a large gain in enrolment and attendance."

Archbishop's Gracious Act.

Church of England Newspaper, June 14, 1935.

When Dr. Temple became Archbishop of York in 1929 he quickly won the hearts of the Yorkshire people. But probably in days to come it will be acknowledged that his gracious action in connection with the marriage on Whit-Monday of a former domestic servant at Bishopthorpe Palace endeared him and Mrs. Temple to the Yorkshire folk more than any other event.

Not only did the Archbishop conduct the service at the village church at Bishopthorpe, but he sent his car to bring the bride from her home to the church. His Grace and Mrs. Temple also held a reception at the Palace for the bride and bridegroom and their guests. The favored bride is Dorothy Hawthorne Shaw, a kitchenmaid at the Palace, and the bridegroom George Henry Hall, a shoe-repairer. May their united life be one of true happiness and joy.

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

A Fight to a Finish

It is probable that the difference between the man who succeeds and the man who fails is that the first keeps resolutely on in spite of failures, while the other grows discouraged and gives up the fight. Napoleon is reported to have said, at the Battle of Waterloo, that the English "didn't know when they were beaten," and so they kept on fighting till they turned defeat into victory. It is those who have staying power and who do not recognize failure as something final, but as an experience which can be used as a stepping-stone to success, who win the prizes of life.

An Incident of the Great War.

In the attempt of the British and French to force the Dardanelles, during the Great War, the first day's bombardment resulted in such a discouraging failure with the loss of several ships, that they drew off and began forming new plans. According to a story current about that time, if they had pressed the attack the following day, it is probable that they would have gone right through to Constantinople and brought the war to an end much sooner than was actually the case, which would have meant the saving of millions of lives and untold treasure. For the Turks, as the story goes, had used up their ammunition during the first day's attack, which would have so weakened their defenses as to have made the success of the Allied fleet almost certain.

King Joash and the Arrows.

We remember, too, the story of Joash, the King of Israel, going to see the prophet Elisha, who was on his death bed, and asking his advice and help against Syria. One thing that the prophet did was to tell the king to take a bundle of arrows and smite the ground with them. "And he smote thrice and stayed, and the man of God was wroth with him and said, Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed her; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice."

A Striking Characteristic of the Forward Movement.

Perhaps the most outstanding characteristic of the Forward Movement is that it is in for a fight to a finish. There is to be no let up till the Church is thoroughly aroused, and then if there is to be any pause at all, it will simply mean a short breathing spell before the great advance is made which will carry everything before it. For the members of the Church, or too many of them, have been accustomed to take things too casually and have forgotten that when they were baptized, and the sign of the Cross was imprinted on their forheads, the following words were used:—"We receive this child (or this person) into the congregation of Christ's flock, and do sign him with the sign of the Cross in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified and manfully to fight under His banner against sin the world and the devil and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end. Amen."

Out of His Fulness.

St. Paul wrote to the Ephesians (Chapter 1:22-23), "The Church which is His Body, the Fulness of Him that filleth all in all." For "of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace." (St. John 1:16.) That is to say that the Church of Christ is a vessel into which His fulness is poured, so that the resources available to His Church can never be exhausted, but are fully adequate to meet the needs of any situation in which she may be placed. What is urgently needed is such a strong and firm devotion to our Lord that we, the members of His Body, will not fail Him nor imagine for a moment that He will fail us. The Forward Movement can be made a manifestation of the mighty power of Christ working through His Church; a manifestation which will be so clear and unmistakable that the world cannot but be convinced that her mission is from God. It may take time to thoroughly and completely arouse the members of the Church to the greatness of the task entrusted to them, and at the same time to the greatness of the opportunity to serve the world. But the awakening will surely come if our leaders utterly refuse to be discouraged and boldly press on, no matters what difficulties they may have to overcome, with the full determination that it shall be "a fight to a finish".

The Challenge for Christ.

Into the cloud and mist
Forward in faith we go;
Who is there will enlist
With mind and heart aglow,
To win the world for Him,
While joy fills the Seraphim?

Ventures are being made
Taxing the stoutest nerve,
Fame that may never fade
Is acclaimed to those who serve
In the world's contests keen,
On the world's passing scene.

Greater tasks than all of these
With vast results ahead,
These challenge him who sees,
(By the blessed Spirit led,) Shining the Beacon Light
In the abyss of night.

Into the cloud and mist
Forward in faith we go;
Who is there will enlist
With mind and heart aglow,
To win the world for Him,
While joy fills the Seraphim?

The Well of Bethlehem

By HOWARD CHANDLER ROBBINS,
Professor in General Theological Seminary.

ONCE upon a time, David expressed a wish for water from the well of Bethlehem. He was cooped up for the time being in a mountain fastness near the cave of Adullam, and Bethlehem, his native town, was in the hands of an invading army of Philistines. It was natural, under the circumstances, that his thoughts should revert to the place where he had spent his boyhood, and that the old town well, out of which he had so often drawn water, should figure in his thoughts. How good that water had tasted, when he was a thirsty boy! How much he would enjoy the taste of it again! David was quite in the mood of the modern writer who has sung the praises of the oaken bucket. "Oh, that one would give me a drink," he cried, "of the water of the well of Bethlehem, that is at the gate!"

It was a whim which prompted this longing. David was not in any need of water. Plenty of it was available at hand. In modern Arabia the vicinity is known as the Feast of Waters, the place of many springs. The fact that the well of Bethlehem was inaccessible, that a Philistine garrison was stationed there, that the enemy was in possession of his native town—all this, no doubt, was in the bottom of David's mind, and determined his inclination. We want things of this sort so very much when we realize how hard they are to get. But, whim or need, there were three valiant men in David's company who were determined that it should be gratified. Theirs not to reason why. If their beloved captain had expressed a wish for the well itself, they would have tried to bring it to him, stone by stone. So we read how with Homeric bravado they accomplished the tremendous feat. They "brake through the host of Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Bethlehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David."

Now, David had many glaring faults, about which the Bible is by no means reticent. He himself was not reticent about them. He made his wrongdoing known to all the world. But one fault he was quite free from. David was not an egoist. There is in the world at all times a company of people, self-complacent and singularly stupid, who take things like this gift of water from the well of Bethlehem for granted. They appear to go upon the theory that the world revolves about their sacred persons, and that all the risks and the pains and the hardships undergone by other people find sufficient justification in some service rendered to themselves. If David had belonged to that dreary company, we can guess how he would have acted. He would have drunk the water, and dismissed his heroes with an airy, "Thank you very much; so sorry to have given you all this trouble!" One of the most moving and poetic incidents in the Old Testament would have ended in anti-climax. But here was a man of a different calibre, a man worthy of his captain's devotion. "My God forbid it me," he cried, "that I should do this thing: shall I drink the blood of the men that have put their lives in jeopardy?" "And David would not drink it, but poured it out unto the Lord."

The thing which affected David, filling him with profound and generous emotion, was the knowledge that men had jeopardized their lives to gratify his wish. But what day passes that men of whom we have never heard, men of whose very existence we are unaware, are not undergoing hardship and jeopardy, peril and privation, on our behalf? Do we realize, can we possibly realize how largely our leisure, our culture, our feastings and our rejoicings are built upon the labors of those who toil? In ancient times the relationship was feudal, in modern times it is industrial, but in all times it has involved the same distinctions. There are those who are ministered unto and those who minister. There are those who sit at meat, and there are those who serve.

SUPPOSE that we, like David, desire some innocent personal gratification: a holiday, let us say, among the hills where we spent our boyhood. Who brings us water from the well of Bethlehem? Who pays, in the last analysis, for that delightful week? "I pay for it myself," we say, "out of the interest of dividends upon my well-invested savings. I have no one but myself to thank." Do we pay for it ourselves? Have we no one but ourselves to thank? What would our share of steel be worth if it were not for workmen in the mines and in the mills, men who, while we are enjoying bright days of early Spring, are working in grimy and sunless depths of the earth, or for other men who go to work in the cold gray of early morning and come back in the evening too tired for recreation, or who, during the day, face accident amid the revolutions of dangerous machinery and whose life expectancy is shortened by reason of the toil in which they are engaged? If invested capital gives us our leisure, then it should bring us a vision of those warriors of labor jeopardizing their lives to draw us water from the well of Bethlehem.

But suppose we pay for our vacation not from the income from invested capital, but directly from our earnings. The situation is not appreciably different. If we board a train to reach our destination, we depend upon the watchfulness of the engineer, we depend upon the faithfulness of the signalmen, we depend upon the night operators, we depend upon the switchman and the brakeman, we depend upon the stoker who shovels the coal.

"It is their care that the gear engages; it is their care that the switches lock;
It is their care in all the ages to take the buffet and cushion the shock."
"As in the thronged and the lighted ways, so in the dark and the desert they stand, Wary and watchful all their days, that their brethren's days may be long in the land."

There is a difference, of course, between our situation and that of David. The valiant captain knew David and served him out of loyalty. The engineer, the stoker, and all the other valiant workmen of today do not know us or take our wishes into calculation. They have their work to do, and they do it: that is all. Yes, there is this obvious difference, and yet the difference is not as deep as it appears. The main issue, the fact which in itself is sufficient ground for David's emotion, is the fact that we are members of one another, and that some men, voluntarily or involuntarily, are spending their lives that the lives of their fellow men may be enriched and fructified.

I DO NOT see how contemplation of this fact, for it is a fact, can fail to stir in us some kind of generous appreciation. Our leisure is built on others' toil. Our happiness is bought by others' pain. In order that we may enjoy ease and refreshment and high culture, others than we have withered and agon-

Welcome Discontent

By EUNICE WINGATE QUIMBY,

Boston, Massachusetts.

"WHAT'S more miserable than discontent?" queries one of Shakespeare's characters, and another asks:

"Can you make no use of your discontent?"

Until we possess a warm home, comfortable clothing, and sufficient wholesome food, natural inertia will not keep us still. Neither will inertia hold us when we do possess them, if we are human and not merely animals. The God-implanted seed of discontent will lie more or less dormant in a sluggish body, a dull mind, and a sleepy soul.

The criticism of the Laodiceans in Revelation was their lukewarmness. They seemed to be comfortably off for food and clothing, and stopped with that. A pampered body had bred a dull mind and a sleepy soul.

Physical ease, indefinite dreaming, no desire to increase knowledge in the world, no thought of service for others, a lazy belief that God is love only, never a whip of small cords, tend to keep us at our present level.

Since God has given us free will, we can hardly expect Him to make us wise and good without effort on our part. The poet Keats pictures Lamia expressing a "pale contented sort of discontent" as she paced about; while the poet-philosopher Emerson writes of a great discontent, which is the elegy of man's loss and the prediction of his recovery.

Perhaps our responsibility is to start somewhere, and then if necessary and best, God will hedge our way with His guidance. When St. Paul had mapped out a missionary itinerary, at two points he felt himself switched off to another course, and assigned the guidance to the Spirit of Jesus.

About five hundred years earlier Socrates talked of his Daimonian, and went about in a quietly listening attitude that he might not miss "a kind of voice", which "always forbids, but never commands". He felt it to be divine guiding, which he did not question, investigate, nor disobey.

An artist has represented heavenly guidance by picturing a child toddling along a narrow plank over a brook, regardless of danger, while a hovering angel watches that it keep a straight line to safety. As the child had a plan of its own, the pursuit of which needed steering, so the plans of St. Paul and Saint Socrates needed for perfection divine oversight and guidance.

St. Paul was not at first reconciled to being guided by his "thorn in the flesh", but was thought to see it as a help instead of a hindrance to higher living. Socrates followed his pursuit of truth even unto death, since his Daimonion did not prevent it.

High attainment is not reached by a sudden upward sweep from discontent, as an aeroplane rises, but by "stepping-stones of our dead selves". Instead of vainly hoping that our personality will somehow be improved in the long run, if we would single our some virtues that we are personally short on, and vigorously content for these, we might really be conscious of definite progress.

ALTHOUGH New Year's Day is past, suppose we sit down with ourselves and think. First, what special improvement do we most need physically? Perhaps there is more than one outstanding fault to be corrected. Well, at first let us centre our effort on no more than two. When some mastery has been attained over those, others can be added one by one.

The leading faults of one may not be those of another. One may need to contend with self-indulgence in eating or drinking, another with a stooping posture, another with negligence in dress. Someone wisely maintained that we should dress for others, not for ourselves. Too much or too little exercise or sleep may concern others. Dr. Samuel Johnson made many resolutions to overcome late rising. All could not hide behind ill health, as he might have done.

Then, considering ourselves mentally, we might plan to read some poetry every day; to memorize something of permanent value; to follow a line of reading, study, or writing, that will be permanently profitable to ourselves or others.

Although we think of ourselves as three-fold, physical, mental, and spiritual, we are in reality what we are spiritually. Our highest and hardest effort will lie here. Since vices are often but virtues carried to excess, lopping off a fault will be grafting on its virtue. What is our most besetting sin or most prominent shortcoming?

We are all pretty sure to need more calmness and self-forgetfulness. One will help the other. If we are meek and lowly in heart, we shall find rest unto our souls.

We might take the Beatitudes in Matthew, or the love chapter in Corinthians, or St. Paul's admonitions in Romans, and select the two qualities wherein we fall most short. Psychologists would warn us not to keep in thought the bad quality, but to set our souls to intensify its opposite virtue, till the fault shrivels and disappears. Since our emotional and mental capacity are limited, filling our soul with one feeling or thought will leave no room for its opposite.

The thought that God helps those who help themselves is a proverb found in several languages. The version of Euripides is:

"Try first thyself, and after call on God."

Since Socrates lived before the Christian era, the negative side of divine restraint was not supplemented in his thought with the positive guidance and power of the Spirit of God, which Jesus promised.

"He shall guide you into all the truth."

"The Comforter, the Holy Spirit, . . . shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you."

"Without me ye can do nothing."

Centuries were to pass before St. Paul should exhort the men of Athens to seek their unknown God, "if haply they might feel after Him and find Him, though He is not far from each one of us."

Beyond and above these mechanical plans to develop moral qualities lies the goal of conscious personal communion with the God of the expanding universe, The Creator of the infinitely vast and the infinitely minute, midway of which live our puny personalities. Shall we not carry around with us all our days a perpetual discontent till we can realize our Father's everlasting arms underneath us, and His guiding whisper in our souls?

"He Descended Into Hell"

By JOHN MOORE WALKER,

Rector of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta.

THE QUESTION of what this article of The Creed means has often been put to the writer by members of Confirmation instruction groups. The word "hell" commonly conveys to the mind of the layman the idea of punishment for the wicked, and this only. And he is quite correct in so understanding it. But the word employed in the original form of The Creed (whether Greek or Latin) is not accurately translated "hell". There are two words in the Greek version of the New Testament which have distinctly different meanings. These words are "Hades" and "Gehenna". "Hades" means the unseen abode of the departed, whether righteous or wicked; while "Gehenna" signifies the state or place of punishment for the wicked only. Now in the original language of The Creed, the word used corresponds to "Hades" and not to "Gehenna". The substitute allowed by the Prayer Book rubric, "place of departed spirits" for "hell", is accordingly more in line with the intention of The Creed than our ordinary usage.

Then "descended" presents difficulties—that is, if taken literally. Every school boy knows that to descend physically would mean to travel towards the centre of the earth and "hell" would thus be localized somewhere in the bowels of the planet. The article would therefore involve, along with theological truth, some pretty definite elements of geography repugnant to our modern sensibilities.

These difficulties are at once overcome, however, when we remember first that the vehicles of expression made use of at the time The Creed reached its present form (the middle of the Eighth Century) were of necessity pre-Copernican. And second, that we are concerned not with the outer vehicle but the inner truth. The outer vehicle is figurative; the inner truth is essential. This truth is none other than this: The Invincible Love of God. We read in Scripture: "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." These words for all of their profundity mean something very simple and familiar to each of us. What a man does and says reflect in the main that man's nature and character. A person brutal and selfish by nature will for the most part exhibit this character by word and deed; and vice versa. And if I could have a faithful and complete record of what a man says and does through a long period of time, I could estimate with accuracy the manner of man he is.

Now, it is in this sense that Christ exhibits the nature of God. What Christ said, what Christ did, are important first and foremost because they are, as it were, windows through which we can look into the nature of God. No man hath seen God at any time, it is true; but if a man would know concerning God, let him observe Jesus closely and he will come to see. This is our clew. Christ represented as preaching to "the spirits in prison" reveals God's nature as one of love, even to those who as yet confess Him not. Furthermore, death itself is no obstacle to this yearning and persisting love of the Father. We cannot escape the reach of that love. One is reminded of the sentiments of the ancient Psalmist and of the modern hymn-writer.

"Whither shall I go then from thy Spirit? or whither shall I go then from thy presence?
If I climb up into heaven, thou art there; if I go down to hell, thou art there also.
If I take the wings of the morning, and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea;
Even there also shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me."

"O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;
I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths in its flow
May richer, fuller be.

"O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be."

And why should this invincible love of God for His children not be an article of Christian belief? If a Buddhist saint can profess never to be satisfied with bliss for himself so long as even one of his brethren is in outer darkness, can the Christian follower of The Great Shepherd of the sheep do less? Were he to do so the unknown author of the Book of Jonah would stand up in judgment against him. Here are his words —"And Jehovah said, Thou hast had regard for the gourd, for which thou hast not labored, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night: and should not I have regard for Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six-score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?"

And it was He Who is to come to be our judge Who said: "For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost."

Regnavit A Ligno Deus!

(A Description of the Wood-Carved Reredos in Zion Church. Douglaston, Long Island, on the Cover Page.)

This inscription upon the Reredos is given in the English translation of the sixth century hymn of Venantius Fortunatus: "For God is reigning from The Tree!"

Here is portrayed the fulfillment of the Calvary scene as it was originally conceived by the primitive Christian community. Here we see the glory of The Cross, not in its human misery driven in upon a struggling creature, for that view was mercifully veiled from mortal sight by the great darkness. The earlier ages of Christendom always presented this theme as that of The Kingly Christ stretching out His own hands and arms against The Tree in blessing to embrace the world.

He is our King of Life and Love! On His head is the royal crown of gold. He is our Prophet, robed in the white vesture of man's purity and courage—the forthright-teller! He is our Priest, shouldered by the red cope of sacrificial tenderness! His countenance of majestic mien shines with the light of Youth in benignity and power with a Tree-girdled Hill for His Throne!

Here is portrayed The Kingly Christ for whom the world is waiting! The power of His Spirit is the whole knowledge of the life in which we live. It is the miracle of life itself, this present life which shines forth through the trees in the great city beyond of our dwelling and desire. Here is life as we know it in all its material and physical reality—roots, trees, fruit, and the varying elements of man's work and life and love. Here is the life that we know as a material fact become our spiritual truth! Here is the risen life of The Kingly Christ which comes speaking to us out of the interpretation of experience which St. Paul expressed: "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward, that which is spiritual."

Here is portrayed the destiny of man's ideals as they arise from his needs, the physical and material substance of his daily environment. It is the spirit of our faith in The Living Christ—our Prophet, Priest and King!

Beneficent Service

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,

Bishop of Washington.

IN the ancient book of Job where the afflicted man was defending himself against his critics, he justified his course by reciting the place of proud distinction he occupied among his fellows, and the service he had rendered them in the days of his prosperity. Among other things he said: "I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out." In no claim that he made in defense of his life did he assume a loftier role than in this declaration. He would not justify himself either by his wealth or his wisdom, but rather by the self-sacrificing service he had rendered to those in dire need. Beyond the claims of the blind and the lame and the poor, he gave himself to searching out conditions that needed the kindly word and the generous and efficient hand.

It is a striking fact that those whose memories linger longest are in many instances the men and women who, in their day and generation, have been distinguished for the service they rendered their fellows. John Howard, the prison reformer of England, left behind him a record of service that gives him a lasting place in the annals of his countrymen. He sought out causes, familiarized himself with them and applied his rare gifts to their mitigation. Of him it was written, "He followed an open, if unfrequented, pathway that led to immortality." Lady Nightingale sought out causes utterly remote from her cloistered life and found them in the pestilential conditions of the Crimea. So distinguished was her service that, notwithstanding her physical weakness, her name is cherished wherever the English language is spoken.

There died in New York several years ago a quiet, unobtrusive woman who gained the proud distinction of being called the "Angel of the Tombs". Her service was rendered to unfortunate victims whose criminal propensities had led them into evil ways. In a very real sense she was the servant of forgotten men and forgotten women. Among the good and the great whose names we chronicle in the Book of Remembrance, are men and women of this type who selflessly have given themselves to serve the unfortunate and the afflicted. Their ministry is analagous to that of Him who, when asked by His forerunner, John, "Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?" answered, "Go and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached."

CHRISTIAN service has ever interpreted itself in deeds of kindness. Its most potent creed is articulate in works of beneficence. Nothing is more irresistible than a life spent in acts of mercy. The salt that preserves society is not to be found in its wealth, its mechanical genius or its learning, but rather in its exemplification of the ideals of Him who "went about doing good." It is such service that makes the Christian philosophy of life irresistible. It has been reserved for our generation to place fresh emphasis upon what are called the "social implications of the Gospel", which means literally the application of the mighty teachings of Christ to human needs of every sort and kind. His exemplars are frequently found among those who reside outside the pale of His Church.

Now and again in communities are found men and women whose profession of faith is expressed in the service they render to the unfortunate of one kind and another. There is a comradeship among men and women of this type that binds them together in a close unity. The high impulse that impels and sustains the finest types of social service proceeds from Him whose whole life was given to ministering to the needs of men. Our assumed obligation as Christians is not discharged in our oft-repeated creeds nor in our devotional practices. These must be interpreted in practical and helpful ways; they must be expressed in all our relations with our fellows, they must extend beyond the bounadries of our restricted and more exclusive areas of occupation.

Eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, to search out causes and to minister to the needs of the afflicted and unfortunate is the highest privilege given to the Christian disciples.

Bits of American Church Lore

By EDGAR L. PENNINGTON,

Rector of Grace Church, Ocala, Florida.

THE inhabitants of New Harlem "upon New York Island in America" describe the faithful and effective work of the Reverend Henricus Beys, the Dutch minister supported by the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, in a letter dated November 25, 1712:

THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY

BRENT HOUSE.

Mrs. G. A. N. King.

Eight women from Minnesota attended the Conference for Leaders of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Provinces, at Brent House, Chicago, May 22-24. The delegation included Mesdames D. R. West, G. A. N. King, W. H. D. Rees, Fred N. Furber, C. E. Anderson, Tracy, Henry C. Carlson, and Miss Margaret Densmore.

Miss Lindley, National Executive Secretary, presided over the two day session called for inspiration and for the exchange of ideas. On the first evening of the conference the students of Brent House gave an international program of music and addresses; a young Japanese student, presiding. He described Brent House as a "home of honest difference, and a refuge for conflicting opinions—our Oriental home in America." The students participating were most interesting; an Hawaiian who sang native songs and danced interpretive dances; a Chinese girl gifted with a beautiful voice; a Japanese girl pianist; and a young Korean violinist who had been in this country only two months. The second half of the program consisted of two talks; one by a Hindu, a student of Comparative Religions, who gave a deeply religious talk, in beautiful English, pointing out the difference between the Hindu and Christian attitude towards religion—"Belief as against Behavior."

In contrast to this talk, a brilliant young Chinese gave his version of the political relations between Japan and China; most interesting in the light of the friendship which seemed to exist between himself and the young Japanese, chairman of the evening. His modern version of politics was "Who gets what, when, how."

On the second evening, Dr. Karl Block of St. Louis gave a stirring address on the Forward Movement. This was followed by meditation and prayers.

It was interesting to have the oportunity of visiting Brent House so soon after Mrs. Biller had addressed the Diocesan Auxiliary, and it was practically demonstrated to us what may be accomplished by the practice of the doctrine of the "Brotherhood of Man."

Mrs. George Biller is the beloved hostess for this unique home, which is at 5540 Woodlawn Avenue, near the University of Chicago. The home is named for the late Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, a friend of Oriental students, founded about ten years ago, and is a real home fo rthe oriental student who enjoys only a restricted freedom of movement in American society. To quote one of the students: "Brent House to its Oriental members does not stand out as a propaganda station for any western religion but its hostess is acknowledged by all, as a devout Christian of the Episcopal Church. Brent House does not seek to convert Hindus, or Buddhists, or Confucianists, but allows them all to mix in one group as if they were natural members of one body. The things that divide people into different faiths, races, nations, or classes, are entirely forgotten as soon as one steps inside its doors; and the door is truly an open door, open to all who care to enjoy friendly contacts with students from other lands."

To quote again: "The thankfulness of Oriental students to their American friends cannot be adequately expressed while they are still in America and absorbed in academic work. But as they bid farewell to Brent House one by one, the fragrance of true human affections is carried to distant parts of the world to combat the bitterness that grows out of racial prejudice and national rivalries. Someday, somewhere, some Oriental hearts will open themselves to friendly Americans because of what they learn at Brent House."

Two of our delegates happened to arrive at Brent House the evening before they were expectd, and they will never forget the home atmosphere that greeted them. The fire burning in the grate, the young people grouped about visiting, and Mrs. Biller the beloved hostess and Mother—we began then to realize the value of Brent House. It was truly a privilege to have had the opportunity of attending the conference. We feel that our lives have been enriched because of the experience of being with Mrs. Biller, and seeing what both she and Brent House mean to the Oriental Student.—The Minnesota Missionary.

Auxiliary Day at Kanuga comes this year on Saturday, July 20; the program which begins at ten o'clock, will be an interesting one. Visitors will, as usual, be able to lunch in the Conference dining-room.

Those of our Church women who are summering in the mountains will surely attend, and those who are perhaps planning a week-end trip, will wisely select this time for their holiday and so have the added pleasure of the day at Kanuga.

Trinity Pinopolis.

In making out their program for the year, the women of Trinity decided that in addition to their usual undertaking, they would make a special effort on two projects, Advance Work and the Pineville Infirmary. A definite sum was decided upon as a contribution to Advance Work and through various little enterprises, the fund is steadily growing towards the hoped-for amount. The fact that Bishop Mitchell was once rector of the parish, of course, adds greatly to the interest in the little Arizona Church.

The Pineville Infirmary under the charge of one of our U. T. O. workers, Nurse Maude Callen, is only fifteen miles up the road from Pinopolis and so is a home responsibility. At the June meeting, every woman brought a gift of some sort—towels, pillow-cases, preserves, puzzles, china and glass, sheets and soap—so that a substantial box was later sent to the Infirmary.

A visitor to the Orphanage reported distressingly empty book cases which so moved the ladies that they took from their own shelves, treasures new and old, and sent off three dozen books suitable for children and young people.

The Work of the Supply Department.

The Supply Department of the Woman's Auxiliary which has charge of the sending of clothing and hospital supplies to the mission field reports that the women have kept up their interest remarkably during these difficult years.

EDITORIAL.

and the organization's trappings rather than to the fine Christian zeal manifest in such lives.

We do not need the "religious" life. It must be more akin in costume and manner and scholarship to the present world. It must be able to find a place for the married as well as the celibate and it must have the zeal and devotion of a Father Huntington. Are there men who can combine breadth of vision with religious devotion? We trust so, for of such men are the true followers of Our Lord.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Universities Mission to Central Africa.

The man who is skeptical about the Church's mission overseas ought to take an intensive course of study on the Universities Mission to Central Africa. A great hall in London was packed from floor to roof for the recent annual meeting of this society. Bishop Shaw of Oxford, president, said it was characteristic of the mission that people "do not merely show an interest in it; they belong to it."

Work is progressing in its four central African dioceses, Zanzibar, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, and Masasi, in spite of many varieties of difficulty and hardship, including an almost desperate shortage of English priests. There are many African clergy and most of the school teaching is now done by African teachers, but a white staff is still essential and should not be as scant and over-burdened as it has been in recent years. There are 10,000 children in the U. M. C. A. schools in the Diocese of Masasi alone. The government inspector of education had occasion to read a Masasi school girl's paper on geography which he said caused him to revise his whole conception of the potential abilities of African women.

No Competition for Doctors.

From the Epworth Era comes the following startling information: "For the black skinned natives of Central Africa there are just 114 doctors for a total population of 90,000,000, or one doctor for each 790,000 natives. This compares with one doctor to every 759 persons in the United States. All of these doctors are missionaries. There are government physicians, but they confine their practice to foreign residents. Except where these few medical missionaries have gone, Africa is still tormented with the terror of evil spirits and dominated by the witch doctor. A glorious opportunity awaits an awakened church."

Doctor of Philosophy Degree Conferred on Dr. Lo.

Dr. Lo Ch'uan-Fang, who compiled the reading course on "Orientals in the United States" issued early in 1935 by the National Council, has received his Doctor of Philosophy degree from the University of Chicago and returns to China during the summer to assume the chair of psychology at Central China College, Wuchang, where Dr. Francis Wei is president. Dr. Lo is a member of the Anglican Communion, a graduate of Boone Middle School and Boone College. The discussion of Orientals in the United States was written by Dr. Lo after nearly five years of life in this country.

Another Outstation Hospital in Liberia.

A paramount chief from the Gola country in Liberia turned up at St. Timothy's Hospital, Cape Mount, to announce that a hospital building had been erected in his town and was ready for use. He had repeatedly asked the hospital to start medical work there, but St. Timothy's, with two outstations already open, did not plan to start any more until 1936.

The first outstation, at Dambala, has now weathered the difficulties of its first year, with nearly 300 patients treated. The nurse gives instructions in midwifery, care of babies and general hygiene. She visits surrounding villages. The doctor from Cape Mount visits the outstations for inspection and operations.

"By This Time and Since Before Yet."

A petition signed with two pages of thumb marks by Igorots at Tukukan has been received by Bishop Mosher, begging that Deaconess Shaw of Bontoc be transferred to Tukukan, to fill the vacancy left by Deaconess Routledge. The Bishop could not do this, and if he did, the first result would be a petition from the Igorots of Bontoc not to take Deaconess Shaw from them.

The Bishop asked his young Igorot catechist, Mark Suluen, to explain to the people and the catechist replied with a most sympathetic letter, telling how much the Igorots all think of Deaconess Shaw, but, he adds, "I'll say that you have no possibility of sending a missionary for the present and I'll make them understand that money is scarce by this time and since before yet."

BOOK REVIEWS

A FORM OF PRAYER AND OF THANKSGIVING to Almighty God for the Protection Afforded to the King's Majesty, During the Twenty-five Years of His Auspicious Reign, Ordered by the Lords of His Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council. Published by the Oxford University Press, London.

I have been told that the great celebration all over the British Empire on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of King George V.'s accession, had its inception in a remark made by him: that he would like to go to church on the sixth of May. Out of this grew the marvellous outpouring of love and loyalty which has assured his Majesty of the place he holds in the hearts of his people.

The Form of Service appointed for the Jubilee reads: "A Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the protection afforded to the King's Majesty during the twenty-five years of his auspicious reign," and the service fully carries out that title, stressing in prayers, psalms and hymns the thankful dependence of the King and his subjects upon the King of kings and Lord of the whole earth.

It was fitting that the King of a great nation should go in state to St. Paul's Cathedral, but when King George knelt to offer prayers of thanksgiving, God who reads all hearts, saw a humble and grateful Christian putting his whole trust in God's strength to enable him to bear the responsibilities of the great office to which it has pleased God to call him.

The service contains a very beautiful prayer for all the King's subjects of "divers races, languages and customs". After the singing of the Te Deum, two verses of the National Anthem concluded the service.

HUDSON TAYLOR'S SPIRITUAL SECRET: By Dr. and Mrs. Howard Taylor. Available from the China Inland Mission Headquarters in Philadelphia, Penn. There is treasure for those who love God and wish to more fully realize their privilege of faith and prayer.

To look into the inner life of so great and useful a man as Hudson Taylor is indeed a privilege. There is power back of such a life as Taylor's, who organized and directed for so many years the great China Inland Mission, which had 750 missionaries when he died in 1900 and now is represented by 1,300 missionaries and 4,000 Chinese workers. Baptisms since 1900 alone number more than 100,000. Whence all this? From God. Taylor laid hold on God and he let God take full possession of him, in a way that few men have done, yet simply. The secret of his life was faith and prayer.

The tendency in some churches almost wholly to trust organizations and programs is carried too far by many. God's people need to trust more in Him, making known their needs in supplication to Him. The great "Faith Missions", of which the China Inland Mission is a good example, are going forward in the evangelization of the world in a wonderful way, while other missions are at a standstill or are going backward. God is hearing with funds, missionaries and converts those who depend most on Him in faith and prayer.

This life of a great man's inner relation to God is as interesting and captivating as any romance. It cannot but prove a blessing to all who read it, as it has been a blessing to us.

GOD DOES GUIDE US: By W. E. Sangster. Cloth. Pp. 147. Published by The Abingdon Press, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Price, $1.

The author, a minister of the Methodist Church, knows God, and witnesses to vital experiences of the Lord's dealings with Himself and others.

If there was one note more than any other clearly sounded out by our Lord, it was that His Father was personally concerned for the welfare of all who would claim divine protection, prosperity and preserving. God, to be God at all, must be all that our Lord and His Apostles defined, or He is unworthy of our faith and loyalty. The God of the Holy Scriptures is not a God who is afar off only, but nigh at hand. See Psalms 139. Hear our Lord's appeal in Matt. 7:11; and that of the Apostle Paul in Phil. 4.6, 19.

The fact that saintly Leslie D. Weatherhead endorses the book, as he writes: "I welcome this book enthusiastically, because it is a sane, practical, frank, fearless devotional study," is sufficient to allure us to the author's position.

The narration of experience, the persuasiveness of appeal, the whole-hearted conviction of the author in the integrity of his message, all conspire to make the book

Those who have espoused the "Group Movement", as well as they who have not, will find special inspiration to trust God more completely for the things of time as well as those of eternity.

THE Reverend Ebenezer Taylor, of St. Andrew's Parish, South Carolina, describes local conditions in his letter of July 28, 1713:

"Our Parishes here have Such vast Bounds that it is hardly possible for the Minister to know the Number of the Inhabitants of his Parish, But I think I may Say, my Parish is one of the most Populous Parishe, in the Province & yet there is not one Papist in it that I know, and I wish there were as few Dissenters of all Sorts in my Parish, but they are many & there are too few Conformists which make my Parish a very Uncomfortable Parish to me. But I live in Hopes to See more Conformists & fewer Dissenters in my Parish then now there are and that I shall live more Comfortably in it hereafter then ever I have yet done, ffor the Dissenters are themselves, and they make too many that professe themselves of the Church of England very Unkind and troublesome to me. I think the Interest of the Church of England considerably Increases, and the Dissenters Interest considerably decreases in most of our Parishes, now that the Society has been so kind to this Province as to furnish our Parishes with true Conformist & Godly Ministers."

In the same letter, the Reverend Ebenezer Taylor complains of the indifference of his people to the sacraments.

"I had twice given Notice of my Purpose to administer the Holy Comunion & each time preached a Discourse preparatory for it was all in vain, for neither time had I the Number wch our Church requires to comunicate with me, and So there was no Comunion at either of these times. But this did not So discourage me as to try no more, but some time after I gave Notice againe, as our Church directs of my Intention the Lords day following to Administer the Lord's Supper and Preached a Sacramental Sermon before the Celebration, and then I had 4 Comunicants besides my Self."

THE WELL OF BETHLEHEM.

ized. In the case of material needs, food, lodging, transportation and the like, the fact is evident. Is the fact less evident when our needs are intellectual, when they are moral? The book which helped us, which stimulated us to independent thought, which opened to us new worlds of science or philosophy or art, which brought us solace and inspiration—that book cost the writer something. Rodin's statue reminds us that there is agony in the mind of a thinker before a great thought comes to birth; there is travail of soul for the artist before it finds expression. Dante said that his Divine Comedy made him lean, and children pointed him out in the streets as the man who had been in hell. And when our needs are spiritual, then all above all times the satisfaction of them is costly. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, and the symbol of our religion is a cross.

"David would not drink of it, but poured it out to the Lord." The warriors themselves were not actuated by religious motives. They risked their lives for David, not for God. Yet, it is to God that David, with a realizing heart, directs the sacrifice. And here he is a prophet; here he shows himself gifted with poetic insight which sees deeply into truth. All devotion has its Godward aspect. The water from the well of Bethlehem, secured at so great a risk, given in so generous a spirit, is always, in a mystical sense, "poured out unto the Lord." The service rendered to the beloved captain, the peril encountered in pursuit of duty, the task performed manfully and with no expectation of reward—all that man dares or woman endures in order that others may be benefited is as directly done unto God, and as inevitably received by Him, as though devotion to him had been in the first place its animating cause. The Saviour Himself has made that plain to us. Beautiful words come from the Son of David, confirming David's own poetic insight. "I was an hungered and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me drink. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Here is portrayed The Christ exalted as The King of Glory, not in man's past or future of fear or hope, but in man's living present. In the light of That Blessed Presence we live and move and have our being, freed for life and work and love from doubt, discouragement and despair.

So man sees but dimly, though none the less really, the environment of his modern city shining through the trees. And above it all hovers supreme The Kingly Christ, transfiguring that environment into all that is spiritual and beautiful. But because we live in the flesh, the body is spiritually precious and its modern environment sacred and beautiful.

This is our destiny—our faith in The Kingly Christ as the embodiment of our natural spiritual life springing naturally from the material of our every-day experience.

In this Kingly Christ we see this spiritual vision in terms of the warp and woof of our actual needs. It is a faith actually livable for that world of men ever in search of that city whose builder and maker is God!

"We are builders of that city;
"All our joys and all our groans
Help to rear its shining ramparts
All our lives are building stones!"

Buddhism

INTRODUCTION.

Leader: Possibly the first thought that comes to our minds when Buddhism is mentioned, is that it is something we know practically nothing about and that it is of interest only to scholars and people in far off lands. But this is not correct, for there are three great missionary religions whose followers believe that they should preach their religion to the whole world. The oldest of these is Buddhism, the second is Christianity, and the third, Islam or Mohammedanism.

To begin with its history: Twenty-five hundred years ago, about the time the Jews were returning from their captivity under Nehemiah and Ezra, there was born in India a prince by the name of Gotama Siddartha. Being a native of India or Hindustan, his religion was naturally that of his people. He grew up and married and had a son. But at the age of twenty-nine he became oppressed by what he thought was the darkness of his religion and left home to wander in search of light. He thus, after a good deal of time and thought, arrived at what he considered was Light. So he called himself a Buddha, or man who had found light. Buddha is thus a title, as Christ is a title, and the religion he founded is called Buddhism, as the religion Jesus founded is called Christianity. He was thirty-five when this happened, and the rest of his life he taught what he had found. He died at the age of eighty, surrounded by his followers.

The sacred books of the Buddhists are made up of dialogues of his followers with Buddha, in which he gave his teachings. They are primarily of a moral nature and really ignored God. They constituted a great reformation of Hindooism on which it built, even as Christianity is built on Judaism.

After Gotama's death the religion, or rather philosophy, he had founded spread, but with this difference, that whereas he had ignored God, his followers made a god out of him and prayed to him. Its great idol is Buddha himself. All Southern India was gradually covered by Buddhism. Then it spread to the Island of Ceylon, just south of India. Then it spread to the north of India and to the east, until Ceylon, Burma, Siam and Cambodia were in the fold. Then to the north again, where Tibet and Mongolia were converted. Then to the east again, where China, Korea and Japan were converted. Then south through Java and the East Indies and the islands of the Pacific, and today Buddhist temples are being built in California.

The people who worship Buddha are estimated by different authorities as anywhere between one hundred million and five hundred million. When it is realized that the total population of the world is estimated at two billion, we see that according to the highest estimates, one in every four people in the world, and according to the lowest estimates, one in every twenty people, is a Buddhist. Christianity claims between one-fourth and one-half of the people in the world, so it is well worth our while to know something about Buddhism.

Description of Buddhism.

In order to understand Buddhism we must understand Hindooism or Brahmanism, as it is sometimes called. It is very difficult to give this in a few words, as Brahmanism is different in different places. But its chief idea is that God is everything and we and the world are nothing. Or, to put it in the words of what may be called its creed, "Brahm (that is, God) exists, all else is Maya (that is, illusion)." In other words, that we are really nothing but Brahm's dream. Everybody wants to live, so Brahm keeps on dreaming; if he would ever wake up, we simply wouldn't be. Not only this, but they say Brahm gets tired of thinking of us as men and we die, then Brahm thinks of us as something else, perhaps a mouse or an elephant or a snake or a lion, and we are reborn as that animal. Then Brahm stops thinking of us as that animal and we will be reborn as something else. Of course Man is the best that a person can be, but there is a difference in man. This they call caste, and there are hundreds of them. There are four main castes, however. The highest is the Priests, next come Warriors, then Farmers, then the Slaves. Then below all of these are the Pariahs or outcastes.

Inasmuch as Buddha's reforms did not touch the caste system, it may be interesting to know one or two of the laws regarding caste. For one of the three upper castes, a man must devote himself to study and keep the rules of the student life, either for nine years, or for eighteen years, or for thirty-six years, after which he shall take a ceremonial bath and marry a girl of his same caste, but only if she has certain qualifications. There are quite a number of these qualifications, but two of them are interesting. She must not be baldheaded, redheaded or have weak eyes, and it is especially mentioned that she must be beautifully graceful and have the walk of an elephant.

But to return to Gotama. He believed that life was sad and that from the time a person was born he suffered. Then when he died he had to be reborn into another life and probably it would be even more miserable than the one before it. Of course, you would never think of eating any meat, because if you did, you might be eating the flesh of your grandmother or grandfather, which would be horrible. This was such a strong belief of the Hindoos that those in the British army had to have special rations cooked especially without lard, because lard is animal fat and you might be eating one of your ancestors' flesh.

This was so terrible that Gotama looked for a way out and finally came to the conclusion that if he could only concentrate his mind on nothingness and not think, that Brahm would forget about him and he would be forgotten and need not be born again. So that was his message. But in order to reach this Buddhist heaven or Nirvana, you must be very kind to all animals. Thus, if a flea bites you, you must carefully and gently catch him and drop him where he won't get hurt by the fall. The same applies to flies and to mosquitoes. The story is told of a Buddhist saint who saw a starving lioness and was so sorry for her that he went up and gave himself to her, that she might make a good meal from his body.

Of course, there are many other rules you must follow if you would be a real Buddhist saint. One of them is that you must always sit on a carpet, even while asleep. If you lie down, you will think how comfortable it is. Also, you must never sit on a cushion for the same reason. Altogether, there are quite a few reasons why I don't think I would care to be a Hindoo or a Buddhist.

Buddhism and Christianity.

The sharpest distinction in the world is between the ideas of the Gospel, or good news, which these religions have. Jesus said, "I came that ye might have life and have it more abundantly," but Gotama said, in essence, "I came that you may have death and have it more abundantly." Christianity says, Life is good and we will teach you to get the most out of it. Buddhism says, Life is evil; we will tell you how to get rid of it.

Both religions believe in a heaven and a hell, or punishment for wrongdoing. But Buddhism teaches that the greatest happiness is a dreamless sleep from which we will never wake, while Christianity teaches that the greatest happiness is being with God and doing His will. So, too, the Christian hell or punishment after death is thought of as being away from God, and the Buddhist hell is thought of as forever doing what Brahm wants you to do, with all the suffering connected with the rebirths.

In China and Japan, however, one sees pictures of the popular idea of what is called the Buddhist hell, with flames and devils and pitchforks very much like the picture we see of Hell in our funny papers today, and the kind of pictures we used to see of Hell in many religious pictures. The explanation of this likeness is probably that early Christian missionaries and early Buddhist missionaries came into contact and one copied the others' pictures. But the greatest contrast is in this world, as might be expected. Buddhist peoples will not kill flies and other pests, and all know that flies spread disease. The consequence is that Buddhist countries are usually very unhealthy. Insects also destroy crops, but Buddhism protecting the insects means that crops in Buddhist countries cannot be as plentiful as in Christian, so the people are usually poorer also.

So that from physical as well as spiritual causes, Buddhism is a religion of gloom and suffering, while Christianity is a religion of joy and happiness and light.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

CINCINNATI SUMMER SCHOOL OF SOCIAL WORK.

Opening with a quiet day and meditations conducted by the Rt. Rev. Henry Wise Hobson, Bishop of Southern Ohio, the Cincinnati Summer School of Social Work has begun its thirteenth session. Twenty-two men from fifteen states are attending the eight-weeks session, which is under the direction of Dr. William S. Keller.

In addition to practical experience in the various social agencies of the City of Cincinnati, the students will hear a large number of lectures by leading authorities in the various professions related to social service.

The series of lectures began with the opening address by Dr. Keller. On Monday, July 8, the Rev. William S. Spofford, Managing Editor of The Witness, and Executive Secretary of the Church League for Industrial Democracy, spoke on "Religion and the Problems of Labor." The entire series will include twenty-nine lectures. C. A. Dykstra, City Manager of Cincinnati, will speak on "Problems of a Modern City." "The National Church's Social Work Program" will be discussed by the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, Executive Secretary of the Department of Social Service of the National Council. Problems of psychiatry, maternal health, delinquency, education, social security, and labor, will be discussed by authorities in the various fields. The series will be closed with four addresses on "Christian Theology and Social Action" by the Rev. Clifford L. Stanley, Associate Professor of Systematic Divinity at the Virginia Theological Seminary.

During the eight weeks the students will take part in the actual work of eleven social agencies in Cincinnati. They will serve as assistants with the Longview Hospital for Mental Diseases, the Juvenile Court, Amalgamated Clothing Workers, Cincinnati General Hospital, the Children's Hospital, the Ohio Human Society, Adult Probation for the Court of General Pleas, the Hamilton County Work House, the Department of Public Welfare, the Associated Charities, and the Federal Relief Administration. This work will provide an opportunity to correlate the actual work of social adjustment of the individual with the general programs presented in the lectures.

During the past twelve years about 250 men have had training at the Cincinnati school. The project was conceived and carried out by Dr. Keller, the Director. Five men from Southern dioceses are in attendance at the present session. They are I. M. P. Skinner, Diocese of Atlanta; Clyde Jardine, Diocese of Georgia; Stiles B. Lines, Diocese of Georgia; Ralph Bridges, Diocese of North Carolina, and the Rev. Stanley Ashton, of the Diocese of Idaho, who attended the Virginia Theological Seminary. Other dioceses represented are: Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Massachusetts, Western Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, Southern Ohio, Delaware and Olympia.

Theological Seminaries represented are: Virginia, Sewanee, General, Cambridge, Bexley, Berkeley, Philadelphia Divinity School, and Seabury-Western.

REV. FREDERICK K. STAMM TO CONDUCT WORLD'S LARGEST BIBLE CLASS ON THE AIR.

What is probably the largest Bible Class in the world with an attendance estimated in millions will be conducted for the fifth consecutive year by the Rev. Frederick K. Stamm, starting on Sunday, August 4.

While the leading popular Bible Classes in communities of the nation have a maximum attendance of 2,000, the radio makes it possible for Mr. Stamm's unique Bible Class to be attended by millions. For Mr. Stamm will teach the Bible through the medium of the NBC—WJZ network of thirty-six stations every Sunday afternoon for a period of three months from 1:30 to 2 Eastern Daylight Time. The title of this radio series is "Highlights of the Bible".

Though Mr. Stamm cannot see his students as he speaks to them on the significance of the Bible in modern living, he has come to know many of them intimately through the countless letters that come to his office and to the broadcasting company. He knows that in his Class are men and women living in the forty-eight states, Canada and Mexico, and that passengers on ocean liners and in automobiles, convicts in prisons and shut-ins in hospitals frequently attend. They are people of all faiths and denominations, of every type and social level.

It is the knowledge that many of them are learning about the Bible for the first time that gives Mr. Stamm particular satisfaction.

"When I am on the air, I try always to think of the great varieties of people who are listening in," he has said. "These people are not interested in denominations or sacraments or the ornaments of religion, but in its essentials and its relation to their every-day experiences. Religion must not be a thing apart but must have something to do with life and conduct and general attitudes. From the letters I have received I am convinced that the Bible still has power to stir the deepest emotions of the human heart and makes its appeal to the highest intelligence.

Another feature that makes Mr. Stamm's Bible Class distinctive is a Personal Problem Department, which offers advice and help to those faced with serious problems. Men and women who hesitate to talk with some one they know about their difficulties are quick to unburden their souls to a sympathetic stranger. Last season, 15,000 letters asking for help were received and personally answered by Mr. Stamm.

The keynote of Mr. Stamm's radio technique is simplicity.

"I have discovered that all sorts of people like a simple gospel," he says, "and by a simple gospel I do not mean one that strikes no fire or destroys no conventions. I mean one that goes home to the conscience of people and makes its appeal to the intellects and hearts alike.

"I don't always start from a Bible passage but from life and find its parallel in the experiences of men and women in the Bible. This is no day for froth. One must find the truth and speak it clearly and cogently and let it do its work. I find when I do this, that alike the professor of philosophy, the student of theology and the cowboy who roams the ranges finds it worthy of acceptance. I never talk down to a radio audience. I assume their intelligence and their hunger for the best. I don't shout at them or indulge in spread-eagle oratory—just plain talk straight from a man who is intensely interested in what he has to say."

Mr. Stamm's nation-wide Bible Class of the Air is arranged by a National Committee of which C. Walter Nicols is chairman. Mr. Stamm is minister of the Clinton Avenue Community Church in Brooklyn, New York, and the author of "Through Experience to Faith," written in 1932. He speaks frequently before college and university students and has written articles for many of the leading magazines.

PREACHING BY POSTER.

This is a story of church railings, thirteen-foot posters, yard-long cards, Jews by the thousand and Gentiles by the half-million. A narrative of simple methods, small expenses, and decidedly worth-while results.

For I am faced with a magnificent church in Whitechapel, one of the finest early Gothic buildings in London, a parish crowded with people from every corner of Europe, and a small and declining number of the lawful and original inhabitants. For these we have fine schools, clubs, guilds—indeed, the usual parochial apparatus. Some three or four times a year we get huge gatherings of Jews in church, an amazingly attentive throng, altogether a surprise to the enquiring stranger.

But this is far from being satisfactory. One wants to get into touch with the myriads, some of whom certainly have no desire to get into touch with church, chapel, or religion at all. So though we had a congregation, I proceeded to enlarge it.

On coming to Whitechapel eighteen years ago, I was told by the police and other authorities that there were at least a half million people who passed this church each way daily, by bus, tram or other vehicle, or on their own legs. I could well believe it, as I can well believe the number has doubled during the last ten years.

This great avenue, a few hundred yards eastwards, widens into the broadest of roads. Near the church the road narrows, and buses, trams, cars and lorries, and these never-ending tramping multitudes are squeezed into a passageway of much lessened dimensions, though almost immediately Whitechapel welcomes them into its spacious High Street. But for a short distance the rectory, the church with its lofty spire, and the churchyard, hold the fort and dominate the position.

The traffic slackens its speed—frequently stops. And there was my chance of speaking, of arresting the attention of the army of travellers that ceases not day or night. In the small hours of very early morning the passersby are reduced to a minimum, but it is a respite of a couple of hours only. Our day ends about one o'clock in the morning and has recommenced vigorously by three.

I had a thirteen-foot board erected on a space full front to the road. No one passing could fail to see it. On the board was pasted a hand-stencilled and colored text, hymn-verse or thirty-word message of warning or encouragement. The legend showed up well and could be read by passengers in the passing bus or tram. The great point was that, placed in such a situation, the words could not fail to be noticed. People were compelled to see them, if not on Tuesday, then on Wednesday. And after a ten days' exposure many would know them by heart.

A second and much less effective measure of silent preaching is by cards inserted in slots on boards fitted to the church railings. I have about seven such. The idea is to place on four of the boards, weekly or fortnightly, cards of about thirty inches by twenty, a hand-written "service": two verses of a hymn, four or five verses of Scripture, a prayer of about sixty words, a "one-minute sermon". The latter must be very direct and in simple phrase. Extracts from books are useless—absolutely. It must be the writer speaking so far as he can make it so. The same with the prayer—for it needs must follow the lines of the "sermon". Two or three other boards give opportunity for the display of some good extracts, a page of Whitechapel history, or a few lines from a good poet.

All must be by the same hand in good legible writing. Cost? The posters run into (roughly) eight pounds yearly, while the cards are about five shillings the dozen, and you can use both sides. Worth it? Yes! And much more!

I cannot tell you what encouragement these simple doings have brought. Many hundreds of letters, an occasional postal order "to help pay the big bill", and an endless series of "thank-you's" from Jew and Gentile have been part only of an exceeding great reward.

MISSIONARY TO THE RESCUE.

When a car with three persons plunged over an 800-foot cliff on the Klamath River road in California, the Rev. Claude W. Silk, M. D., missionary at Orleans in the Sacramento Diocese, was summoned to direct a rescue. He had himself lowered on a rope to the foot of the cliff, gave first aid to the victims and succeeded in hoisting them up to the road and rushed to the county hospital. All in the day's work for the missionary. The county newspaper reported it.

THE CROSS FROM THE STILL.

The Rev. Peerce N. McDonald, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Montgomery, Ala., sends the following from a correspondent at Cowan, Tenn.:

There is a Mission Station here and two boys from Sewanee come down and hold the services. Jack Soper from Hartsville, Ala., and Cyril Best from Chicago, usually come. We spent Saturday painting the church.

The cross on the church was made of tin and had rusted practically in two. We persuaded the sheriff to give us the copper from a confiscated still to make a new cross. It serves the purpose admirably, you should see it. Some of the Baptist (Primitive, I think) said it was wrong to use the still to make a cross and that the Lord was going to knock it off with lightning. We told them we would put a ground wire to the cross and not to worry. What do you think of the idea?

GROUP WORK AMONG GIRLS IN CANADA.

(Abstract of address by Miss Ethel Law, Training and Conference Secretary, National Council, Young Women's Christian Association of Canada. Delivered June 13 at the Episcopal Social Work Conference, meeting in Montreal, Canada.)

Quoting a survey recently made by social workers in the United States, which showed that all the organizations working with girls reach less than one-fourth of the girl population, Miss Law said this probably indicated a similar state of affairs in Canada. Many parishes have little or no organized work for the teen-age girl. There is, however, a growing consciousness of the need and value of group activities, a consciousness intensified by dangers attendant upon the increase of enforced leisure. More than this, the vision of a new social order has captured the imagination of young people. It is urgent that they should find leadership in the Church. The Church has always taught the wholeness and fulness of life. New conditions call for a new emphasis on Church principles of religious education and recreation.

The Church of England in Canada sponsors four organizations for teen-age girls: Girls' Branches of the Woman's Auxiliary, 532 branches; Girl Guides, 237 Anglican companies; Canadian Girls in Training, 61 Anglican gorups: Girls' Friendly Society, 26 branches.

The variety of organizations has sometimes meant a lack of coordination but, Miss Law says, "The very genius of the Anglican Church has encouraged variety and spontaneity and has resisted standardization." A national coordinating committee represents all these groups and also the Council for Social Service.

Among the problems and needs calling for increased attention, Miss Law mentioned programs providing for combined groups of boys and girls; programs for health instruction "which should include accurate information about the functions of sex. It is realized that the rather sentimental treatment of this subject in former years is quite distinctly not the treatment required by this generation. The subject obviously demands the careful technical accuracy with which we would honor any other subject of education; but it requires also that spiritual teaching which is the characteristic and distinctive contribution of the Church to the education of youth."

A grave problem is created by the difficulty of keeping in touch with girls away from home, working in shops, offices, and factories, or in domestic work, or at college. "This group which comprises the older adolescents, living often in bare boarding rooms, is lamentably poorly represented in the girls' organizations of our city churches. We seem to fail to seek out these girls who have left their home parish, and yet there is a large need for social and recreational facilities." Girls in domestic service, especially girls from England or elsewhere abroad, need particular consideration, as do also girls in small and isolated communities where the Church's cooperation with community agencies can be helpful, supplemented by religious education.

The greatest problem is to secure and and train leaders. Miss Law made some practical suggestions about this.

THE ENGLISH IN INDIA.

The near approach of the new regime in India arouses interest and even anxiety about its effects upon the resident English and Anglo-Indian community. The number of Englishmen in various branches of the Indian Civil Service has been steadily reduced as the Indianization of the Service has progressed. The days when the Indian Civil" war far more coveted than the Home Civil Service have long gone by. There are now no more than about 1,300 British on the list, and these will drop out in the course of time.

The unofficial British consist of railway men and members and employees of commercial firms. Their numbers also have been much reduced of late years and more and more Indians have taken their places. No doubt this displacement of British by Indians will now proceed more rapidly. The Anglo-Indians of mixed races, who used to be called Eurasians, numbering about 100,000, used once to fill minor offices on the railways, postal and similar services, but have been steadily ousted of late years. These unfortunate people range from a highly educated class, with only a faint tinge of colour, down to those who have little to distinguish them from poor natives. It is not to be expected that the new Indianized government will exert itself to improve the status or education of these Anglo-Indians; indeed, complaints have already been heard that they have been unduly favoured in the past. If they are not to sink still lower in the social scale, the English societies which now help to maintain schools for them will need to put forth much greater efforts as government grants are withdrawn. Similarly as the official and unofficial British communities diminish, more help will be required from England to maintain clergy for them. Such official chaplains as are left, and any missionaries who are stationed within reach of these reduced coteries will no doubt minister to them as far as possible, but the outlook for them is not clear.—The Record (English).

CHURCH MISSION OF HELP.

Miss Gwynedd Owen, case supervisor of the Toronto Children's Home, will become executive secretary of the Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of Southern Ohio, on September 15. Miss Owen's father is the Most Rev. Derwyn T. Owen, Primate of all Canada.

Mrs. Mabel Benson, who for eight years has been executive secretary of the Church Mission of Help of the Dioceses of Central New York, will become executive secretary of the Church Mission of Help of New Jersey.

In the interest of economy it has been decided to close the national office of the Church Mission of Help, at 27 West Twenty-fifth Street, New York, for July and August.

The CMH Council meeting and the McLean Conference have been postponed from June 24 to the week of September 23.

Few special gifts have gone so quickly into use as the $400 sent by the Woman's Auxiliary in East Carolina for air-conditioning the operating and delivery rooms in St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai. The humidity and intense heat of a Shanghai summer make hospital work desperately trying, both for patients and staff.

Every parish and mission in the Diocese of North China, except one, has contributed to a gift of nearly $2,000 sent to the Diocese of West China for the relief of people left homeless and helpless by the communists. The Diocese of Shanghai and probably others by now have sent similar gifts.

Deaconess Hutton Resumes Work at Mission.

It is a source of gratification to all of the friends of Deaconess Hutton that she is so far recovered from her recent automobile accident as to be able to resume her work in the Mission of St. George, Pine Grove Hollow. She writes as follows to Archdeacon Neve: "I am glad to be able to write that I am now sitting up in a rolling chair and feel remarkably well. Our blessed Lord has been very good to me, and I hope and pray He will use me a Thousandfold day by day. He has given me many opportunities for service which I should not have had except for my accident.

"Miss Nelson has returned and we are in the midst of our Daily Vacation Bible School. I do wish you could see the kiddies—sixty-six of them between the ages of four and thirteen. As I write this letter they are having their recreation period. My! what a good time they are having. In their music period they are learning "The Call of Christ", "I Love My Mountain Home" and other hymns. I wish you could hear them sing. In their instruction period they are learning all about the church building and its furnishings and the Christian year. My older girls (12 and 13 years of age) are making dresses for themselves as their handwork. They are so proud of being able to make a dress. A friend of mine sent the material.

"I enjoyed hearing of your trips to Blackwell's Hollow and Simmons' Gap and know how happy the people were to have you. I hope during the summer you will be able to come to us.

"Faithfully yours,
Mary Sandys Hutton.

Junior Woman's Auxiliary, Shrine Mont.

Fortunate indeed were the members of the Junior Woman's Auxiliary who attended the Provincial Conference at Shrine Mont, from June 10-16. This quiet, restful spot, with its invigorating air, is the perfect setting for any church conference.

Inspirational and interesting classes were held each morning and enthusiastically attended. A splendid faculty was in charge. Miss Sallie C. Deane, Provincial Chairman, introduced the faculty and their subjects as follows:

School of Prayer—Rev. S. Thorne Sparkman, Baltimore, Md.

Teaching Missions in the Home—Miss Rowena Brown, Wilmington, Del.

Mission Study, "Latin America"—Mrs. A. M. Chapman, New York, N. Y.

Altar Guild—Mrs. S. W. Lymington, Baltimore, Md.

Beautiful morning and evening services were conducted by the Rev. John W. Gummere of Charles Town, W. Va.

Afternoons were free for varied recreations, such as swimming, hiking through beautiful mountain trails, visiting nearby caverns, or just leisurely revelling in the beauties of Shrine Mont.

One of the high-lights of this conference was a visit to the Mountain Missions at Linnwood, Rocky Bar, and Yancey. Everyone was deeply impressed with the excellent work being done at these stations, and the splendid spirit prevailing.

Because of the geniality and good-fellowship; and because Dr. and Mrs. Woodward are the perfect host and hostess in this inspirational atmosphere, all are eagerly anticipating the conference at Shrine Mont next year.

Adoption of New Order at Annual Clergy School, Orkney Springs, Va.

A strange new species has been discovered roaming the hills of Orkney; browsing and grazing in the pastures of learning and drinking deeply at the fountains of knowledge. He answers to the name of Ork, acknowledges allegiance to the order of his kind and, in theory at least, follows the bidding of the Imperial Ork himself.

It was during the sixth annual session of the Clergy School at "Shrine Mont", Orkney Springs, Va., that the Orks came into being as an organization and began to display their peculiar characteristics. They adopted the name of the Order of Orks of Orkney and placed themselves more or less under the guidance and direction of the following duly chosen officers: Imperial Ork, the Rev. Dr. E. R. Carter, who also acted as dean of the conference; Procuratorial Ork, the Rev. Robert C. Masterton; Scribal (or Scribble) Ork, the Rev. Robert W. Lewis, and Fiduciary Ork, the Rev. B. B. Comer Lile.

All other members are Orks of the common garden variety. But there are degrees of Orkhood—the Metropolitans, or those who have attended one year; the Orchimandrites, two-year men, and Patriorchs, having three or more years to their credit.

Neither are the Orks alone in their gregariousness. They are ably and graciously aided and abetted by an auxiliary of the women who followed the course with interest. This group, known as the Superior Order of Orchids of Orkney, is officered by Mrs. E. L. Woodward, Major Jaqueline in the Pulpit; Mrs. William H. Jeffereys, Junior Jaqueline; Mrs. P. M. Chichester, Lady Slipper (Secretary), and Mrs. Lucien Carr, Jr., Pitcher Plant or Fly-Trap (Treasurer).

The Orks and Orchids, formed in part to promote fellowship and fun at the conferences, have their serious side as well. Of prime importance is their pledge to assist in the betterment and advancement of the annual clergy conference, placing themselves at the command of the director, the Rev. Dr. E. L. Woodward, and pledging their continued support of the work.

The current session of the school (July 1 to 12), attended by twenty-eight clergymen from the Dioceses of Washington, Maryland, Harrisburg, Easton, Bethlehem, Rochester, Los Angeles, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Virginia, Southern and Southwestern Virginia, developed three interesting courses of lectures that worked out naturally and spontaneously into a complementary whole.

The Rev. Dr. Charles B. Hedrick of Berkeley Divinity School, gave a full introduction to Form Criticism, especially in its relation to the Life of Christ. The Rev. Dr. Charles W. Lowry, Jr, of Virginia Seminary, did the same thing with regard to recent and contemporary theologians. And Dr. William H. Jeffereys of Philadelphia opened up to his hearers the Living Way, or Christian Mysticism.

The Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Virginia, lectured on "Christian Ethics and The World Today".

Parkin of Redding, Charles Tuttle of Colusa, Jules Gerhardt of Chico, Herndon C. Ray of Woodland, C. A. Worden of Yuba City (Marysville), Russell Foote of Ukiah, C. Ferry Hatch of Vallejo, Merrill S. Clayton of Petaluma, Charles Johnston of Willows, Arthur E. Walker of Corning. There will be a well-balanced program including information, inspiration and recreation, with the opportunity of conferring with the Bishop regarding plans for the welfare of our Diocese. Among other things will be the consideration of a plan for more effective work among the men of the diocese.—The Sacramento Missionary.

Four days' mail, for July to 11, in the finance department of the National Council provided a number of items which make good reading for friends of the Church's missionary work. The letters also show that people have been reading Church papers.

For new readers it should perhaps be repeated that the "Emergency Schedule" is the bare time-marking budget for 1935. The "Challenge' is the additional sum needed to bring the 1935 budget up to the amount approved by General Convention. The Challenge would restore some of the cuts wihch are now almost breaking the backs and the hearts of missionaries.

Here are a few items from the four days' mail, in addition to receipts for the Emergency Schedule:

Some of the communications are brief. A check for $10 is enclosed with a sheet of writing paper on which is written: "Domestic missions, $5; Foreign missions, $5." Another slip of paper, with a check for $250, says: "For missions." A check for $25 is "For missions, for Bishop Rowe, to help replace cuts."

A check "For work among Indians", comes from the offering at Southern Virginia's annual pilgrimage to the Church shrine at Jamestown, Va.

A federal judge whose name is well-known sends $25, "the third quarter of my subscription for the year 1935."

"Part of my pledge was $2 weekly for the red side of the envelope. I enclose check for the first half of the year," writes another church member, and, "I send the Christmas present received from my sister," writes another.

A layman who hopes to secure $5,000 for the Council's funds sends $1,500 of that amount and a check for work in India.

From a university chaplain's office comes $16 for the Student Lenten Offering, designated for Dr. Francis Wei of Central China College.

"I was once one of Dean Hudson Stuck's parishioners in Dallas," writes a friend, sending a check for the Hudson Stuck Hospital at Fort Yukon, Alaska. And another writer, designating a check for $50 for one of the missionary bishops, says, "I wish he knew my years long honor of him and my aching sympathy with him now. Why do not the many with summer vacations, numerous amusements and cars come to his aid? I have none of these, but hope many will send him large sums."

"I promised myself if this little check for $1.50 came," says another donor, "that I would senld it to you and ask you please use it to help pay someone who is helping teach those who know not of our Lord and Saviour that He is their Saviour, too. I expect it will help most a native teacher in China or Africa, but you will know about that." This letter also encloses a stamp for a check tax if needed.

With $10 for the Challenge a note from West Virginia says, "We are just a small band of ten ladies, but we manage to keep our guild going."

A check for $200 comes from a women in California who says, "Having contributed to the Emergency Schedule through parish and diocese, I send this check to be used for the Challenge, hoping that enough other people do the same and restore the cuts."

The Provincial Conference of New England at Concord, N. H., designates its Sunday offering to the Challenge, for Bishop Roberts' work in South Dakota.

When the Rev. Dr. Reinheimer recently visited the little mission at San Martin in Mexico, they insisted that the offering at his service be sent for the Challenge and the check is now received.

A simple little note on plain paper says, "Here is a check to help meet the Challenge. It does seem too dreadful that the work should go backward, because people are not interested." That check is for $3,000.

The Good Friday Offering received in these four days nine July checks from diocesan offices and one from a Negro parish in Georgia. Someone also sends, through Dr. Lau's office, a gift for the American Christian Committee for German refugees, whose headquarters are at 289 Fourth Avenue.

Several United Thank Offering diocesan treasurers recently sent their semi-annual gatherings. One of these includes several hundred dollars from a Churchman who has made numerous other gifts in the past. This one is in memory of his wife who worked many years in the Woman's Auxiliary. A Southern diocese reports its spring U. T. O. as several hundred dollars larger than in the spring of 1934, and another, in the far West, reports $150 more than at this time last year, "a healthy increase and one which I hope will hold for the remainder of the three-year period." A treasurer writes from Vermont, "The sudden death of our beloved Bishop is such a loss to the missionary work in our diocese that the U. T. O. may suffer unless the women will make a thank offering for his ten years of leadership."

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman D. D. Bishop.

Newcomers Invited to Washington Churches.

The Committee on Religious Life in the Nation's Capital is anxious to get in touch with all newcomers to Washington and requests that those who have friends or connections who are making their home in the national capital notify the committee as to their address and church preference. Canon Anson Phelps Stokes, of the Episcopal Cathedral staff, is secretary of the committee. It is suggested that Episcopalians notify the Bishop's chaplain, Canon Raymond Wolven, Cathedral Close, Mount St. Alban, Washington. This committee represents Protestants, Catholics and Jews, and the members are desirous of obtaining the names of all newcomers to Washington, in order that they may be called upon and induced to affiliate with the churches of their own personal choice.

Ministers to All.

The Rev. Robert L. Lewis, formerly of the Cathedral staff, now rector of St. Luke's Church, Bladensburg, Md., a suburb of Washington, delivered the commencement sermon at State Teachers' College, Fredericksburg, Va., before a congregation of about 1,200 people. Since Mr. Lewis took charge of St. Luke's Church, this parish has increased greatly in numbers and influence. Mr. Lewis ministers to people of three or four different faiths, including Catholics and Jews, as St. Luke's is the only church in the community.

SOMETHING UNUSUAL.

Episcopalians Win Over Baptists and Methodists.

The Rev. Woolsey E. Couch of College Park (suburb of Atlanta), announces that his soft ball or diamond ball team from St. John's Episcopal Church, has won by an interesting score over the Baptist and Methodist teams. In league standing the Episcopal team occupies second place. College Park has a fine new park with a lighted athletic field for night games. The Church League plays every Tuesday and Thursday evening during the summer. Large crowds attend the games, which are proving to be very beneficial to the business men and others who have no opportunity for recreation except in the evening. Mr. Walter Green is the manager of the Episcopal team. The Rev. Mr. Couch conducts a Junior camp for boys at Toccoa Falls, Georgia, from July 14 to July 28.

Diocese Plans Extension of Missionary Work.

A committee composed of Canon W. S. Turner, rector of the Church of Our Saviour. Mr. G. A. Bland, member of the Cathedral Board of Trustees and Mrs. Stephen B. Ives, Diocesan Secretary of the Church Periodical Club, on behalf of the Executive Board of the Diocese, visited the Missions in North East Georgia. They visited Grace Church, Gainesville; Grace, Clarksville; Calvary, Mount Airy; St. James, Tallulah Falls, and St. Matthias, Toccoa.

The Executive Board is sending various committees to visit all the Missions of the diocese for the purpose of revaluating the missionary work. Parochial, financial and historical records are placed before the committees and open discussions of extension work are held with the members of the parishes.

Annual Barbecue Held at Historic Home.

The Church of the Ascension, Cartersville, Ga., held its annual barbecue on Thursday, July 11, at the historic old Malvern Manor, on Etawah River. This house, together with the older "Etawah Cliffs" house were built over a hundred years ago by the Stiles family. They were used by the invading Northern army during the War Between the States, and many of the valuable law books were used by the soldiers to form stepping-stones to the river. People from all over the diocese travel to this annual affair for the delicious barbecue, which is always served under the sheltering oak trees, by Mr. Robert Stiles, to renew acquaintances and to see the antique furnishings of the house, some of which were brought from Austria, by the first W. H. Stiles, who was the United States Ambassador there, and from England. The Rev. Charles Schilling is rector of the Church of the Ascension.

Visitor From Rome Participates in Conference.

The Rev. H. Fields Saumenig of St. Peter's, Rome, will take part in the Conference at Kanuga Lake from July 15 through the 27. His subject will be "The Preacher With God, With Himself, With His People". He will discuss the spiritual life of the preacher; methods of study; preparation of sermons; sermons and instructions for children; the authority of the preacher; the pulpit in its relations to present-day conditions; the purpose of the sermon; the sermon and the ideal of the church; and many other interesting phases of this subject. The Rev. Mr. Saumenig is a learned and deep thinker, and an excellent preacher.

Bright Prospects for "The Diocesan Challenge".

The first issue "The Diocesan Challenge", the official organ of the Young People's Service League, will be in the mails by July 15. The different Leagues of the diocese will publish each issue, and a prize will be given at the end of the year for the best paper. Robert M. Bandy, Diocesan President of the Y. P. S. L., will be Editor-in-Chief, and the President of the League responsible for the paper each month will be the Editor. This month Fred Kyle, Jr., president of the Cathedral of St. Philip Y. P. S. L., is in charge of the Challenge, with George Noble Wagnon as assistant.

Complete Sermons.

Dr. G. W. Gasque, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, has completed his series of ten sermons on the "Apostles' Creed". This series has been one of the most attractive and best attended group of sermons ever preached by Dr. Gasque.

He will leave soon with his family for Miami Beach, Fla., to spend the month of August.

Discovered—A Cooling System.

At a meeting of the Junior Vestry of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, the question of a cooling system for the church arose. The young men appointed a committee to investigate the cost of such a project. Much to their delight they found a cooling system already installed, but never used. It seems that when the heating plant was built, a cooling system was installed at the same time, but the Building Committee was never informed of it. So now those attending St. Luke's enjoy the cool air-conditioned building, as well as Mr. Walker's sermons and Mr. Hugh Hodgson's splendid music.

The Sewanee Summer Training School.

The Program for the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the Sewanee Summer Training School offers an attractive presentation of courses in the three divisions. Three representatives of the National Council, Dr. John W. Wood, the Rev. Vernon McMaster, and Mrs. D. D. Taber, will all be on the faculty of the Adult Division, which also offers courses by Bishop Green and Bishop Mikell, Dr. R. J. Colbert of the University of Wisconsin, Miss Winifred Kirkland, well-known authoress, and other educational leaders of the Church. The Clergy School offers courses by Dean deOvies of Atlanta, Dr. R. J. Colbert of the University of Wisconsin, the Rev. E. R. Dandridge of Christ Church, Nashville, and Rev. V. L. Dowdell, Ph. D.

Dr. Harcourt A. Morgan of the Tennessee Valley Authority will deliver an address on "Southern Economic Hopes" on July 31.

A number of special features for the week-end, August 2-4, have been arranged as follows: Daughters of the King Day, August 2, directed by Mrs. W. J. Loaring-Clark, National President of the Daughters of the King; Woman's Auxiliary Day, on August 3, directed by Mrs. Fred Ramsey, President of the Tennessee Woman's Auxiliary; and the Laymen's Day on August 4. Special features of the Laymen's Day will be the Laymen's Conference in the morning, led by Judge Arthur Crownover of Nashville, mid-day service with the united choirs of the Sewanee Mission Field and sermon by Bishop Gailor. In the afternoon a pilgrimage will be conducted for the week-end guests and at night the sermon will be preached by the Rev. Vernon McMaster of the National Council.

The Young People's Division offers courses with the general theme, "For Me to Live is Christ", and this thought is carried out in the lectures and in the program.

The general theme of the Sewanee Summer Training School for this year is the "Sewanee Vision", the ideal, and the inspiration of the "Sewanee Movement".

In connection with the regular program of the School will be held a number of other important meetings. The Board of Diocesan Chairmen and Directors of Religious Education of the Province of Sewanee will hold its first

FAITH.

Grace French Smith.

The disciples were angered as Jesus slept on Galilee,
While their boat was rocking and thunder shook the plunging sea,
The waves are pounding today, and the ocean of sin is deep,
The world is tossed in storm and God appears asleep,
He allowed ten thousand sturdy boys to be butchered in France,
And never opened His eyes as if He were held in a trance
Asleep in England and India—millions are unemployed,
No work to do and all opportunity quite destroyed;
Asleep in America, where the cities are victoms of thug,
Or bandit official in high position who steals with a shrug.

The thunder is loud and confusing and lightenings are multiform,
But listen—the voice of hope is speaking above the storm,
"How is it you have no faith?" "A thousand years is a day—"
Through the ages Christ is carving love out of broken clay,
When Jesus died it seemed His work was all in vain,
For there the Saviour hung on a cross in disgrace and pain;
When Charazin, Bethsalda turned away and Capernaum, too,
When even Nazareth slammed the door in His face and withdrew,
And Jerusalem turned her back—a hero of faith—He said,
"Rejoice, for I have overcome the world and the dead."
The thunder is loud and confusing and lightenings are multiform,
But listen—the voice of hope is speaking above the storm!

A Time to Stand Still.

There come times in the lives of all Christians when all that they do, all that they should do, is to stand still. In these days of unceasing activity—these days that seethe and steam with movements, so that at every turn there seems to be something else to do or somewhere else to go—we ought frequently to "stand still".

In the early days of Israel when God's people were chased by Pharaoh and faced by the hardships and dangers of the wilderness, Moses said to them, "Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord". Later, God said to His people, through the Psalmist, "Be still, and know that I am God". Isaiah exhorted the people to rest, saying, "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength".

How often we become nervous and impatient. We forget that our work is His work, and that He is to do it through us. We must leave it very largely in His hands; we are simply to be the instruments. "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass".

In our devotional reading recently we came across Spurgeon's exhortation concerning the words, "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord". We will not give in full its treatment, but quote most briefly: "These words contain God's command to the believer when he is reduced to great straits and brought into extraordinary difficulties. He cannot retreat; he cannot go forward; he is shut upon the right hand and on the left. What is he now to do? The Master's word to him is 'stand still'.

"Despair whipers, 'Lie down and die; give it all up'. Cowardice says, 'Retreat; go back to the worldling's way of action; you cannot play the Christian part; it is too difficult. Relinquish your principles'. Precipitancy cries, 'Do something; stir yourself; to stand still and wait is sheer idleness'. Presumption boasts, 'if the sea be before you, march into it, and expect a miracle'. But Faith listens neither to Despair, nor to Cowardice, nor to Precipitancy, nor to Presumption, but it hears God say, 'Stand still', and immovable as a rock it stands.

" 'Stand still'—keep the posture of an upright man, ready for action, expecting further orders, cheerfully and patiently awaiting the directing voice; and it will not be long ere God shall say to you as distinctly as Moses said it to the people of Israel, 'Go forward'."

How often we are tempted to take the battle into our own hands, and hurry the Lord with His plans. Ours is to wait in the spirit of praise on His plans, and to obey them as they come from Him. O, for such a faith and such a spirit of obedience as this!

Teach Children to Love the Beautiful.

All children should be taught the love of good music, good literature and flowers. Be the home "ever so humble", there is no execuse for not making it attractive with growing plants, books and magazines, and music in some form.

There is little that is more enjoyable and beneficial in the home than music. A busy mother will not always have time to play for her children on a musical instrument and the radio program, even if available, will often be inappropriate, but most mothers can sing with the little ones and teach them songs that they will love. Even very young children quickly learn to distinguish one song from another, and show their preference and appreciation. If a mother forms the habit of singing as she works, she will find that her many tasks will be performed more easily and quickly. She will be more relaxed and will not tire so soon and, oh, how the children love a singing, smiling mother!

Books and magazines should very early be placed in the wee ones' hands, but under kindly watchfulness at first. Children must be taught how to use books and shown that they give the most pleasure when treated with gentle consideration.

Growing plants do much to make the home attractive. Allow the little ones to have some of their very own, both indoors and out, if possible, and watch their pride and pleasure in caring for them. Small cans may be used for their indoor plants so that the busy little hands may carry them from one sunny spot to another. Even if a plant should in the end come to grief, reverence as well as a love for the beautiful is being learned and will not be destroyed. Talk to the boys and girls about the various flowers and plants—their habits and needs—speaking their names, both common and botanical. Take the children for walks whenever possible and teach them to observe beautiful cloud formations, sunshine, birds, trees, mosses, flowing waters and all other of God's wondrous works. Encouraging them to comment on objects of loveliness leads them to adventure farther and farther into the elusive realm of the beautiful.

One way to help little children to become alert in observing the beautiful is to keep a small book dedicated to this purpose. At the bedtime hour you can say to Joan, "What did you see today that was beautiful?" and the response may be, "A little bluebird, mother". "Where was it and what was it doing?" "First it was on the ground and had a string in its mouth. Then it flew to a tree. Why did it want the string, mother?" To the children, the knowledge that their discoveries are worthy of being recorded, is an added spur to them to be observing and to give expression to their thoughts. And boys and girls who learn to love and to have reverence for all that is beautiful and good will seldom deliberately go far wrong.—Reformed Church Messenger.

Filing the Water Hole.

Back of the spillway below LaPlace, Louisiana, a highway bridge was proposed, and a ditch forty feet deep and about three hundred feet wide had been dredge from the spillway back to the lake. A section of this ditch had to be filled with dirt to support the north approach of the bridge.

Trainload after trainload of dirt was dumped into the hole, only to make a big splash and disappear below the surface of the water. Ten thousand carloads, then twenty thousand carloads were dumped into the hole. Engineers would take their measurements and chart the progress that was being made. But so far as could be told from the surface of the water no good was being accomplished at all. Thirty thousand carloads, and then forty thousand carloads of dirt were dumped in the hole; still there were no visible results.

More than fifty thousand carloads had been dumped into the water when the dirt finally rose to the surface. Engineers, contractors and workmen were rejoicing at the sight of the dirt when it settled again below the surface and disappeared. Twice more it rose above the surface only to settle twice more out of sight. Then a fourth time it appeared, and the engineers announced that it would settle no more. More trainloads of dirt will be dumped upon the pile until an embankment eight feet high will be built. The pavement will be laid over the embankment, and automobiles on the air line from New Orleans to Baton Rouge will speed over the bridge and connecting embankment without thought of the thousands of cars of dirt used in filling the water hole.

The prayers, the work, the sermons and the continual efforts of Christian workers are surely being heaped together in an effort to fill the gaping hole of ignorance and superstition in our mission fields around the world. These workers will continue their praying and preaching until their fields shall become spiritual highways over which many peoples will travel their course of life with the same joy of salvation that is the blessing of every Christian center. Each of these, before some missionary came that way, was just as much a hole of darkness, ignorance and superstition as those fields where our missionaries now labor.—Baptist Standard.

Lowliness and Tapestry.

Behind the word which is translated "lowiness", is our word "tapestry", and I think I shall not be far away from the Apostle's mind when I say that he counsels us to lay our life down like a soft tapestry carpet—in kindly thoughts and gracious sympathies and helpful services, in order that the weary, bruised feet of other people may find ease and comfort on the road. It is the blessed privilege of Christians to lay a soft surface on the roads by spreading over them the graciousness of tender compassions, so stooping that other pilgrims can "walk over us" and so forget the hardships of the way.—Dr. J. H. Jowett.

Thou Hast Set My Feet in a Large Room.

God did not put man here and build a fence around him. He made him as free as a bird that wings its certain flight through the hospitable air. Only physically is he limited. Eddington's and Einstein's mind flash like meteors, and become intimate with the distant stars. Dante was the voice of ten silent centuries. A man's spirit is an immortal thing, hedged about by Divinity and all tangled up with glory. There are no confines to his soul, which soars and sings amid the war of elements, the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds. Paul and Bunyan in prison projected themselves into things present and things to come, and could tell us only a portion of the unspeakable things they saw and heard. The little man stays in his little shell of personality. But there is really no reason why a man should be little, for God set his feet in a large room.—Southern Christian Advocate.

BLESSINGS ON OUR WOODS.

Blest be our woods of hemlock, maple, pine,
Balsam and birch, dear Lord, our woods and Thine!
Blest be their bubbling springs, their rippled lakes,
Their ponds and every laughing brook that makes
Rainbows and foam and crystal homes for trout;
Blest be the trails that wander in and out
Among our gray boulders drowned in soft green seas
Of velvet moss! Oh, blest be all of these!
Blest be the woods and they that dwell therein,
The scolding squirrel and his gentler kin,
The friendly chipmunk and the timid hare;
Blest be the graceful mink, the shambling bear,
The beaver on his dam, the drumming grouse,
The hawk that loves the sky, the white-foot mouse,
The antlered buck that paces, proud and tall,
With does and dappled fawn, blest be they all!
Lord, bless the woods for perfect loveliness.
For balm that heals the soul in care and stress!
Keep them forever fragrant, cool and sweet!
From thunderbolt and flame, from gale and sleet,
From avalanche, from torrent, drought and blight,
From all that is unclean, from ruthless might
That gives to desolation valley, glen
And mountainside, God bless our woods! Amen!

—Arthur Guiteman in N. Y. Herald-Tribune.

The only decent way to get rid of one's personal enemies is to—not kill them with knife or bullet or social frost, but to burn 'em up. But only one kind of fire will do it, the fire of love, God's own love, that burns you out while it burns him up; all the bitterness in your heart goes out, melting into tenderness, and all the enmity in him goes up, consumed in regret and sorrow.—S. D. Gordon.

The causes of God are never lost causes. The great moral ventures you make, the holy dreams you keep before you, the high aspirations to which you hold, the unrequited love you endure, the costly struggles against unfair odds, are never in vain. There is something about goodness and love so colossal and stubborn that the world cannot resist them.—Dr. J. R. Sizoo.

FOR THE CHILDREN

FRIENDS OF MINE.

Good morning, Brother Sunshine,
Good morning, Sister Song,
I beg your humble pardon
If you've waited very long.
I thought I heard you rapping,
To shut you out were sin.
My heart is standing open,
Won't you walk right in?

Good morning, Brother Gladness,
Good morning, Sister Smile,
They told me you were coming,
So I waited on a while.
I'm lonesome here without you,
A weary while it's been,
My heart is standing open,
Won't you walk right in?

Good morning, Brother Kindness,
Good morning, Sister Cheer,
I heard you were out calling,
So I waited for you here,
Some way, I keep forgetting,
I have to toil or spin,
When you are my companions,
Won't you walk right in?

Those Rectory Children.

Chapter XXVII.

Remembering.

M. L. G.

David came running up the path from the big gate, beating his mittened hands together, his cheeks as red as the scarf flying back from his throat. Uncle Danger called to him from the direction of the woodshed.

"Hey, Marse David, come he'p me git in dishere wood, please, suh!"

"All right, Uncle Danger!" David did not pause, but ran around the house. "What you think, it's goin' to be cold enough for skating, Mr. Price says, and not Christmas yet!"

"Yassuh, I knowed hit gwine be cold winter, 'way yander in Septembuh. Squir'ls busy, and eve'y critter whar wear fur gittin' hisself extra heavy coat."

"Here, you load me up, Uncle Danger. I can take three big fellows or five smaller."

"Las' winter hit were two an' four. You sho' is growed, Marse David. An' ol' Danger, seem like dey's less of him. Pret' soon t'won't be but 'ol' coat an' nuttin' inside 'tall."

"Don' you b'lieve no sech prophecyin'!" cried Aunt Cindy, who had been out feeding the chickens, and stood with her hands on her hips, the bowl in one hand, spoon in the other. "He! Uncle Danger he like dat ol' rooster I jes' been feedin'. He lean and he scrabbly, but he eat de mostes' in de lot, seem like!" She went in ahead of them, chuckling at Uncle Danger's discomfiture at the comparison.

Up to mother's room went David, and Kent, answering his shout, ran to open the door.

"I'm goin' to make three trips, that'll give us enough for a big fire," David said, putting down his load. Uncle Danger following, still mumbling.

"Dat Cindy better quit huh inperence ter ol' man—she-bear'll git huh lessen she look sharp."

Winnie, seated at the window, put up her drawing-pad with a sigh.

"I just can't see any more. I'm going to get up earlier tomorrow. I do want this, for Miss Sarah to see. I'm going to give it to her at cedar-picking."

"We got a big load of greens, Winnie," said David, putting a log on the fire after bring his three loads. "I love Christmas anyway! I feel it in my bones already. And we did have fun, with the Trent ladies' big hay-wagon just full of cedar, and all the boys on top, and Uncle 'Lijah driving."

"I feel C'wismus in my bones, too," said Kent, turning from the block-house he and Philip were building. "I feel New Year, too, and I think I feel even spwing."

"Then you mus' be a elephum, Kent, to have such big bones," Philip put in solemnly.

"D'you know what I remembered, David," said Winnie, pulling mother's low chair up to the fire, "when you an' Uncle Danger came in just now with wood? I remembered one day last winter, and mother and father were at Auxiliary, as they are today, and Claire and I were watchin' for them—it was just before Christmas, too."

"I know." David answered. "Didn't Uncle Danger come in dragging the big basket full of wood? An' we ran to help—"

"We played soljers dat day, wif logs," Kent added, coming to learn against Winnie's chair. "Didn't we, Phil?"

"I don' 'member so much long ago. I has to 'member too much lessons, an' to be a good boy, too, I can't 'member dose more sings." Philip, having finished the block-house, drew out a block at the corner and the house fell with a clatter.

"Gracious me, Phil, you sound like the harrycane Uncle Danger talks about! But, David, I do remember that night, 'cause mother told me I could go to cedar-pickin', and we knew that Claire had to go soon to the hospital. Oh!" Winnie gave a little shiver, though the fire was blazing brightly, "I wouldn't have it that day for anything to live through that time when we didn't know 'bout Claire, whether she'd get well—"

"Yes, and my bwoked arm!"

"And Mrs. Innis!" David broke into a laugh. "Her soda-crackers, and the mouse—why, Winnie, she had a bit of cake or a lump of sugar on every shelf of her closet!"

"She was funny," Winnie smiled in turn. "But she means well, David. Did you know she and Miss Parmenter told father, when he said he was goin' to stay here—they told him they want to pay for a year at the Academy, for you, when Dr. Blackburn thinks you should go. Mrs. Innis told father she felt exactly like a mother to us—I heard her."

"Did they?" asked David eagerly. "I do want to go to the Academy 'cause father went, and Mr. Craig, and all the ones I like most."

"Don't you like me?" asked Philip. "I didn't go."

"I mean big men, goosie. Oh, there's the lantern, Frank's turning in the gate. I'll go down and put him in." David was getting back into the coat he had taken off. "Don't come, boys, it's too cold without coats."

"Then tell muvver please come up, such a nice, big fire is here," begged Kent.

"An' tell farver such a nice, big fire is here, too," Philip called after him.

Father and mother accepted the invitation promptly, and soon they were sitting by the nice, big fire, each holding a small boy.

"We miss our Claire," said father in his quiet voice. "How about it, Winnie? Don't you miss her?"

"O father, yes, but not like last winter! We were jus' remembering one day, when you and mother came in like this, an 'told us Claire was goin' to the hospital."

"I remember perfectly," mother said. "We had met Dr. Carrington on the road—it's just about a year ago. Oh, I can't be thankful enough, when I think of her so well, the darling!"

"An' comin' home for Chris'mus!" Kent exclaimed, hugging her.

"Who's coming home—Claire?" asked David entering.

"Yes, honey, the letter came while you were out getting cedar. We're all to go to the Mission Christmas tree, on Christmas Eve, and then Aunt Mollie and Claire will come back."

Winnie gave a little chuckle.

"What's funny?" asked Philip.

"Oh, nothin'. I was thinkin' of that cedar-pickin' night. Miss Parmenter did scare me so. I pulled off my hood and I heard her say so loud—'those Rectory children'—and some more 'bout it was different when she was a child. I never would have thought I'd like her—but I do!"

"We've had lots of chances in the year since that night," said father, "to know the good in people. How many good doctors for Claire—how many to help us out here"—

"And Dr. Blackburn, believing me—mostly," David said. "And Pat and, oh, Mr. Craig!"

"And Miss Alice and Miss Sarah giving me my precious lessons!" That was Winnie.

"An' Aunt Mollie to help my bwoked arm," Kent added, "an' Tom Bwown."

"Yes, I like Tom Bwown bes' of all dose people," said Philip, "'cause who else can cawwy two whole boys on one back to school?"

Uncle Danger put his head in at the door, his good humor restored.

"Supper ready! Supper ready! Cindy got pop-overs an' chicken-pie. An' Mrs. Pace she sont word she gwine sen' over a bar'l pippins in de mawnin'."

"When we think it over," said father, meeting mother's eyes and smiling as he rose to answer Uncle Danger's summons. "I believe we all agree that no better place can be found than this old parish in these old hills as a home for 'those Rectory children'!"

Helen's Dress.

Adele Spies Cooper.

Once when Helen's father went to the city he brought back to his little daughter, Helen, some beautiful material for a dress. It was a soft, white silky material and scattered all over it were tiny butterflies of all colors.

Mrs. Hill made the dress up for her little girl, and Helen thought it was the prettiest she had ever seen. And, indeed, it was a lovely little frock, and when Helen wore it she looked, with her golden hair and pink cheeks, like another dainty butterfly.

A few weeks after her mother made the dress for her, they went to visit Helen's Aunt Bess and Uncle Ned. Now, Aunt Bess and Uncle Ned had no children of their own, so they were always glad when Helen came to make them a visit.

The first Sunday morning she was there, Helen came down to breakfast wearing her butterfly dress, as she sometimes called it.

"What a lovely dress," said Aunt Bess smiling at her.

"And what a lovely little girl it is inside of it," added Uncle Ned pinching Helen's cheek gently. "Arent't you afraid all your pretty butterflies may fly away some day and leave you?" he asked.

This made Helen laugh. Uncle Ned was always saying something that made her laugh.

As soon as breakfast was over it was time to go to Sunday school. The church was just a few blocks away, and as Helen had been there before she knew just where to go.

She was walking slowly along when a voice said from behind her:

"Oh, what a beautiful little dress!"

Turning quickly, Helen saw a little girl about her own age, who had on a blue dress that was very pretty, but not nearly so pretty as her own.

"My name is Ruth Baker," said the little girl walking on beside Helen. "I am going to Sunday school. What is your name?"

Helen told her and added that she was visiting her Aunt Bess and Uncle Ned, and was also on her way to Sunday school.

"I'm glad you like my dress," she said, glancing proudly down at her dainty frock. "It's my favorite dress."

"It would be my favorite dress, too, if I owned it," replied the other little girl.

"I think your dress is pretty, too," Helen said generously. "I like blue. Is this your favorite dress?"

The little girl smiled.

"Yes, it's my favorite dress," she said, "because it's the only best dress I have."

Helen stared at her without saying anything. Just think of having only one best dress! Why she—Helen—had more best dresses than she could ever wear out. She would outgrow them, and then her mother would give them to some other child who needed them.

That day at dinner Helen told Aunt Bess, Uncle Ned and her mother about Ruth Baker.

"Yes, I know the Bakers," Aunt Bess said. "They are poor, but very nice people. Ruth's father is dead and her mother supports herself and Ruth and the baby brother by taking in sewing. Ruth will make a nice little friend for you to play with while you are here."

Ruth was a nice playmate, and she and Helen had many good times together. Both were sorry when the time came for Helen to go home.

The day before they were to leave, Helen said to her mother:

"Mother, I would like to give Ruth something before I leave. May I give her one of my dresses—one of my very best ones? She has only one."

"Why, yes, dear," her mother said, smiling at her litle daughter. "I am glad you thought of it. Select anyone you wish."

Helen ran up to their room and looked in the closet at all her dresses. How many she had and how pretty all of them were! She hardly knew which one to give away.

Finally, she took down a yellow organdy and spread it out on the bed.

"I'll give Ruth this one,' she said aloud. She started to leave the room and turned back.

"I could give her the green," she said, "she might like it better than the yellow, or maybe I'd better give her the pink. Oh, dear! how hard it is to decide when you have so many dresses you don't care which one you give away."

She went back over to the closet and took down the dainty butterfly dress. She held it in her hands and looked at it for several minutes, then she laid it on the bed and hung the yellow organdy back up in the closet.

"Have you decided on the dress you want to give Ruth?" her mother asked when she went downstairs.

Helen's face was very sober.

"Im going to give her my butterfly dress," she answered.

Her mother looked surprised.

"Your butterfly dress!" she said. "Why that's your favorite dress."

"I know it," said Helen, winking both eyes because she felt like crying. "I didn't feel bad or happy either about giving away my other dresses, but as soon as I decided to give away my butterfly dress something inside of me began to hurt and to feel happy, too. It's funny, isn't it, mother?"

It is funny. Do you know why?

When Pippa Passed By.

There was once a beautiful old city lying between green hills, with a wide, peaceful river flowing through it. There were great mills built on the river banks, so the water power could turn the wheels round and make the machinery run. In the mills were made many bolts of silk goods and hundreds of spools of silk thread every day.

Thousands of people earned their bread and butter by working at the mills. And in those far-gone days, every child who was old enough worked at the factories.

Little Pippa was one of the child workers who trudged off to a great mill every morning and worked steadily all day. She loved to see the pretty bright colors, and to guide the shiny threads carefully on the shuttle.

Every day Pippa worked at the mills—that is, every day but Sunday, and one other long, beautiful day of the year that she called her own. On the Sabbath she loved to slip quietly into the beautifully lighted church and listen to the prayer and hear the organ play; that she called God's day. But this other day—it was Pippa's very own.

This wonderful day always came in the summer time when the hours were long and bright. The flowers smiled up at her sweetly and shyly then, and the birds seemed to sing their lovely songs all for her.

One warm summer evening Pippa came home from the mills, tired but happy. Tomorrow was to be her day! She would spend it out in the cool, leafy, flowery woods, as she always did. Before she went to bed she knelt down and prayed softly, "Dear God, tomorrow is my day. Please make it bright and beautiful".

She was awake early in the morning. Slipping out of bed she ran to the window, threw it open wide, and took one long, deep breath. She had never seen such glorious sunshine before. She could not keep from singing the gladdest little song she knew:

The year's at the spring;
And day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven;
The hillside's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn;
God's in His Heaven—
All's right with the world.

Little Pippa was soon dressed and eating her simple breakfast. And then, as gay and eager as a bluebird, she was off for the woods, singing as she went.

As she went on her way, the happy little girl passed the cottage where a poor blind woman lived. Sad-faced and lonely, she sat on her little porch. For her the world was a dark and dreary place to live. But a smile came into her face as Pippa ran past, singing:

God's in His Heaven,
All's right with the world.

"Why, that is true," murmured the blind woman; "all is right in my world; God is in His Heaven."

The child ran on, singing blithely, and by and by she passed the house of a great artist. He painted such wonderful pictures that they seemed actually to live; but this morning he had thrown his brush down, tired and discouraged. Just then he looked up and saw a little girl flitting by, and heard her singing,

God's in His Heaven,
All's right with the world.

Suddenly the world all seemed to come right again. The artist took up his brush, and painted a lovely picture of a little barefoot maid flitting along the country road.

Then Pippa passed a man who sat alone by the roadside—worn out and discouraged. God had given him a grand and noble work to do for the good of other men; but this morning he felt that there was no use to try an longer.

Just then he looked up and saw a litle fairy flitting by, and heard a sweet little song:

God's in His Heaven,
All's right with the world.

The man lifted up his head, and looked at the child, and smiled. She passed on; and then he rose up, and went and did the work that God had given him to do.

Pippa reached the woods at last, and what a wonderful day she had, to be sure. How the river sparkled, and how the birds sang!

It was a tired but happy little girl that went home that night with her apron full of flowers. She looked up at God's starry sky and said softly, 'Dear God, I couldn't find anybody to help today, so I just helped myself to be good and happy. You understand, dear God in your Heaven."—Retold from "Pippa Passes".

THE BIRDS' CONCERT.

Last night the birds had a concert
In the russet apple tree,
I opened the window and saw them
As plainly as could be.
The orchestra was assembled
On a gently swaying bough
And kept time with a musical chime
While a cardinal showed them how.

The woodpecker beat on a big bass drum
And the wood thrush played the flute,
The goldfinch blew on the piccolo,
And the bunting strummed the lute:
They played till the stars shone one by one,
Above in the darkening dome—
And sadly flew from the apple tree
When the nighthawk called them home.

ROBIN AND THE CHICK.

A plump little robin flew down from a tree
To pick up a worm he happened to see.
A frisky young chicken came scampering by,
And gazed at the robin with wondering eye.
Said the chick: "What a queer-looking chicken is that!
Its wings are so long and its body so fat!"
While the robin remarked loud enough to be heard:
"Dear me! An exceedingly strange-looking bird!"

"Can you sing?" robin asked, and the chicken said, "No"—
But asked in turn if the robin could crow.
So the bird sought a tree, and the chicken a wall,
And each thought the other knew nothing at all.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

annual meeting on July 31 and August 1. The annual convention of the Young People's Service League of the Provi. of Sewanee will be held on August 16 and 17. Other organizations will take advantage of the opportunity for the holding of special meetings.

Data brought to attention in the last year indicates that the whole summer conference movement of the Church may have begun at Sewanee with the Summer School of Religion in 1904. At any rate, the Sewanee Summer Training School is recognized as the mother Summer Conference of the South. One of the features of the program this year will be "Mother Mountain and her Southland" on August 2, the theme of which will be the influence of the Sewanee Training School on the life and work of the Church in the South.

One of the interesting features of the Sewanee Training School is the Sewanee Exhibition, in which can be found exhibits from the dioceses of the Province and from the manifold lines of activity of Church work.

Bishop Mikell of Atlanta is director of the Clergy School with the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell of Birmingham as Associate Director. Bishop Green is Director of the Adult Division with the Rev. Moultrie Guerry, Sewanee Chaplain, as Assistant Director. The Rev. Loaring-Clark of Memphis is Director of the Young People's Division, with the Rev. Capers Satterlee of Birmingham as his Assistant Director. Miss Alma S. Hammond of 1126 Washington Avenue, New Orleans, La., is Executive Secretary of the entire school.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. Frederick F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Camp Reese.

In accordance with a resolution adopted by the Executive Council, a meeting of the Field Department of the diocese was held recently at Camp Reese, St. Simon's Island, to make plans for the Forward Movement in the Diocese. Bishop Reese presided.

A resolution was adopted to hold a retreat and conference of all the clergy of the diocese on October 8, 9, 10, at Camp Reese.

A special committee consisting of the Rev. Charles H. Lee, D. D., Frederica, St. Simon's Island; the Rev. Royal K. Tucker, Brunswick, and the Rev. John A. Wright, Augusta, is in charge of making the necessary arrangements. It is hoped to secure a leader from outside the diocese.

* * *

The Rev. Herbert Scott-Smith, vicar of St. John's Church, Bainbridge, and Holy Trinity Church, Blakely, plans to sail for England on July 19. He will probably be away until September.

Summer Church School.

St. Paul's Church School, Savannah, Ga., the Rev. Geoffrey Horsfield, rector, is meeting during the summer months once a week on Thursday instead of Sunday. Recently, in order to give the children pleasure as much as anything else, a one-cent Variety Show was put on by the pupils. The show was quite a success. Everybody had lots of fun and over $5 was cleared after expenses amounting to $6 for ice cream, etc., had been paid. It also proved that parish activities need not stop during the hot summer months.

MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. Efrain Salinas, D. D., Bishop.

From the Bishop's Journal.

February 20, 1935.

I am back from my visit to the missions in Jalisco. In writing my impressions in my journal I feel like indulging in reminiscences.

Little more than fifteen years ago instructions came to me from good Bishop Aves that it was imperatively necessary for me to move to Guadalajara to take charge of "St. Andrew's School". I just had been married. It took two days for Mrs. Salinas and myself to reach our destination, a trip which in normal times takes only fourteen hours. The revolution had upset everything, and we were fortunate enough to arrive safely at Guadalajara. I was then a deacon. When I went to take charge of the School, I found it had been closed by government orders. The head of the School had not awaited until my coming, but sent home the boys, abandoning his post on the ground that the place was unsafe. And really it was!

St. Mary the Virgin Mission, the only one we had in those days in this part of Mexico, was having a very precarious life up in a second floor room, where every Sunday four or six persons met for Holy Communion. Our congregation was composed of some ten people, half of whom were the rector's family.

Well, it was fifteen years ago. But now our work has grown enough, and I thought it would be very helpful to hold a Convocation of the clergy; therefore, plans were made to that end, and we had for the first time a Convocation of Jalisco, meeting at St. Stephen's mission in the village of San Sebastian. When I planned to have that meeting, I imagined we were going to have a small attendance; that is, the clergymen, some students from St. Andrew's School, one or two deputies from each one of the missions plus some of the church people of St. Sebastian. Some fifty people in all; but when I came to the body of the Church for the Holy Communion Service I found it packed, and when I called the Convocation to order for business I found a numerous delegation from each of the five missions we have now in Jalisco. More than 300 people attended the first Convocation of Jalisco! It was beyond my expectations.

While I was at Convocation in the Parish Hall, Mrs. Salinas was presiding over a meeting of the several branches of the Woman's Auxiliary in the church building. I was asked to say the closing prayers at the meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, and I was glad beyond measure to find ninety-five women warmly discussing vital things for the progress of the Church's work.

This Convocation of Jalisco was a success, and it was resolved that yearly Convocations be held in Jalisco. The next one will take place in Guadalajara in March, 1936.

During my visit to one of the missions I was privileged to dedicate the Church of the Holy Trinity at San Sebastianito.

What a great difference in the work I found fifteen years ago and as it is now!

Bishop of Mexico.

Official Service for the Visiting Fleet at the Cathedral.

On May 26, most of the Honolulu churches welcomed officers and men of the fleet at their services. At the Cathedral, Governor J. B. Poindexter, Rear Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, Commandant of the Fourteenth Naval District; Brigadier General Robert S. Abernethy, and other high ranking officers of the Army and Navy were present. The Navy Band from Pearl Harbor, assisted the Cathedral Parish choir in leading the music, particularly the hymn singing, which was most inspiring. The Bishop preached on the text: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Honor to the Rev. William Lucas on Memorial Day.

Approximately 3,500 members took part in the parade on Memorial Day. Leading them was Hawaii's last surviving Civil War veteran, retired priest of the Church, who received a tremendous cheer as he rode by. The aged survivor of the War Between the States rode in a special car provided by Theodore Roosevelt Camp of Spanish War Veterans.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Walter S. Bentley, General Missioner of New Dorp, Staten Island, New York City, has taken charge of the Church of the Saviour, Philadelphia, Pa., during July and August, and in September will be in charge of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Staten Island. Then he resumes his mission work for the winter. On Sunday, June 30, he preached the memorial sermon for his late brother, Rev. Albert E. Bentley, at his former parish, Grace Church, Bronx, New York City.

Mrs. Edith Purton, wife of the Rev. C. C. Purton, rector of Grace Church, Mt. Clemens, Michigan, died in St. Mary's Hospital, Detroit, on July 9, following an illness of three weeks. She had been in poor health for some time. Surviving her are her husband and a son, Kingsley Purton, of Mt. Clemens. Services were held at Grace Church, with burial in Sandwich, Ontario.

Bishop George Craig Stewart, of the Chicago Diocese, on the afternoon of Saturday, July 13, solemnized the marriage of his son, George Craig Stewart, Jr., and Miss Margaret Ruth Rothacker in the Lady Chapel of St. Luke's Pro-Cathedral. The service was attended only by members of the immediate families and was followed by a reception at the bride's home, 912 Michigan Avenue, Evanston.

The Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, of St. James' Church, Philadelphia, is to preach in Grace Church, New York, July 21 and 28 and August 4 and 11. Mr. Newton recently announced his resignation from St. James, effective November 1.

Canon Gilbert P. Symons, Diocese of Southern Ohio, will speak on the Forward Movement on Sunday, July 21, over WLW, at 9 A. M., Eastern Standard time.

A special service was held on a recent Sunday at the Advent, Louisville, to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. Harry S. Musson. A large confirmation class was presented, composed entirely of adults, and Bishop Woodcock preached a sermon in which he traced the history of Mr. Musson's long and fruitful ministry.

The Rev. Charles Feilding, of the faculty of the General Theological Seminary, New York, has accepted a call to be rector of St. Mary's Church, Staten Island, New York City. He succeeds the late Rev. F. L. Frost, who perished in the Morro Castle disaster.

The Rev. Carleton Barnwell, of Lynchburg, Va., and his wife, sailed on July 3 for a tour of the Scandinavian countries.

The Rev. James Biddle Halsey, some time rector of St. Timothy's Church, Roxborough, Pa., and before that dean of St. Mark's Cathedral, Salt Lake City, died on June 29.

The Rev. Dr. Selden Peabody Delany, who left the Anglican Church and was ordained a Roman Catholic priest, died July 5 in New York City.

Dr. Delany was rector of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin here and editor of the American Church Monthly, until 1930. He was dean of All Saints' Cathedral, Milwaukee, from 1907 to 1915.

ORDINATIONS.

Priest.

The Rev. Julius Augustus Pratt, Jr., B. A., B. D., was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. James Craik Morris, D. D., Bishop of Louisiana, on July 11, 1935, in St. Andrew's Church, New Orleans. The Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, D. D., preached, and the Rev. Matthew Brewster, D. D., presented the ordinand. Address, Houma, Louisiana.

Rev. Julius A. Pratt, Jr., was ordained priest in the Episcopal Church on July 11, 1935, in St. Andrew's Church, New Orleans. The Rt. Rev. James Craik Morris, D. D., Bishop of Louisiana, administered the rite of ordination to the sacred priesthood, the other priests present joining him in laying hands upon the head of the candidate and solemnly committing to him the office and the work of a priest in the Church of God. In this service the Rev. Matthew Brewster, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's Church, presented the candiate to the Bishop, and the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, D. D., of St. Matthew's Church, Houma, preached the sermon.

Rev. Mr. Pratt, until he was ordained, was a member of St. Andrew's Church of New Orleans, in which parish he spent his whole life. He took his academic studies at Louisiana State University, graduating with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1932. His theological studies were carried on in the Theological School of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, where he graduated on June 11 with the degree of Bachelor of Divinity.

Among those present at the ordination service were members of the family and many friends and associates of Mr. Pratt, who has been active in Young People's work of this diocese for a number of years. Rev. Charles L. Wells, Ph. D., Dean of the Theological School at Sewanee, attended the service. Mr. Pratt has been appointed to assist Rev. Dr. Tucker during the summer in St. Matthew's Church, Houma, and in the other congregations associated, viz., St. Andrew's Mission, Bayou DuLarge; St. Anna's Mission, Gibson; St. John's Church, Thibodaux, and Christ's Church, Napoleonville. He will reside in St. Matthew's rectory, Houma. One of the gifts received by Mr. Pratt at the time of his ordination was a beautiful set of communion vessels for the administration of private celebration of the Holy Communion.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

Those wounds heal ill which men do give themselves.—Shakespeare.

There aren't enough brains under fifty to run anything.—Henry Ford.

Sydney Smith once said of Francis Horner that the commandments were written on his face.

Time to me this truth has taught,
'Tis a treasure worth revealing,
More offend by want of thought
Than by any want of feeling.
—C. Swain.

We discover that the universe shows evidence of a designing or controlling power that has something in common with our own minds.—Sir James Jeans.

Be gentle, and you can be bold; be frugal, and you can be liberal; avoid putting yourself before others, and you can become a leader among men.—Lao Tze.

"See the Lord, thy Keeper, stand
Omnipotently near:
Lo! He holds thee by thy hand,
And banishes thy fear:
Shadows with His wings thy head;
Guards from all impending harms;
Round thee and beneath are spread
The everlasting arms."

Whatever moral splendor our nation has had, or now has, is directly traceable to our Christian foundations and to the superstructure of law and conduct built upon them. It is the wide heralding of the Christian message that is the uppermost need of the hour. Nation-wide evangelistic zeal must precede a nation-wide moral and spiritual uplift.—Don O. Shelton, in "The Bible Today".

God gives us joy that we may give,
He gives us love that we may share,
Sometimes He gives us loads to lift
That we may learn to bear.

Meditation is not an act of mind only, but of the whole man, so that the Word stirs thought, and thought stirs prayer, and prayer passes into communion, and communion reveals new matter for meditation.—Mark Guy Pearse.

We are blind until we see
That in the human plan
Nothing is worth the making if
It does not make the man.
Why build these cities glorious
If man unbuilded goes?
In vain we build the world unless
The builder also grows.

One of the calmest men I ever knew told me that he used to be violently passionate, and he broke his temper by resolutely bridling his tongue until he cooled down.—Dr. Cuyler.

As the world is, hate is given freer rein (than love). Recently it reigned; and each half of the world besought the same God to help it kill the other half. We can hate enough to kill, but killing no longer solves problems, nor hating an enemy convert one.—Professor George A. Dorsey, Ph. D.

To be an honest person, to be fair to friends and enemies, to be patient under stress, to bear misrepresentation without murmuring, to realize that every hour is lived in the presence of God, is to get the most joy out of life and live at the highest.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Fancy Ritual and Money Raising.

Mr. Editor:

Your editorial in a recent issue of your paper on "Fancy Ritual" was a pleasure, and I daresay comfort, to many beside myself. To see the beautiful, dignified ritual of the Protestant Episcopal Church marred by many innovations and imitation is well calculated to bring sorrow to many hearts, even though it pleases the thoughtless few.

Some thought Bishop Whittle too strict in his ideas, but we understand now why he strove so faithfully and earnestly to keep the wedge from entering lest it pierce to the very heart.

But unpleasant as "Fancy Ritual" is to many, there seems to be another practice creeping in which we believe will be even more detrimental to the Church's influence and good name. We refer to the method of raising money for God's work, for the support of the Church by means of "benefit dances" and card parties. One in authority says, "Such methods are now adopted in many parts of the country without any question whatever". Oh, the shame of it, that the Episcopal Church has come to a time when she has to seek, by such questionable ways, the money to carry on her work! When one ponders on the devoted, and, doubtless, many times weary and discouraging, work of Bishop Meade to revive the Episcopal Church in Virginia, one feels ready to fall on one's knees and cry out, "Oh, Father in Heaven, was it all in vain?"

Surely, then, Mr. Editor, when you consider all these things, you will be ready to write an editorial on "Questionable ways of raising money for the support of the Church in the carrying on of God's work", as well as on "Fancy Rituals".

Choosing a Missionary.

Mr. Editor:

The Good Book says we ought to become as little children. That's quite a large order for some of us, but we could at least use a little of it to advantage sometimes. For instance, the children of my family get quite a kick out of a silly little game called "choosing". They take a magazine or a catalogue, sit down on the floor, and take turns picking out pictures of various people or articles that strike their fancy. And the moment they have made their selection, it is fascinating to watch old John Stuart Mills' "magic of property" invest each choice with very special virtues.

I know it is necessary for us grown-ups to put away a lot of childish things in the interest of economy and efficiency, and such like indispensables. If we must be always scanning budgets and quotas and committee reports, there is really not enough time to be looking at pictures. But it might be worth a try when the others are not keeping heads above water.

All my life long I have been involved in a thing called Missions. For a good many years now my active part has consisted of paying a check into its treasury. But the magazines and the journals keep coming to me, and I find myself involuntarily "choosing", this or that stalwart individual or doughty deed that appeals to me especially; and I gloat inwardly over the silly thought that 'there goes my money-player! Hurrah for him, or her!" I am not doing so hot myself. But, man, I sure can pick winners to lay my money on. Without jimmying up the books of the Board of Missions, or interfering in the slightest with their hard and fast rules, you would be amazed at the number and the class of the missionary heroes that have been on my "pay-roll". And so would they; for it has all just been in my mind, in my little game of "supposing" and "choosing".

There is a good side to this. At various times in the last fifty years I have made make-believe investments of this sort in China, in Japan, in Africa, in Alaska, in sea islands and on mountain-tops. The sum total of the dollars is far from great on any basis of accounting. But somehow I feel that Archdeacon Neve's estimate of a thousandfold return is too conservative. What a fool I have been not to have done some real plunging in these stocks, where moth and rust never corrupt, and where there's magic in the air that makes each dividend sparkle with its mysterious potentialities.

But there is a disconcerting side, too. I get reading along about these winners I've picked, and how fine they are doing. I tell you I'm for some of those fellows one hundred per cent. It's fine sport leaning back in your armchair rooting for them, and feeling that they are your team; you are one of their loyal supporters. My difficulty is that I can scarcely ever read all the way through a Spirit of Missions or a Southern Churchman without seeing where one or another of my boys out there needs "more of the same", if the land he has cleared is to be cultivated. And there my self-satisfaction is, all upset and disturbed. But, even so, a dollar or so additional for a friend or personal interest is not at all the same thing as a budget or a quota—it is just the normal thing to be expected of a growing cause or child. And so I'd hate to have to give up my silly little game of transforming those cold abstractions into personal friends.

A Side-Lines Fan.

A Test for Christians.

Since Mussolini seems determined to make Italy declare war on Ethiopia, we as Christians, will be faced with the problem of whether in that which we have condemned as unchristian, we really can keep our hands off and play the part of real idealists or not.

It is natural for us all to sympathize with Ethiopia. An under-privileged country, Christian in inheritance, with the same ideals of liberty which we all wish in declaring our own independence, is almost mysteriously provoked to a quarrel by a great European nation. The mystery is the motive in Mussolini's mind. It almost seems incredible that in civilized 1935, internal conflicts should be disguised and unrest used as an excuse to begin a costly and bloody war, and this in spite of the fact that the chief nation involved was an active participant in the horrors of the World War. Yet, there is little else that can be seen through the heavy censorship screen around Italy.

The brutality of such policies, reverting to the worst type of politics of the middle ages, makes even an idealistic Christian feel that his blood must boil. And yet, in boilling blood the great havoc of the past has taken place.

One cannot help but go back and read the history before every war of which we have the record. We read how fanatics appealing to the better sides of more conservative people, finally engaged in warfare that had the emotions aroused and men forgot their sanity and idealism.

The danger in the present is that such a war as the one projected between Italy and Ethiopia may have such an effect. With our feelings aroused, as well as the emotions of the better type of Christians in Europe, another world war that would probably mean the end of whatever civilization we have, would be a very near possibility.

Much as we may hate the tactics of Mussolini and the type of politico-philosophy which he represents, let us not forget that a stronger force than military force can be found if we are strong enough to use it, and that we must hate war and not contribute anything to the cause of war—even to the side with which we have great sympathy. If our Christian convictions are to remain sure and forceful, we must admit that all war is foolish and that playing with fire only brings us near the conflagration. And we can, as always, still pray that common sense and Christian decency will prevail and that this farce of a thug-like politician in provoking war with a peaceful, simple nation, may yet be averted by the prayers and thoughts and sanity of more Christian men.

Sympathy Extended.

Two of our colleagues in the field of the Church Press, The Living Church and The Churchman, are having their troubles and we have deep sympathy for them.

The Morehouse Publishing Company, which publishes The Living Church, has been accused of being unfair to labor and in an editorial that gives a fair and reasonable explanation of their status as an "open shop" the explanation is given that it is left entirely to the employees of the company whether or not they wish to join the union.

To any of us who have known The Morehouse Publishing Company for a number of years, there is no need for an explanation. Frederic Cook Morehouse, for many years the head of this fine concern, was a friend of every righteous cause. His policies since his death have been carried on by his sons. They have championed the rights of labor, and indeed of every class of under-privileged, and their own Christian characters are proof enough that they would not manage a business that was in any way "unfair". We hope that the rumors that are as wild as most rumors prove to be, will not be believed by any church people. The fact that they allow their employees full choice in the matter of union membership and that their wages are and have been for many years higher than the union wage scale is sufficient evidence that they are living up to the words they preach.

The Churchman has been sued for libel in connection with their campaign for decency in movies—a campaign, by the way, that began long before the more famous "League for Decency" ever came into being. Some years ago they quoted in an article certain words from a supposedly authoritative source, that proved to be incorrect in regard to a Mr. Gabriel Hess, who had some connection with the moving picture industry. On learning the inaccuracy of their source, they published a retraction, but Mr. Hess sued for libel and a judgment of $10,200 has been returned against them. Elsewhere we will publish a letter, if we are given permission, from Mr. Hess's attorney, which will give the plaintiff's argument in answer to the criticism of this verdict. Very possibly The Churchman was technically wrong and also careless. But to church people, the ideal which she was striving for was great, and we are sorry that there is a danger that this judgment may mean that this old church paper cannot carry on

Church Union in Canada.

The Record, London, England, July 5, 1935.

It is now ten years since the Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians in Canada formed the United Church of Canada, and now its Moderator is advocating a Church for Canada which will embrace all present communions and "represent the genius of our people". He admits that "the triple yoke has been found to gall a little here and there," but says, "the fellowship of the Church has been amazingly free and rewarding." Archbishop Owen, the Primate of Canada, commenting on the address from which the above has been taken, said that the Church of England had always been interested in the project, and that a committee of the General Synod was at present working on such a proposal. I believe I am right in saying that a certain section of the Presbyterians, like the "Wee Frees" of Scotland, refused to join in the Union; and it is not in the least likely that the stiffer Churchmen in Canada, not to speak of the Anglo-Catholics, will have anything to do with such a scheme, even though, as in South India, it had an episcopal administration.

Confessing One's Sins to Others.

Western Recorder, Louisville, Ky., July 11, 1935.

The duty of confession is placed upon those who come to Christ. The sinner is to confess his sins and express his purpose to turn from them by the help of the Lord. But many things are confessed to fellow Christians that had better be confessed to God alone. No one is under a mandate to confess every sin of which he is conscious to every fellow-Christian who may be willing to hear it. One general principle is that one's sin is to be kept to God and himself unless someone else will be injured by his withholding confession. If confession to others serves no purpose except to give them a knowledge of one's sin, it will likely do far more harm than good. The Oxford Group Movement is increasingly credited with having shaken the formalism which has settled on many churches out of its dead complacency and having brought many to fresh contacts with reality in Christian experience. But it is criticized for lack of spiritual understanding in several other directions, one of these being its large emphasis on confession of personal faults and sins as between members of the fellowship. Take your sins to the Lord. Turn from them with loathing and repentance. But keep them from men unless you are sure a particular confession may do good.

Joints in the Pews.

Church of England Newspaper, July 5, 1935.

Meat was sold on Sundays at Wigton in Restoration times, the butchers hanging up the carcasses at the church door. The customers would then hang their joints of meat over the back of their pews until the conclusion of the service. The Rev. Thomas Warcup journeyed to London on foot to petition the King against this abuse, and it was decreed that market-day should be held on Tuesday in place of Sunday.

Nowadays many people stay away from church and cook their joints during the service!

Religious Outlook for Mexico.

Presbyterian Banner, July 18, 1935.

It is refreshing to know also that the Protestant Churches have not abandoned the field. They are over a hundred missionaries on the field today, ready for service. They are not free to carry on their services in the old way, but they are adjusting themselves to the new conditions. They are doing social service work, testifying, and seeking to lead men to higher ways of living. The Bible is being circulated freely. Who knows but what out of these times will come a church, cleansed, and baptized for a great service for the Kingdom. Group work, camp work, colporteurs, and the preaching of the Gospel in a personal way will do much toward holding the Mexican people to the faith.

The church in Mexico needs to rediscover its mission. It must accord to all religious liberty and freedom. It must see in the light of history that nations and churches which do not serve must die. Religious freedom for all is a condition devoutly to be desired. We must see in the light of Christ's great command that the Gospel is for all people and that we are commissioned to carry the truth unto the ends of the earth. That church is best fitted to do this work which is most free from hate, prejudice, and selfishness. Only thus can the church rediscover its true mission in Mexico.

The Peace Ballot.

The Guardian, London, July 5, 1935.

The figures announced at the Albert Hall on Thursday of last week showed that eleven million citizens of Great Britain and Northern Island filled in ballot papers, and that some ten million gave an affirmative answer to the questions. This is a very remarkable fact. No attempts to belittle the achievement can explain it away. It is most unfortunate that, on the whole, the newspapers that support the Government have attempted to make light of the result, for this attitude may easily lead the superficial reader to suppose that the Government is lukewarm about the League of Nations. Really the League is the principal plank in its foreign policy. It is idle to say, as is said in some quarters, that the result of the ballot adds nothing to what was known already. It is a simple fact that the result has been an immense surprise to everybody. The Government certainly did not know, any more than any enthusiastic supporter of the League of Nations Union knew, that there was such a large volume of support not just vaguely for peace, but for a definite policy for the prevention of war, based on the Covenant. The hands of the Government should be greatly strengthened, though several members strangely renounce the windfall.

China and Her Wall.

New Outlook, July, 1935.

Dispatches from the Orient have been telling of Japanese troops crossing China's Great Wall, and newspaper writers have been delving into the history of that "eighth wonder of the world." It is long since the once formidable barrier ceased to check any advancing host, but for stormy centuries it was a strong defense against the invader. The wall stretched from the sea to the desert—a distance of about fifteen hundred miles, crawling over mountain, valley and stream. It was built, like the pyramids, by forced labor, and we read that two hundred thousand convicts with iron collars about their necks, worked till they died in their tracks. The wall averaged a height of twenty feet and was fifteen feet wide, with towers at intervals of one hundred yards. It lives on as an ancient landmark, whose removal the common sentiment of mankind would deplore. It serves, too, as a memorial, reminding the present generation that China had a civilization and a long history ages before our Western nations were born. "A people with China's past deserves," says the "New York Times," "the respect of those peoples whose arts have been more lately developed. . . . And if history teaches us anything, she teaches, as a high authority recently stated, that a race as numerous and sound as the Chinese will not perish from the earth."

The Garden of the Soul

Where can heaven find a place on earth in which to manifest its presence and something of the beauty and peace and joy which belong to it and form a necessary part of it? There is but one place and that is the soul of man. The human soul was created by God that the fruits and flowers of Paradise might be planted there and form a miniature heaven on earth. And so the Holy Spirit was given to man to dwell within his soul, and through His holy and lifegiving presence make it grow and bring forth that which it could not naturally produce. Thus we find St. Paul saying,—"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." It is in the soul that these Christian graces and virtues have their root and blossom and bear fruit within, and without in the life which influences the outside world.

Christ Brought Heaven to Earth.

Christ lived the heavenly life here on earth; showed what our human nature is capable of when lived in perfect harmony with the Will of God, and manifested His loving purpose with regard to mankind. But then He was the Son of God as well as the Son of Man, and it seemed impossible that ordinary men and women, immersed in the common affairs of life, and in such close contact with the evil influences which beset them on every side, could ever live up to the standard of heavenly-mindedness which was possible to Him. When He had left this earth and gone back to the Father, where could another link be found to bring heaven and earth together? Christ, Himself, made provision for the continuance of the union between the two worlds.

Christ's Provision for the New Relationship.

On the night before His Death, He promised His disciples that, although His bodily presence would be removed, yet that He would still be with them by the coming of His Spirit into their lives as a constant source of power and inspiration. He gave them the Parable of the Vine to assure them of the reality of the new relationship which He was about to establish between Himself and them. "I am the Vine," He said, "ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing." St. John 15:5. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." (Verse 8.) It is clear from the words of our Lord, that the indwelling presence of the Spirit in the soul of man, enables it to bring forth heavenly fruit, which shows that, even now, heaven and earth are united by the presence and work of the Holy Spirit in the soul.

The Difficulty of Living in the World Without Being of the World.

It may be said, however, that heavenly-mindedness is very difficult to maintain in a world such as this, where evil abounds on every side, and where the cares and anxieties of this earthly life of ours are constantly encroaching upon, and disturbing the harmony and peace of our inner life. To be in the world and yet not of the world, is a problem which most of us find very difficult to solve, especially since it is our Christian duty to take part in trying to better and improve the conditions existing in the world around us. Otherworldliness has been accused of being an excuse to escape from the responsibilities which devolve upon us as citizens of this world, as well as citizens of the Kingdom of Heaven.

The True Solution of the Problem.

The true solution of this difficult problem would seem to be that the Christian should represent Christ to His fellowmen, and seek to be used as a channel whereby the blessings of the Kingdom of Heaven may flow forth into the world and become such a controlling influence in its life, as to gradually transform it, and make Christ's ideals and principles the common property of all men. This is nothing new, since Christ Himself said:—"He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of him shall flow rivers of living water." St. John interprets this saying as referring to the gift of the Spirit to those who should believe on Him. We may compare this with our Lord's words to the woman of Samaria, when He said, "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." The figure used here seems to represent a spring or fountain, with such an abundant supply of water that it must flow forth in a continuous stream from the basin which it supplies, and carry a blessing wherever it goes.

"A Watered Garden."

To return to the figure of the garden, as applied to the soul of man. We read in Isaiah 58:11, God's promise to His people, "Thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not." This fits in very well with what has just been said. Water is essential to the fruitfulness of the garden. In the same way the soul needs the refreshment and the lifegiving influence of the Holy Spirit. The Garden of Eden, we are told, was well watered by the river which gave it life, and parted, and flowed forth in different directions, to be a blessing to the world outside. But if our souls are to be as a watered garden, fed by a spring, whose waters fail not, we must keep in close touch with the source from which it comes, and seek, day by day, for such a continuous and bountiful supply of the living water of the Spirit, that our garden of the soul may blossom as the rose, and send out streams of living water to refresh and give new life to the world around us.

God's Wooing.

God woos us in so many ways,
He woos us where the sunlight plays
Upon the trees, the grass, and flowers,
And beauty gilds the passing hours.

The sparkling stream, the azure sky;
Reveal His secret presence nigh;
We may see beauty everywhere,
And thus He does His love declare;

And woos us till in Him we find
The beauty of the Eternal Mind,
From which all beauty here below
Doth like a pleasant river flow.

Intellectual Qualifications of the Ministry

By FREDERICK C. GRANT,

Dean of Seabury-Western Theological Seminary, Evanston, Illinois.

IN CONSIDERING the intellectual qualifications of the ministry, let it be understood that these are not the only necessary qualifications. That should go without saying; but we shall gain in perspective by pointing it out. There are also physical qualifications: sound health, absence of serious physical defects—though some men heroically overcome them—and in general that basically biological drive of energy which will carry a man through laborious days and nights and years and keep him still fresh at the end. There are also moral qualifications: a man's life must be sound to the core if he is to be a trusted advisor, guide, and friend of others. To say the least, no man who lives before the public as much as a minister must, can afford to occupy such a position unless his motives and his conduct are above reproach. On beyond this negative reason lies the positive insistence of the Apostle that we must avoid every appearance of evil. This means more than the absence of glaring and vulgar vices. There must be in the man a moral force and a wholesomeness and directness of ethical insight that will be contagious, and make virtue not only irreproachable but inviting, interesting, and lovable. Perhaps the best thing one can say of a moral leader is that he makes goodness attractive, and casts upon those about him the spell of his own devotion to the things that are pure, honorable, true, and right. In this connection one may recall the sound saying of Coventry Patmore: "There is nothing comparable, for moral force, to the charm of truly noble manners." But the manners, to be truly noble, must be natural, and spring from the very heart.

There are also, and above all others, the spiritual qualifications: a man must really be on fire with love for God and for human souls, if he is to fulfil a worthy ministry, and build up the Kingdom of God upon earth. "Spirituality" is hard to define, and is easily caricatured. But men recognize at once the artificial, fictitious kind, and in a minister they demand that no substitutes for the real article shall be offered. When a man speaks in the name of God to His people, or in the name of the people to their God, it is no mere voice and nothing more that is heard—the "living tones" are the tones of one human life consecrated to the priestly-prophetic office. It simply must ring true, if the thoughts in many hearts are to be revealed and gathered up in prayer, if the mind of God is to be spoken through a human utterance to the hearts and wills of men.

I.

Our concern at present is the intellectual qualifications of the ministry; but they must be viewed as a part of the rounded whole of the minister's life and work. Viewed in isolation, as if one set of qualifications could be substituted for another, we get a serious misunderstanding of the ideal. Our aim is not to produce ministers who are scholars and nothing more—if that were possible! Nor, on the other hand, athletic parsons who hate study; nor pious saints who "abominate preaching"; and so on—all these are caricatures of what we are after. What we want in the minister is first of all a man, and a gentleman; a man with the physical energy to stand the gaff of hard work, years on end; a man of sound, wholesome motives, whose own life is in good order before he undertakes to help others order theirs; whose mind is free from complexes and obsessions, and whose moral insight is clear as a sunlit June day; whose spiritual life is a steady and continuous experience of the Eternal, rooted in convictions sprung first-hand out of life itself, not a string of quotations and references; and whose intellectual attainments enable him to interpret the Gospel to the needs of the men and women among whom he lives.

The Protestant Churches have of late become seriously concerned over the education of their ministers. A great four-volume survey, "The Education of American Ministers", has recently been published, under the editorship of Professors William Adams Brown, Mark A. May, and others. Apparently the task of "re-thinking missions" is to be followed by another, Rethinking Theological Education. And it is time! In contrast to the rising standards of medical and legal education, the standards of theological education appear to have gone down, in some of the churches; and not to have risen at all, or not sufficiently, in others. There was a time when it could be assumed that the average minister was something of a scholar, at least relatively to the average congregation. The doctor and the lawyer were also men of learning, and could converse with him on his own ground—but few others. Moreover, theology was a subject apart, highly honored, and one that only specialists could master. And the minister enjoyed the same prerogatives here that the doctor held in medicine and the attorney or the judge enjoyed in the law. By and large, this view was justified, at least a century ago and more. The English Church was specially noteworthy in this respect: clerus Anglicanus stupor mundi! Even the country parson in England was the product of an aristocratic intellectual tradition; and in this country the aristocratic tradition survived—we can scarcely say prevailed—in education down to a generation or two ago. But it has lost its hold, of late. Any layman can talk, now! He has read Bertrand Russell, or at least Will Durant, and can talk philosophy; he has read Eddington and Jeans and can talk science; he may even have read some theology, and is ready to converse upon it. All this is a gain, of course, so far as the laity are concerned—except when they discover that their clergy have not been keeping up, and perhaps do not even sense the problems involved in the newer views in science and philosophy. Alas for the parson who is caught in such a predicament! Sadder still for the layman who, possibly without mentioning it to the parson, secretly concludes that theology is pure antiquarianism, and has nothing to offer today!

II.

How came this change? For one thing, there was a period when too few men offered themselves for the ministry—that is, too few who were adequately prepared. Hence standards of educational requirement were lowered. In some theological schools college degrees were no longer required of entrants, Hebrew was abandoned, and even Greek. Men without seminary degrees were ordained, and many who had received no theological education. There were—and are—of course notable exceptions; but as a rule it is certainly true that an exceptional man will be all the more exceptional after an adequate training. Another factor was the Church's missionary expansion in new territory, where scholarship was sometimes even mistaken for a handicap. The mistake was perhaps natural, but it was serious, as is often seen in the aftermath. And that sound scholarship is no handicap is proved by the careers of more than one of our missionary bishops and pastors, who have advanced the cause of learning along with that of the Gospel in new fields. Still another factor was the general shift of emphasis in the direction of practical interests, social service, organization, pastoral work. Along with this went less attention to preaching, and a consequent decline in preaching; though why this neglect was necessary has never been explained! A physician's work is "practical" enough; but it is no excuse for failure to secure thorough preparation, or to keep up with medical progress afterwards. In medicine, of course, practical work and research are closely related. The same ought to be true in theology. A true parallel to the theological candidate who asks for shortened courses and special handling would be the medical student who informed his instructor that he was not interested in anatomy or physiology, but wished to specialize in diagnosis or neurology. One can imagine how short a shrift he would be granted in any modern school of medicine! In the Church, on the contrary, there is a widespread failure to recognize any very close relation between Biblical criticism, ecclesiastical history, and liturgics, for example, and the actual work of the ministry. Hence the eagerness of some students to get through with mere academic subjects, prepare for their canonical examinations, and "get started"; hence also the proposals of others to reduce the theological course to a year or two and devote the remaining time to practical or "clinical" training. But the principle still holds: "These ought ye to have done, and not leave the others undone." It is this hiatus which is felt to exist between academic subjects and the actual work of the ministry that accounts for less interest in intellectual preparation. And it deserves the most careful consideration by those responsible for seminary teaching. The pastoral and teaching point of view needs recognition throughout the seminary course, not just in the terms devoted to Pastoral Theology or Religious Education. The whole seminary course ought to be orientated practically. The right of research ought to be recognized, and its results accepted. Qualified men should be encouraged to devote themselves to it. But the ordinary student is neither called nor qualified to become a research scholar. The seminary teacher is to be the interpreter of the results of research, and ought himself to be devoted to it, in his own chosen field. He is the liaison officer, between the two groups, researchers and practitioners; and he must stay fresh, and "keep up"—hence ought not to be overburdened with teaching-hours, or deprived of the opportunity for travel, sabbatical years, and so on. But the seminary, after all, is no institute for research, primarily, but a professional school for the training of the clergy. Hence, too, more emphasis should be placed upon technique, upon the training of the voice and its use in reading and interpretation; in the conduct of services; in music; in preaching; in sociology and social problems; in pastoral work; in devotions. Above all, there should be a stronger insistence that a man must have something to give; a compelling reason for entering the ministry, not a mere desire to keep machinery moving. With this point of view properly stressed, Bible, Church History, History of Religions, Psychology and Philosophy of Religion, Liturgics, Canon Law, Doctrine, History of Doctrine, Ethics and Moral Theology, Greek (why not?), and even Hebrew all get related to the practical work of the Church, to teaching, preaching, and pastoral work, to the building up of the Body of Christ. The seminary is a professional school, and the proof of its effectiveness is the quality of the men it produces. Their success is its success: their failure its failure. If the success of a medical school is not only the successful passing of examinations by its students, but their achievements in later life, the same is certainly true of any seminary.

III.

We may be thankful that conditions are now improving and that the Church is demanding higher standards than were common twenty-five years ago, say, when men of my generation were in seminary. We now need not more men so much as we need better trained men. It would be better for any school to take twenty class A men, and concentrate upon these, than to take twenty of class A, twenty of class B, and ten of class C. Moreover, something should be done to prevent men who drop out of the seminary from being ordained—as often happens—far in advance of their class! This would be scandalous, if it took place in the medical profession. Is it any less scandalous in the ministry? In fact, the whole business is an example of muddled thinking—to assume, for example, that a man must have either an adequate intellectual preparation or a special interest in the practical work of the Church. The Ordinal, the Canons, the Church itself, in its whole outlook and tradition, assumes that the candidate for the ministry will have both. Another reform that is needed is in the manner of choosing men for the ministry. As a rule, we wait for men to apply. But this is an unsatisfactory process. Perhaps the seminaries ought to pool their interests—as they easily could, if we had four or five strong schools instead of fourteen, in a Church this size—and then go after the right men. We could have Tap Day every day, and men of promise could be sought out and encouraged to go into the ministry. Some excellent pastors do this now, in their parishes. But how often it happens that the ministry comes last in a boy's consideration of possible vocations: business, medicine, law, engineering come first, and the ministry gets a hearing only at the end.

IV.

What then are the intellectual qualifications of the ministry? It is easy to say: Four years of college, three of seminary. But is this any guarantee? It is no guarantee, but it is certainly a safeguard. It was for this reason that the late Bishop Slattery labored so earnestly, in the Commission on the Ministry and elsewhere, for the revision of the Canons, to make a college degree and a full seminary course obligatory. This might seem unfair to certain exceptional men; but these men would be all the better for a longer training. As for the financial problem, the Episcopal Church is already spending money enough on theological education to train with thorough adequacy every man it accepts—though for efficiency the Church should combine its smaller schools, and thus reduce the present wastage in doubled overhead. As Bishop Irving Reese used to say, "A man has just one life to give. If the Church accepts his gift, the Church ought to provide the best possible training the man can receive." Our standard ought surely to be nothing less than this: an intellectual preparation sufficient to enable the minister to be a sympathetic interpreter of the meaning of the Gospel of Christ, in all its widest applications, to the problems and needs of his fellow-men. This sounds simple; but it is vastly far-reaching. You can begin at either end—with the Gospel, or with human problems and needs! Take the Gospel: does anyone suppose its interpretation was exhausted in the fourth century, or the thirteenth, or the sixteenth, or the nineteenth? Fresh light is still breaking forth from God's Word, every day. Does it apply to the individual soul—"the individual in his solitariness", where Dr. Whitehead finds the center of religion? Of course.

Does it apply in the realm of sociology? Of course. Of international politics? Certainly. Of war and peace? By all means! Of industrial relations? Undoubtedly! Of community welfare and hygiene? Yes. Of private mental distress or emotional frustration? Certainly. Of science and philosophy, and the meaning of the world-order? Yes: for Christ was the unveiling of the Final Reality in our world, and in Him God and Man are perfectly united. He stands at the center of things, and the light radiating from Him reaches every nook and corner of human life.

But how is a minister to interpret this Divine Master of all life, and His everlasting Gospel, unless he knows the problems people face in this hurried, harried, scientific, jazz and machine age we live in today? People generally are becoming suspicious, and rightly suspicious, of a shallow emotionalism with a soporific "Don't Worry" kind of solution for all and sundry problems that arise; or whose towering claims to solve all problems of life are accompanied by a complete absence of serious, accurate thinking and anything like a concrete program for action. Our world wants leadership—never has it wanted it more than it does today. It is not tired of old formulas so much as it is tired of men who can say the formulas but produce no results. It is not questing for a new faith—so far as I have observed—but it is waiting for men who can give it a faith (almost any faith!) which will make life reasonable and meaningful and worthwhile. It doesn't care for learned disquisitions and analyses of its problems, unless the analyst promises to solve some of them. In a word, the world is waiting to hear from men who have faced its problems, fairly and squarely and with full knowledge of their wider bearings and ramifications; who have thought them through, perhaps in bitter anguish of spirit and through laborious days and nights until they have arrived at solid, unyielding convictions; who have the skill and the sympathy to interpret to others, in language the common man can understand, these convictions upon which their own faith is now unshakably based; and who can offer something in the way of genuine leadership in the concrete task of making these convictions about life actually central and dominant in the community where they live. Believe me, there never was a stiffer challenge flung down before any group of men than the one cast at the feet of the Christian ministry in this present generation. Now if ever the Apostle's words ring clear: "Gird up the loins of your mind." We are not called merely to keep a machine going—the routine "church work" of so many parishes and missions. If that is all we set ourselves to accomplish, we shall fail, even at that modest task. What we are called to do is to lead in creating a new world—or in realizing here in this new world the dream of one older still, even the everlasting dream of the Kingdom of God. And the sign outside the Works Office of this project reads: "No half-prepared, lazy-minded, superficial, careless, or intellectually handicapped workers need apply. We can use only men who have wholly consecrated their minds as well as their wills and affections and their purses to this great venture and are prepared for the hardest kind of intellectual, physical, moral, and spiritual toil. And the wages are in the task itself."

In the corridor outside the Reading Room of the Gregory Library at Seabury-Western Seminary is a bulletin board, at the top of which is carved a quotation, selected, with characteristic insight and humor, by a man who for nearly a quarter-century impressed its teaching upon successive generations of students. It is from "The Virginian": "A middlin' doctor is a pore thing, and a middlin' lawyer is a pore thing, but keep me from a middlin' man of God!"

A Cause

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,

Bishop of Washington.

THERE is a dramatic story in the First Book of Samuel which speaks of a crisis in the history of an ancient nation. The militant forces had been brought into conflict with an old enemy of the people, and an impasse had been reached that rendered the army of Israel utterly impotent. A giant, the champion of the Philistines, had defied the armed forces of Israel and in fear they fled before him, and "were dismayed and greatly afraid."

Into this situation came a young man—a shepherd—David, by name. Immediately upon entering the camp of his country's forces, he made searching inquiry concerning the situation that confronted them. Rebuked by his brothers for his temerity and his assumption of ability to meet the giant, David in his enthusiasm replied: "What have I now done? Is there not a cause?" Appearing before King Saul, he essayed to undertake contact with the Philistine giant. The king, observing his youth, questioned his capacity to contend with so formidable a foe. At length, yielding to him, he offered David his armour, but the lad found it cumbersome and useless for his purpose. As the story proceeds it tells of the stripling going forth in his own native trength exercising his fine skill in the use of the sling, and his subequent defeat of the self-confident enemy of his country.

The whole story is suggestive of a condition that repeats itself frequently in our life, and indicates the need of self-reliant and courageous leaders to meet critical situations when they arise in our corporate life as a people. "Is there not a cause?" has been the strong affirmation upon the lips of many a valiant leader who has dared in times of crisis, to enlist in defense of an ideal or principle that concerned the well-being and security of a community, a state or a nation.

The large interests of the home, or society and of industry, are furthered by those who are ready and willing to make sacrifice, in the setting forward of a cause that is just and in the interests of the common weal. Salutary changes and reformations are ushered in by these who, enlisting in a great and appealing cause, jeopardize their lives in sacrificial service that it may be maintained. The heroes of the Christian faith who have carried its standards in the face of overwhelming odds have done so out of loyalty to Him who went to a cross for the cause of human salvation. Like Him, they have not "counted their lives dear unto themselves", in the unfailing belief that the ideals of life for which He lived and died should prevail in the counsels of men.

Our age has grown passive and lethargic, and in our quest for material gain and advantage the strong heroic qualities that grow out of deep conviction and devotion to a mighty cause have been largely lost to us. It is becoming increasingly evident that the time is at hand that challenges the best we have to give that, "some great cause, God's new Messiah", may seize our hearts and minds and consume us with a passion for righteouness. Such an enlistment necessarily involves personal convenience and sacrifice, but its compensations outweigh these. Christian service contemplates something more than advocating creeds and sys-

Young People Go "Forward Together"

By GLADYS WOLCOTT BARNES,
National Council Correspondent, Church Publications.

THINGS are moving forward among the young people of the Episcopal Church; there is a real sound of a going in the tops of the younger mulberry trees. It is not generally realized that at least 80,000 young people are now members of various Church societies.

Several unheralded but constructive meetings in the past year or two have brought together not only the national leaders of existing youth organizations, but also a number of leaders from the young people themselves. Out of these conferences several definite results have come and the whole situation has taken on new life.

As the present set-up is not very clear even to some of the people most interested, a word about it is in order.

For one thing, the Church's old and well-known organizations for young people are coordinating their activities and working together for a common cause as never before. The chief outward sign of this is the recently established Council of Youth Organizations made up of leaders from each society, Girls' Friendly, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Young People's Fellowships and Service Leagues, and so on.

Another and increasingly lively element in the situation is the national Federation of Episcopal Young People. This has been in existence for ten years and it represents the young people's societies which are composed of boys and girls working together.

This Federation functions nationally through a Commission of fifteen on which every province is represented, and the Commission, in due form, has an executive committee of five. For convenience in action, the committee members were appointed from places relatively near together: Pauline Hartlieb, Buffalo; Pauline Lyons, Boston; Charles Wood, Philadelphia; Dorothy May Fischer, New York, adviser, and the Rev. Ernest E. Piper, St. Bartholomew's Church, 109 East Fiftieth Street, New York, adviser and chairman.

The commission had a meeting in Chicago late in May. They felt that vigorous action was needed to enlist the Church's young people more fully and more effectively in the Church's work. They decided on three successive steps, first to issue a call, a rallying cry, to their fellows under the slogan, "Forward Together"; second, to ask them to indicate through a questionnaire what subjects they most wanted to study or work on; third, to supply program material for this study and work. The present situation is that the Call has been issued; the questionnaires have been sent to young people's groups in summer conferences all over the country and some replies have already been received; and the commission is to meet on August 3 in New York for further study on the supply of program material, i. e., discussion outlines and suggestions for activities. The Church's Forward Movement Commission has also shown itself in deep sympathy with young people's work and now has two young people among its associate members, Pauline Lyons of Boston, and Goodwin Roberts of Chicago.

AS TO THE CALL, it is noteworthy that this went out, not from the House of Bishops or the National Council, or even from the Presiding Bishop, but from the young people themselves, addressed to their own generation. It contains no whereases or resolves. It states a number of "deep convictions" shared by the young people, convictions out of which are growing plans for action. Among these convictions are that:

"No secular program or organizations alone can adequately solve our economic and social problems";

"That the freedom and democracy for which this nation has stood are in danger, as well as the principles of the Christian religion";

"That the Christian religion offers the only ultimate solution, but that Christian principles are not being adequately or effectively applied to these problems, as yet. Further, that these principles have not been clearly explained even to us";

"That Christian young people, together with all other followers of Christ are committed to a partnership with God in striving for a more Christian society. Therefore, that young people must face the social problems of the day and seek to see them in the light of Jesus' life and teaching. That this responsibility is both individual and corporate";

"That help in meeting this responsibility may be found in the heritage that Jesus has bequeathed us in His Church";

"That God has endowed us with minds and wills to be used in His service and that our responsibility has not been fulfilled until it results in Christian action."

Believing that these convictions are shared by many others, the young people have issued their Call to the youth of the Church to "go forward together . . . to re-examine our beliefs . . . to rededicate our lives to God's service in building a more Christian nation . . . to love our lesser loyalties in a greater loyalty to Jesus Christ."

As for the questionnaire, on which the young people are asked to indicate what things they care about enough to want to know more or do something, it includes subjects the young people are talking and arguing about. For instance, peace, race, preparation for marriage, relationships between boys and girls, between parents and young people, a right attitude toward life, the need for self-confidence, for poise, questions of right and wrong, how to discover the right job, how to use leisure, how to take part in community action; Christian technique for dealing with conflicts in the home, or with friends; knowledge of the Christian religion and of the Church's work in the world, how to develop one's personal religious life; understanding the claims of socialism, communism, fascism, and the Christian answer.

On the early returns of the questionnaire, among the subjects most often checked or double-checked, indicating what things the young people feel are most important, are peace, race relations, conflicts at home, ways of developing self-confidence. There is also frequent mention of the need of and desire for adult leadership. The young people's comments make clear that there has been a lack of the right kind of cooperation from the adult groups.

Some one has observed that a questionnaire to the clergy asking how far they have dealt with any or all of these subjects in relation to their young people would bring interesting results.

A copy of the young people's questionnaire may be obtained from Miss Fischer's office, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

The number of parish units (branches, chapters, etc.), and total membership in seven Episcopal Church young people's organizations are as follows. The figures, especially for membership, naturaly vary from time to time.

Saint James the Apostle

By EDWARD ROCHIE HARDY, JR.,

Fellow and Tutor, General Theological Seminary.

IT WAS just before Passover, soon after Claudius Caesar had become Emperor at Rome, or, as we should say, just before Easter of a year early in the forties of the Christian era. Herod Agrippa, vassal king in Palestine, was trying hard to keep in both with Claudius and with the national Jewish party at home. The family of Herod was regarded with suspicion by most of the Jews. The recent famine had increased discontent. Like many despots in such situations, Herod turned attention to an unpopular group to take it away from his own unpopularity. There were the Christians, a queer sect, against whom much prejudice existed. So Herod had one of their leaders, Jacob bar-Zabdai, beheaded—we do not know the details of the legal process, if there was any.

James, as we call him in English, was not the first Christian to die for his faith. He was, however, the first apostle. In previous persecutions the leaders of the Church had seemed to bear charmed lives. We can well imagine the shock of the loss of James on the Christian community of Jerusalem. He had been most closely associated with the Lord Jesus. He and John his brother had left their father's prosperous fishing business to join the Lord in His wandering preaching of the Kingdom of God. With Peter, they had been the Lord's companions at some of the important moments of His life—when He raised Jairus' daughter from her deathbed, at His vision and transfiguration on the mountains, at His agony in the garden. In almost playful rebuke He had nicknamed them "sons of thunder". Perhaps the story was already told of how they had asked if He wanted fire from heaven on the village which refused Him hospitality, and had been told, "The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.

Then someone, perhaps John, remembered that this death might have been expected. Once James and John had asked the Lord for the places of honor in His Kingdom. He asked instead, could they drink the cup He was to drink, endure the baptism He was to receive? "Yes," they answered, scarcely thinking what it meant. That Jesus promised them, but the places of honor were in the Father's power. What is true honor, anyway? Is it to command and to be called "Benefactor" like the Herods and Caesars? The Son of Man, whom you call your Lord, came to serve, and to give His life for His people's ransom. So the son of thunder gave himself to the works of an apostle, preaching and healing. And now at last he had drunk the Lord's cup.

THE story of St. James, and the meaning of that story, is thus recorded in the New Testament. In the fourth century, when feasts of apostles began to be added to the church year, the Greek Church commemorated James and John on one of the days after Christmas. Perhaps the idea was to remember the two kinds of witness for Christ—heroic death and noble life. In the West it was not until the time of Charlemagne that, for the sake of completeness, feasts were given to the apostles who had not had them before, St. James among them. The reason for the choice of July 25 is uncertain. In Spain legends grew up that St. James had preached there, and that his body had been brought to Compostella. Even Roman Catholic scholars have realized for some centuries that this is unhistorical. But meanwhile Santiago had become the patron saint of Spain, and Compostella a great center of pilgrimage. Perhaps the son of thunder appealed to men who spent their lives fighting the Moors, and the martyr to the stern Spanish temperament. And still every boy named Jayme, or Jacques, or James, owes his name ultimately to the honor which the Church paid, and rightly, to this follower of the Son of Man.

A Sermom In Stone

By FRANCIS R. LEE,

Dean and Rector of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral.

(See Cover Photograph.)

ST. MARK'S PRO-CATHEDRAL, in the city of Hastings, is a beautiful church on the picturesque plains of Nebraska. Its exterior as well as interior equipment were designed by an architect of national reputation, Dr. Ralph Adams Cram of Boston, Mass. The edifice as it stands today completed, with the exception of the great central tower, represents an expenditure of $165,000. There has been a liquidation of all indebtedness with the exception of five thousand dollars. A volume could be written about the heroic struggles, the unconquerable faith and high courage of this group of God-fearing people who were responsible for this outstanding achievement.

Fifteen years ago the Bishop of Western Nebraska, the Rt. Rev. George Allen Beecher, D. D., laid the cornerstone and conducted the impressive service which consecrated the land for Cathedral purposes. After the completion of the crypt, building operations were suspended for the lack of funds and the congregation worshipped in the basement for more than five years. During this long period, however, the originators of the enterprise never lost their belief in the ultimate success of the undertaking.

In 1926, on the recommendation of Bishop Beecher, the vestry of St. Mark's invited the Very Rev. Francis R. Lee to become dean and rector of the Pro-Cathedral Parish. At that time Dean Lee was rector of a well-known Ohio parish, St. Paul's, Chillicothe. Six months after his acceptance and installation as Dean, it was unanimously decided to tackle again the construction problem. Building operations were, therefore, resumed, and this stately House of God has risen in glory. St. Mark's is the simple, dignified and austere English Gothic of the thirteenth century. It is built of an enduring stone and suggests durability and massiveness. It is solidly constructed. The foundations were laid fifteen feet under-ground and rest upon masses of concrete.

Entering the west doors and pausing in the beautifully carved narthex or vestibule, we find ourselves taking in the whole interior at a glance. In the distance is the High Altar and reredos in carven loveliness, above which rise the three east windows, setting forth in gorgeous coloring the Ascension of our Lord. We then see the Bishop's throne, the sedilia, the credence table, the altar rail, the choir screens, stalls and frontals, the parclose screens, the rood beam surmounted with a cross, the Bishop Beecher pulpit, the lectern, the litany desk, and the organ console, all delicately carved in the same wood and finish. Elevated on one side of the chancel behind an inconspicuous arched opening is one of the finest organs in the middle west, a three-manual instrument by Austin. It adds its ministry to the beauty of worship. The nave is long and narrow with vaulted ceiling, from which are suspended Gothic lanterns in bronze. The arches which separate the side aisles from the nave are architectural gems.

Passing through the north parclose screen we reach the Children's Chapel, equipped with its own altar, dossal, communion rail and cathedral chairs. Among the chapel windows is a beautiful rose window in the east.

A marvel of artistic beauty in the Pro-Cathedral is the magnificent carving of De Vinci's "Last Supper" in the center of the reredos, with the statues of St. Mark and St. John occupying canopied niches at each side. These were executed by one of the world's great wood carvers, Alois Lang, of Oberammergau, Bavaria, and the nephew of Anton Lang of Passion Play fame.

St. Mark's has been built to endure for ages. It has already proved that such a church was needed. The congregation has increased beyond expectations and is manifesting a new life—a life that is eager and vigorous. Then the Pro-Cathedral is the rallying place for the Church life in Western Nebraska. Usually the annual Convocations are held here, and we predict a greater and more intensified service in the years to come. Truly, the transmission of spiritual life will be the gift of St. Mark's to the coming generations.

In the meantime can we not hope that our two friends of the Church Press, in spite of wild rumors and in spite of adverse decisions, may be filled with a deeper and greater faith and zeal to carry on the work of speaking the truth as they see it and to continue to champion righteous causes that do not always have strong and active support?

A new testing time is upon us, and the world is justly asking us to give a reason for the hope that is in us, and to justify it by the consistency and self-sacrificing devotion with which we maintain its cause. There was something utterly noble and convincing in the statement which Christ made before Pilate when He said, in defence of His mighty mission: "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world."

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Deeper Than Tragedy.

The most unrelieved mission tragedy, humanly speaking, in recent weeks must be the death of Frederic Charles Hulett in India. Only a short time on the staff of the Oxford Mission to Calcutta, only twenty-six years old, beloved by every one who knew him, he was murdered in his room at night by a common thief who was hunting for the key to the mission safe. The head of the mission hastened to Barisal where the tragedy took place, and later wrote:

"It is not from the human level that we must contemplate it. I found a wonderful calmness at Barisal in the mission compound. One had the sense of Jesus Himself in the midst and His 'Peace be unto you' tranquilizing all hearts and banishing fears."

Famine Sufferers Find Relief in Anking.

The city of Anking, China, was invaded not long ago by a crowd of forlorn women and children driven in by famine from their outlying farms and villages. They grabbed the wheels of rickshaws and pulled at coat sleeves, begging food.

Anking has a group of Chinese business men who are organized as a Fellow Benevolence Society. They are not all Christians; one of the most active is a Buddhist who has no other occupation than his philanthropy. They gives clothes in winter, open rice kitchens during famine, supply coffins for the destitute, and so on.

When this invasion of famine sufferers took place, a committee of the society went through the streets of the city after midnight and picked up all the children between six and twelve years, who were sleeping on doorsteps in the rain, 139 of them. Mothers with children under six were taken along. The children were housed in two crowded rooms, sleeping on boards with sacking and a few quilts, which of course was wonderful after the rainy doorsteps. Some of them had been so long without food they could not at first eat the rice and vegetables given them. They were in bad physical condition with all the afflictions that follow neglect, dirt and starvation.

The men's society appealed to St. James' Hospital. The hospital turned to and vaccinated for smallpox and scrubbed, dosed, treated, dressed wounds, shaved heads and deinfested. The mission's religious education workers took turns going over to teach tooth-brushing, hand-scrubbing and other pleasant "games", and put up posters from the Chinese National Health Administration.

It was a good instance of cooperation between the mission hospital, which could not have provided funds personnel for the work and the Benevolent Society which had no medical resources. The hospital staff and pupil nurses took up a collection to buy 139 tooth-brushes, drinking cups and so on. The hospital prevented an almost certain smallpox epidemic.

The Municipal Broadcasting Station of Hankow, China, recently asked the choir from St. Paul's Cathedral to broadcast a program. One result was that at the time of the concert the long shopping street of Hankow and another crowded business street, where many shops have loud-speakers, were ringing from end to end with "Hallelujah" from Handel's chorus.

Ecclesiastes

(The Book of Ecclesiastes is one that is usually most difficult to understand. Even the profoundest scholars differ in its interpretation. The idea here used seems permissible, and has been of great help to a number of people. Thus it is used as one interpretation of a book that may make it live for young people of Service League age.)

ECCLESIASTES.

Leader: The program this evening has as its purpose the explanation of one of the books of the Old Testament. Its title, Ecclesiastes, in the Hebrew is Ko-hel-eth. It was the title given to a man that was a member of a kind of luncheon club, the Ko-hel-eths, that was formed by the Greek king of Egypt about 150 B. C. The book was written by a Ko-hel-eth to a college boy. But I would have you see it in dialogue form, so I have four characters. The Ko-hel-eth, named Samuel! Absalom, the servant; a Jewish mother worried by a wayward son, and the Doctor.

Koheleth is seated at his desk when his servant, Absalom, enters.

Absalom: Pardon, Master, but a woman of Israel is most anxious to see you. May I admit her?

Koheleth: My doctor tells me that my hour of rest must not be disturbed. But tell her I can see her for a few minutes, Absalom. What is her name?

Absalom: She calls herself Miriam, wife of Jonathan of Alexandria.

(He goes out.)

Koheleth: O vanity of vanities, all is vanity. Would that I had listened to him who was called the Prince of Jerusalem, my father, Abishai, and the Rabbi Ben Simon, had I done so I might now be able to go about instead of being paralyzed as I now am.

Miriam (entering): Koheleth Samuel, I am in dire need, and I believe that you, as a Jew, can help me, and will do so. So I have come to you.

Koheleth: What is your grief, my daughter?

Miriam: My son, Solomon, has gone to attend the school of the Rabbis in Babylon and he writes me that he is losing faith in the God of Israel and wasting his substance in riotous living. You, who are so learned and so well regarded, I am sure can write to him to make him change his life.

Koheleth: I know not if a letter would do him good. Perhaps if I could see him. But, no, youth will not listen to age. I remember my own youth.

Miriam: Where were you born, O Koheleth?

Koheleth: My father was a rich merchant in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. A most devout man. Every one considered him practically a king, so that it seemed I, too, would be king over Israel in Jerusalem. I applied my heart to seek and search out by wisdom all that is done under heaven. I went to the best schools and learned all they had to teach, so that I have seen all the works that are done under the sun. But I came to the conclusion that in much wisdom is much grief. So that I would not any longer listen to my teachers, but insisted my father send me into Jerusalem to see more of life.

Miriam: I wondered how you had happened to leave home.

Koheleth: I left home because I heard there was gay life in the city. I said in my heart, go to, now, I will prove the with mirth. But after a good deal of what we called "high life", I said of laughter, it is mad, and of mirth, what doeth it? and that I must find something more worthwhile.

Miriam: That is exactly the case with Solomon, my son; he makes a joke of everything except money, and he is always begging more money.

Koheleth: That was just my case, and my father, foolishly, gave me all I wanted, so I decided to be a great prince there in Jerusalem. I builded me houses, I planted me vineyards, I made me gardens and palaces and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruit, I made me pools of water to water therefrom the forests, where trees were reared, I bought menservants and maidens, I had great possessions, I withheld not my heart from any joy. But after a while I sickened of spending money. I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought and beheld all was vanity, a striving after wind.

Miriam: Oh, I wish that Solomon could see that there is nothing but vanity in so much spending.

Koheleth: So I decided to study philosophy and came to Alexandria.

Miriam: But the Rabbis tell us that Jerusalem is the most learned city, Koheleth.

Koheleth: But I had lost my faith by this time and decided to study heathen philosophy. I turned myself to behold wisdom and madness and folly, and here were to be found the great libraries.

Miriam: That is true, and did you find anything here?

Doctor (entering): Koheleth, if a man would keep late hours he should be in better health than you are. I must insist this conference soon cease.

Koheleth: True, doctor, but Miriam here wonders at my life. Sit down while I finish my story; it will not take long.

Doctor: All right, but hurry. (He sits.)

Koheleth: You see, Miriam, I found many philosophies. One taught that to everything there is a season, a time to weep and a time to laugh, a time to mourn, and a time to dance. But presently I saw that this philosophy, and many others, were but vanity until I came to the philosophy of the Epicureans, who taught that in happiness will we find truth, and that happiness is in doing good.

This was really what I had first learned in Jerusalem and rejected. But now I came back to my faith, and in helping the poor I found true happiness.

Miriam: Yet everyone says that you are always kind to those in need.

Koheleth: When I so began to help the poor, Ptolemy, the king, saw my works and honored me by inviting me to join his society of public benefactors called the Koheleths that eat at the King's table, and I was at last happy.

Miriam: So I have told Solomon again and again, but he tells me every young man must sow his wild oats.

Doctor: Yes, so they say, but Koheleth Samuel here can bear witness that those wild oats in his youth crippled him now in his age. As they will do to every man. Nature will not be cheated.

Koheleth: Yes, my daughter, paralysis came upon me. I remembered my Creator, but too late, and I would cry in the market place if I felt it would do good.

Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, or ever the evil days come and the years draw nigh when thou shalt say I have no pleasure in them. For the sins of my youth came upon me, and the sun and the light of the moon and the stars are darkened, for my eyes cannot see, from my disease, and the keepers of the house tremble; look at how my arms quiver with the palsy and the strong men, my legs, are bowed. I cannot even stand up, and the grinders, my teeth, cease. They have fallen out, and one shall rise up at the voice of a bird, one is so nervous. So I am a wreck in middle life because of my sins. If only I had remembered God when I was young.

Miriam: I never knew your story before, but it is just what I want Solomon to have. Will you not write down what you have told me?

Koheleth: I will do so, and you may call my letter, Koheleth, or the Book of Ecclesiastes, or perhaps the Wisdom for Solomon.

Doctor: But, O Koheleth, you must rest now. So farewell, Madam I must put my patient to bed.

Miriam: Farewell, Koheleth, and may God bless you.

Koheleth: Farewell, my daughter, and may He shed His peace on you and yours.

(They go out.)

Building in Boys.

Who builds in boys, builds Truth
And vanished hands are multiplied in power
And sounds of living voices, hour by hour,
Speak forth his message with the lips of youth.

Here is the House of Hope, whose doors are Love
To shape young souls in images of right,
To train frail twigs straight upward toward the Light,
Such work as this God measures from above.

BOOK REVIEWS

FRIENDS OF GOD, Practical Mystics of the Fourteenth Century: By Anna Groh Seesholtz. Published by Columbia University Press, 2960 Broadway, New York City. 247 pages. Price, $2.50.

This is perhaps the best book in the English language, at least on the subject of religious life and conditions in the Rhine Valley during the Fourteenth Century. The book is the production of a research work done by its gifted authoress in German and Latin historical and literary sources on the subject of practical mysticism as it found best expression in the lives and writings of such men as Meister Eckhart, Tauler and Suco, whom she calls, "Moralists and Agonists among the Friends of God", and others.

The first chapter on "Troubled Times", is a fine historical sketch on religious, social, racial and economic conditions in Western Europe during the Fourteenth Century. The book also contains much of Medieval church history that would make interesting reading. The last chapter on "Lasting Influence and Ideas of God's Friends", is a picture of how ideas bear everlasting influence on the people of all ages if they are spiritually imbued. This has a good message for our age and its present conditions, and how a social order can be reconstructed that would last longer than a material one. "The Friends of God . . . have some telling values as to the relation of the individual to the group and the value of religious experience in social reconstruction . . . with fortitude and persistence, they serve and save their fellow-men. They may be, all unaware, the saving remnant in this present world situation." (Page 220.)

THE FIRST BOOK OF PSALMS: By Albert C. Larned. Cloth; pp. 80. Published E. S. Gorham, Inc., New York City. $1.50.

Church people are aware that the Psalms are divided into five books. This section, closing with Ps. 41, comprises the treatise herein. Since it is devotional, one hesitates to view it critically; and yet there are some features which are open to question.

The second Psalm deserves more emphasis upon the resurrection. And the sentence, "I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance", does not, cannot refer to missionary achievement. For our Lord, in Rev. 2:26, 27, quotes this passage of the Psalm as indicative of the judgment which He will inflict upon the rebellious nations (Matt. 25:31-46). See St. Paul's version of this epochal event in 2 Thess. 1:7-10.

Spurgeon stated that David wrote his psalms out of the personal experience of every believer; and we may so believe. And yet, we cannot always put the Church into the Old Testament realm, as our author does quite fully in this book. But the tendency is so common that he is not to be criticized for this. The aim of the book is praiseworthy, the illustrations are suggestive, the result of the use of the book will prove itself in bettered lives.

We may wonder why the publishers attach such a price for a volume of eighty pages.

THE CHILDREN'S PARISH: By Mrs. Dorothy V. White. Cloth; pp. 179. Published by the Oxford University Press, New York City. $1.35.

Here is the book that enterprising rectors have been awaiting. It unfolds all the possibilities of the Scouts and kindred organizations embraced in an attachment to the Church, parochial and otherwise.

We are terrified over the official announcement that crime costs us thirteen billions a year. But we fail to consider that if we can get the potential criminal from five to twenty years continuously engaged in Christian activities, we shall win him away from the devious paths of iniquity. The love of adventure, organization and sympathetic fellowship is acutely alive in the bosom of the young If it can be harnessed to a worthy cause, the end is attained.

Then this treatise, which is largely a narrative and most interesting, invites attention to the perplexing problem of the confirmed boy or girl who drifts away. By the means of the Children's Parish, the interest is kept and the service of the young maintained. And, as well, the educational quality of this proposal is worthy of attention. Many of our vestrymen enter upon their duties wholly unprepared to understand their duties and responsibilities. The Children's Parish inducts the members into all the ways and methods of the mature organization. How worth while this is!

Mrs. White's entrancing story discloses that she dealt with very human boys and girls, with ordinary weaknesses and dynamic tendencies. But surely the Childrens Parish is for just such. And she has won her victory in a satfactory report (not prosy, but highly intriguing), and she leaves the reader, issuing a long breath and softly saying, "Wonders, I wish I could do that". And perhaps he (or she) will.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT NEWS.

Youth Moves Forward.

The Young People's Service League of the Docese of Florida, in annual convention, at Camp Weed, June 22 last, resolved to participate in the Forward Movement.

Adopting this as one of its major obectives for the season 1935-36, the Convention made the Forward Movement an integral part of its work, and recommended to the Forward Movement Commission of the National Church that it set up a special nation-wide program for young people that they, too, might participate in the glorious cause. Enthusiastically the representatives of the parochial organizations endorsed the plan of returning to their respective Leagues to encourage the use of the Forward Movement material by Leaguers, both individuals and groups.

"Follow On."

With a reredos of the blue water of St. Andrew's Bay and the Gulf of Mexico fading into the lighter blue of the clear sky; beneath the shades of palms upon a high bluff withdrawn from activities of the campus, stands the rustic altar of Camp Weed.

On it is a copy of the Summer Handbook of the Forward Movement Commission, together with a prayer for the Forward Movement of the Church. Early each morning the Bishop goes to the altar and marks the Scripture to be read for the day. After prayer and meditation, he goes on about his duties, and Hunter Ackids, alphabetically first on the list of campers, goes to the altar. Finishing his Scripture reading, prayer and meditation, he goes to Priscilla Adams, alphabetically second on the list of campers, addressing her with the two words, "Follow On". Each camper takes a turn at the altar until Mary Wicker and the Rev. Merritt F. Williams, last on the list alphabetically, have responded to the words, "Follow On". Thus Camp Weed, at the suggestion of Bishop Juhan, pursues the third phase of the Forward Movement, "Follow On".

The value of this singular-personal-corporate worship is threefold. The individual is brought to a definite point of meditation, with the intention of the Church going forward. Added to this is the psychological value of the personal act of positive service-inviting the next person to "Follow On". To the group at camp it brings a spirit of unity —to the Church it means a group bringing Her to Her Christ.

Minnesota Youth Dedicated to Forward Movement.

The young people at the Summer Conference of the Diocese of Minnesota, in session at Carleton College in Northfield, dedicated themselves to the strengthening of the Forward Movement. The Young People's Fellowship, representing four districts of the dioceses were led in their discussions by Miss Louise Hatfield. The service of dedication was read in Skinner Chapel by the Rev. Conrad Gesne on the morning of June 21. The purpose of the crusade is—"To identify themselves with Christ in a great spiritual adventure; to follow Him daily as a Challenge to the world; and to offer themselves as channels through which He may teach others."

"What the Eye Sees, The Heart and Mind Perform."

Cincinnati, Ohio.—A real contribution to the Forward Movement can be made by the preparation and presentation of pageants illustrating the whole idea of the Forward Movement, and what it may accomplish in the Church.

A pageant well conceived and carefully executed is often more moving and accomplishes greater results than many addresses and sermons. The Forward Movement Commission believes that the young people's societies can do much for the movement through this suggested medium of expression. In the local parish, as well as at neighborhood or diocesan meetings, the young people can aid in another way by preparing and displaying posters about the Forward Movement.

THE JUNE RECORD.

The good record of receipts in May has been maintained in June. Fifty-nine dioceses and districts have paid the proportion due on their "Expectations" and the total for all dioceses is above what is due.

Collections for 1935 are $28,443.61 greater than in 1934, but with the increase in "Expectations" the percentage of collections is 100.4 per cent against 104.3 per cent in 1934.

While these figures are good, there is a dry time ahead, unless individuals and parish and diocesan treasurers make provision for the payment of pledges during the summer.

A happy summer to all.

CHURCH PENSION FUND'S ASSETS FURTHER INCREASED, MID-YEAR REPORT SHOWS.

Life and Fire Insurance Sales of Fund's Affiliates Also Show Substantial Increases.

Further improvement in the market value of the investments of the Church Pension Fund of the Protestant Episcopal Church was noted today in the mid-year statement issued by Bradford B. Locke, Executive Vice-President. The assets of the Fund, of which William Fellowes Morgan is President, and J. Pierpont Morgan is Treasurer, now total $32,143,873.

"As of June 30, 1935," Mr. Locke said, "the total market value of the Fund's investments stood at $30,945,023, compared to a cost of $30,380,733. The total net losses taken by the Fund since its inception in 1917 have been $186,997, so that at the present time the entire Fund could be liquidated at a figure well in excess of cost. On June 30, it had a cash balance of $1,198,850. The Fund is not now and has never been involved in the mortgage or real estate situation."

For the first time since 1929 collections of pension assessments for the first half of the year have exceeded those of the similar period in the preceding year, Mr. Locke reported. Pension payments to beneficiaries are at their highest in the history of the Fund, being at the rate of $1,191,669 annually, representing an annual outgo of $3,264 a day. The income from investments is lower to the extent of 3.6 per cent from the total of the first six months of 1934, due, according to Mr. Locke, to the lower yields now available and a marked increase in the holdings of U. S. Government bonds at a low yield.

Mr. Locke also reported steady improvement for the Church Life Insurance Corporation and the Church Properties Fire Insurance Corporation, both of which are affiliated with the Church Pension Fund. The Church Life Insurance Corporation wrote 17.8 per cent more new insurance in the first half of this year than in the first half of 1934, and new annuity contracts showed an increase of 29.7 per cent for the corresponding period. The market value of its investments exceed cost by 2.8 per cent, and the income from its investments increased by 18.4 per cent.

The Church Properties Fire Insurance Corporation increased its insurance in force by almost $10,000,000 during the twelve months ended June 30, 1935, bringing the total insurance in force at present to over $68,000,000. Its investments also show a market value in excess of cost, and it has added substantially to its surplus during the first six months of the year. It has enjoyed an exceptionally low loss ratio of only 19.1 per cent in relation to its earned premiums this year, and the average since its organization in 1929 is only 29.7 per cent. The Church Properties Fire Insurance Corporation was established to enable Episcopal Churches to procure fire insurance protection at lower rates, and is operated only for the benefit of the Church.

THE MADISON CONFERENCE.
Madison, Wis., July 1-12, 1935.

The University of Wisconsin has held a School for Rural Workers for fourteen years. Men and women in the rural districts have offered to them the help of the University. Lectures are held daily by specialists. The ministers and leaders of the churches represented have group meetings during the school.

The Episcopal Church has her National Conference of Rural Workers at this school.

The Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, Executive Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, was the leader of the Episcopal Church Group. We did not have as many members of our group as in days past, because of financial reasons, but the Conference was a glorious success. The following were present:

The Rt. Rev. Theo. DuBose Bratton, D. D., from Mississippi; the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, New York; the Rev. Paul H. Barbour, South Dakota; the Rev. D. W. Clark, South Dakota; the Rev. David Coombs, Missouri; the Rev. Paul E. Engle, Texas; Captain Earl S. Eastabrook, Ohio; the Rev. Earl T. Kneebone, South Dakota; the Rev. Vernon McMaster, New York; the Rev. Robert H. Mize, Jr., Kansas; the Ven. M. B. Nash, Idaho; the Rev. R. R. Phelps, Ohio; the Rev. John R. Pickells, Illinois; the Rev. Val. H. Sessions, Mississippi; the Rev. Peter E. Spehr, Nebraska; the Rev. Wm. Whittle, Wisconsin. The women workers present were: Deaconess Edith Adams, Illinois; Miss Eena Eastwood, New York City; Mrs. G. E. Hutchinson, Illinois; Deaconess D. J. The Rt. Rev. Theo. DuBose Bratton preached the sermon at the Service of the Conference, held on the Sunday at Grace Church.

The Rural Workers' Fellowship.

The twelfth annual meeting and banquet were held on July 9. The Rev. Paul Engle, president, presided at both gatherings. The Rev. John Pickells, rector of Trinity Church, Chicago, and Treasurer and Circulation Manager of the Fellowship and Rural Messenger, the official publication of the Fellowship, gave a splendid report, showing the interest in the organization and its publication. It was wonderful to be able to report that there was no debt.

Those elected officers for the new year:

Honorary President—The Rt. Rev. Robt. H. Mize, Salina, Kansas.

President—The Ven. M. B. Nash, Coeur d' Alene, Idaho.

First Vice-President—The Rev. Paul E. Engle, Bay City, Texas.

Second Vice-President—Miss Olive M. Robinson, Alpena, Michigan.

Secretary—The Rev. Val. H. Sessions, Bolton, Mississippi.

Treasurer and Circulation Manager—The Rev. John R. Pickells, Chicago, Illinois.

The members of the Conference were indeed grateful to the Rev. Mr. Barnes for his many kindnesses and courtesies shown to all. A special resolution of thanks was given him for not letting the Madison Conference slip during this trying time for Rural Work, when we have no Secretary for Rural Work.

A special telegram was sent to the Rev. Goodrich Fenner, expressing our regrets that he was not with us.

The Rev. Paul E. Engle was in charge of the house and he was indeed kind to all, looking after the wants of each.

The following received certificates from the University of Wisconsin, showing that they are Rural Specialists, in that they have attended the school for three years, and that they have done a special piece of work: The Rev. David Coombs, Louisiana, Missouri; the Ven. M. B. Nash, Coeur d'Alene, Idaho; the Rev. R. R. Phelps, London, Ohio; the Rev. P. E. Spehr, Sidney, Nabraska.

A CHURCH ARMY WAY OF SECURING CHURCH SCHOOL ATTENDANCE.

Captain C. L. Conder, working near Scottsboro, Alabama, reported recently to Church Army Headquarters that—"Our Cumberland Mountain Bible School opened at 8:30 this Monday morning with an attendance of two small girls, whom we had collected en route, and a staff of four teachers. We literally had to 'bring them in, bring them in', bring them in from the fields, 'not of sin', as the hymn puts it, but of 'forgetfulness'. An hour of visiting among the shacks resulted in an attendance of thirty-five, and we had a happy and well-behaved and interested school, under the trees. On Tuesday, we had a large increase and a good school. At night held a cottage meeting under trees by moonlight, with a good number of men present."

THEY LOVE THE ARCHBISHOP.

A balloon invented by the Insurance Debating Society at Lloyd's, London, contained Bernard Shaw, Henry Ford, Mussolini, Einstein and the Archbishop of Canterbury. Disaster overtook the balloon and there was only one parachute. Whose life was most worth saving? The votes of the debating society were for: Shaw 1, Ford 1, Mussolini 8, Einstein 24, the Archbishop 130.

PROPPING UP THE LEANING TOWER.

The Leaning Tower of Pisa has been showing signs of sinking lately, and so it is now being reinforced with cement. A cement-bed is being made to prevent further movement. The centuries-old tower, or campanile, has been continuously "on the lean", and in 1910 it was sixteen and one-half feet out of the perpendicular. The foundations are not more than ten feet deep, and the whole tower is made of marble.

GLASS CHALICE FOUND.

A discovery which promises to be of great importance is reported to the Palestine and Bible Lands Exhibition. While excavating in a cave to the south of Antioch a small case was discovered which contained a glass chalice or cup. The cave bears many signs of having been used for a Christian church, probably in the days of persecution. Experts declare the cup to be of fine Roman work of a period 100 B. C. to A. D. 100. The case is of a later period and bears decorations which have not yet been identified.

There are several traditions concerning the Holy Grail, or the Chalice, used by Jesus at the Last Supper, such as Joseph of Arimathea, who brought it to England and founded the first Christian Oratory at Glastonbury A. D. 60. Then there is the story of King Arthur and his knights and their quest of the Holy Grail, but more particularly there is the historical account of Baldwin I, who, during the Crusades, conquered the town of Cesarea in 1101. In the record of the booty taken, we find "the crystal glass vase supposed to have been used at the Last Supper." How far the "Antioch Cup," as the newly-found cup is called, can be associated with the Holy Grail remains to be proved.—Church of England Newspaper.

SOCIAL SERVICE WELFARE WORKERS HOLD CONFERENCE.

The Social Service Welfare Workers of America held a most interesting conference at St. Hilda's Hall, Charles Town, W. Va., from July 1 to 14, consisting of fifty men and women from seventeen states. Classes were held daily at Peterkin Hall. Swimming, horseback riding and driving occupied the leisure hours, and many picnics on the river were enjoyed. The conference was lodged at St. Hilda's during the session.

AFTER THIRTY YEARS IN THE DAKOTAS.

It is a far cry from New York City in 1935, to an Indian school on the Dakota prairies in 1880. Miss Mary S. Francis, now in her eighty-eighth year, who has recently come to live in New York, her native city, went out to the Dakota Territory in 1880, crossed the Missouri River in a rowboat, and arrived on August 21, fifty-five years ago. She worked there for nearly thirty years, retiring because of ill health. She was thus in Bishop Hare's district through most of his episcopate. The future Bishop Burleson was a boy of fifteen when Miss Francis went out to her future field.

She knew all the pioneers and the early workers whose names have become well-known wherever the story of the Church among the Dakota Indians is told—the Peabodys, the Burts, the Ashleys, the older Delorias, the Aaron Clarks and their year-old baby, who is now dean of the Indian field.

She lived there before the Church's schools were built and before many of the postoffices were named. She taught in two or three schools opened by Bishop Hare, teaching and living in primitive conditions. She was sometimes postmistress, cashier, medicine dispenser and letter writer all in one, besides teacher. Once when a child was ill and needed constant watching, the only arrangement seemed to be for the child's bed to be placed in the school room, in front of the teacher's desk, Miss Francis tending the child and teaching the class at the same time.

Once in zero weather they looked up to see the icicles dripping rapidly from the eaves and found the building on fire. It burned to the ground. Once when the Bishop was with them at supper, the hanging kerosene lamp fell onto the table and another bad fire was only just prevented. One particularly bitter winter before the cellar of the house had been boarded up, rats burrowed in, let in the winter weather, and everything in the cellar froze solid.

When the ghost dance craze swept many Indians into a frenzy and troops were called out and Sitting Bull was killed, the mission, forty-five miles from a railroad, with one mail every two weeks, remained calm inside its barbed wire enclosure with Indian families and their animals camping on the premises for protection.

Miss Francis is now an invalid but no less interested than ever in the Church's work. A few of the Church Missions House staff have had the pleasure of calling on her, and left her reading the South Dakota Churchman.

CEDARS OF LEBANON.

The King of England is sending trees from Windsor to Nazareth for the King George V Jubilee Forest. It is sad to hear that the forests in the Syrian mountains from which Solomon obtained the cedars for his magnificent Temple have practically disappeared, and that only about 400 of the old giants remain. These are in an enclosure and the natives of the district believe that they have been there since before the time of Christ. It takes several men to encircle the great trunks.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. G. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Frederick D. Goodwin, D. D., Coadjutor.

———o———

The Challenge Has Been Met.

Shortly before Easter the diocese launched a campaign to raise $25,000 for the Whitsunday Offering. Of this amount $15,000 was to cover the shortage in the pledges from the diocese for the National Council; $6,500 was to go to St. Paul's Industrial School in Lawrenceville, and the remainder was for current diocesan expenses. The campaign was in charge of the Rev. L. Carter Harrison, rector of Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, who, with his able assistants, a volunteer corps of workers from St. Paul's School, has done a fine piece of work in presenting the cause to the people of the diocese. It is gratifying to learn as we go to press, that this amount has been raised.

We have just received the following statement from the Secretary of the Diocese:

Total receipts to date	$22,759.93
Unpaid pledges	2,785.61
Total in cash and pledges.	$25,545.54

It is a satisfaction to those interested in raising this much needed sum that the missions for which it was primarily intended will not have to suffer additional cuts because of the failure of Virginia to fulfill her promises.

S., games, stunts, speakers. Two guest speakers were the Rev. George P. Mayo, D. D., and the Rev. Harry Lee Doll. Mr. Mayo spoke on the work of the Blue Ridge Industrial School, and Mr. Doll on the Forward Movement.

The outdoor chapel, called the Chapel of St. Francis, was new this year and greatly appreciated and enjoyed by the members of the conference. In clear weather all services were held here. Each evening at vesper hour in the chapel Bishop Goodwin or Bishop Tucker addressed the whole conference.

The young people of St. John's Church, Tappahannock, gave as their contribution to the conference, a beautiful presentation of Bowie's "The Holy Grail", directed by the Rev. Edward Guerry.

A Pilgrimage to the Blue Ridge.

For a long time the members of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, Clarendon, have been interested in the Blue Ridge Missions and hoped that some day they might find it possible to visit them. This opportunity was afforded them through the generous hospitality of the Rev. and Mrs. Henry F. Batcheller.

A group of sixteen persons from St. George's Church in Clarendon, led by their rector, the Rev. Henry J. Miller, motored by way of Skyline drive through Charlottesville to Shadwell Estate, the birthplace of Thomas Jefferson, where they were the guests of the Rev. and Mrs. Batcheller, the present owners of Shadwell. The original house was destroyed by fire, but the new one has followed the architecture of those old colonial days, and its furnishings are in keeping with that period.

It was indeed a privilege to be entertained by the Rev. and Mrs. Batcheller and also Mrs. Mason, the wife of Archdeacon Mason, and her auxiliary.

The party, piloted by the Rev. Mr. Fiske, visited St. Anne's Mission at Alberene. Here Jewel Chapel, which had been located at Lydia and was financed through the sale of old jewelry, is being rebuilt at Alberene. The next missions inspected were St. John the Baptist Mission and Mt. Olive's Orphanage for Mountain Girls at Ivy, Blackwell's Hollow, under Captain Moss, and Mission Home, where a delicious luncheon was served. At Mission Home is located St. Anne's Preventorium for tubercular children. To visit the Preventorium was the main objective of the trip. This stone structure, 300 feet in length, was built by mountain workmen, and has accommodations for more than thirty children. Miss Annie Park is the Superintendent, and the group was greatly impressed with her faith and enthusiasm for her work. This work is carried on through voluntary contributions and by unceasing faith and labor.

En route home a brief visit was paid to the Blue Ridge Industrial School.

The experience derived from the personal contact with these Mission people has made every member of that visiting group realize more fully the importance of the work being done and has inspired them to give all possible aid to it in the future.

St. Barnabas' Day Service.

On St. Barnabas' Day, June 17, a special service of thanksgiving and intercession was held in the historic chapel of St. Barnabas' House of New York City. The service was conducted by the Rev. L. Ernest Sunderland, D. D., Superintendent of the City Mission Society, under whose auspices St. Barnabas' House has been operating for the past seventy years.

There were present friends of St. Barnabas' House, members of the Board of Managers of the Society (of which Bishop Manning is President), staff workers, and the Society's chaplains who serve in fifty-four hospitals and other institutions in and about New York.

Dr. Sunderland emphasized the special appropriateness of observing St. Barnabas' Day this year when St. Barnabas' House is filling a unique place in caring for the destitute of the city. With a capacity of one hundred and fifty, St. Barnabas' House shelters over two thousand homeless women and children, with 54,000 days' care, in the course of a year. Day and night for over seventy-one years, the door of St. Barnabas' House has never been closed to any destitute woman or child. They come from over one hundred and fifty other organizations, referred by clergy, city police, station-masters and other individuals who know that there is always a haven at 304 Mulberry Street.

Further special significance for this year's observance is found in the fact that St. Barnabas was one of the first relief workers in the Church. Early in the Christian era, during the reign of Claudius Caesar, when there was "great dearth throughout all the world", he sold all he had, including his vast holdings of copper fields in Cyprus, and gave for the relief of needy fellow-Christians. For this he was renamed Barnabas, which means Son of Consolation, or according to Hebrew usage, the personification of consolation.

St. Barnabas' House was begun in 1864, by the wife of the rector of St. Michael's Church in New York, and it was taken over the following year by the City Mission Society, which was then thirty-four years old. It has been continuously under the auspices of the Society for seventy years.

The Chapel in which the special St. Barnabas' Day service was held is part of a five-story building added to the original building by John Jacob Astor in 1877, and it bears the appropriate inscription over its altar, "Comfort Ye My People". Daily services are held for the guests of the house.

There has been a decided trend recently toward the white collar group amongst the lone women who come to the house for temporary care, although the greater part is made up of lone women with children. Their physical needs are met as far as finances will permit, and approximately one-half are placed in employment. The other half, after an average stay of twenty-seven days, are re-established in homes of their own, or sent to hospitals or other institutions especially suited to their individual needs.

So acute is the need this year for housing destitute women and children that the occasion of St. Barnabas' Day was used by Thomas S. McLane, first lay vice-president of the City Mission Society, to appeal for funds for its support. It costs approximately $60,000 a year to operate St. Barnabas' House.

Bible School Closes With Program.

A program and exhibit, Saturday, July 13, closed the vacation Bible school which was conducted last week at St. Mark's Episcopal Church. Forty-two children attended the school. There were six teachers, six helpers, and four women from other churches who assisted with the story-telling.

The closing program included incidents in Scripture showing God's plan of salvation, memory verses and songs. The Rev. Warwick Aiken, rector of the church, explained how a fish came to be used as a sign of a Christian at the time of Roman persecution and gave each of the children a small silver fish for a souvenir. Mrs. Aiken showed several charts and told how she had used them in teaching during the school.

Ice cream was served to eighty people, which included mothers of the children and their friends who attended the program and exhibit.

Faculty for the school included the Rev. and Mrs. Aiken, Mrs. R. C. Rousey, Misses Rebecca Meyers, Katharine Aiken, and Eunice Rimmer of Dallas. Helpers were Miss Annette Colier, Miss Jayne Powell, Meredith and Warren Jensen, John Hathaway, Jr., and Warwick Aiken, Jr.

Mrs. J. K. Crews, Mrs. C. R. Hooton, Mrs. W. P. Jennings, and Mrs. E. J. Turner, assisted with the story telling. —The Plainview Sunday Herald.

Native Natchezen Ordained.

Old Trinity Church, Natchez, has had a most wonderful history as a part of the Diocese of Mississippi. The first council of the diocese was held in this parish in 1826. The first Bishop of the diocese was also rector of Trinity, but the first native of Natchez to enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church was ordained to the diaconate in Trinity Church on July 14, 1935.

The candidate for Holy Orders ordained to the diaconate was Frank E. Walters, ordained by the Rt. Rev. Theo. DuBose Bratton, D. O. The sermon was preached by the Rev. George B. Myers of the Theological School at Sewanee: the Rev. H. E. Bush, Brookhaven, said the litany; the Rev. Joseph Kuehnle, rector of Trinity, Natchez, presented the candidate.

Early in the afternoon a dinner was given by the women of the parish at the rectory for the clergy. A reception for the Rev. Frank E. Walters was given in the parish house in the evening. More than 500 of the friends of the young clergyman, of all creeds and none, came to extend their congratulations and best wishes.

The Rev. Mr. Walters will assume charge of the Tupelo Field in the northeastern part of the diocese about September 1.

Trinity Church, St. Louis.

Arrangements have been completed for the purchase, by the Parish of Trinity Church, St. Louis, Mo., of the property of the Church of the Redeemer, formerly located a mile west of Trinity on Washington Boulevard. The congregation of Redeemer, after the resignation of their last rector, the Rev. Sumner Walters, who was called to the rectorship of Christ Church, Alameda, Calif., voted to disband, turn their property over to the diocese, and divide among the several other parishes in the vicinity. On the very generous terms provided by the Diocesan Council, Trinity has decided to purchase the church and parish house at the corner of Washington Boulevard and Euclid Avenue, and to place their present small church on sale.

The new plant will give Trinity a stone, English Gothic church, seating about 375 persons, and a brick parish house, completely equipped for neighborhood work, of which a great deal has been done in the past. The church was the gift of the Simmons family originally, in memory of their deacesed daughter. It is, of course, a larger and better-equipped plant than the one Trinity is leaving, and is felt to be located very strategically for the parish's work.

Trinity is one of the older parishes in Missouri. Founded in 1855 by the Rev. E. C. Hutchinson, it has been for most of its career solidly Angol-Catholic in its teaching and ministry. It was the mother-church of the Church of the Holy Communion, and of All Saints' Church, and W. H. Thompson, for many years the Senior Warden, was the founder of St. Luke's Hospital in St. Louis.

The Rev. James Boyd Coxe, D. D., rector of Trinity for nearly twenty-five years, resigned a year ago, to become Canon-precenter of the Milwaukee Cathedral. The present rector, instituted on December 2, last year, is the Rev. Stephen F. Bayne, Jr., for the last two years Fellow and Tutor of the General Theological Seminary.

Opportunity will be taken this summer to make certain rearrangements in the new building, which will include, it is hoped, a new, small chapel for the daily services, and a larger sanctuary. The new church will be formally opened in October, although the Sunday services will be transferred there immediately.

COLLECT FOR THE SIXTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY.

O God, who has prepared for those who love Thee such good things as pass man's understanding; Pour into our hearts such love toward Thee, that we, loving Thee above all things, may obtain Thy promises, which exceed all that we can desire; through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Amen.

I HAVE NOT FOLLOWED THY STEPS IN THE PAST.

Frances Charlotte Davis.

I have not followed Thy steps in the past,
But, Shepherd, in future Thy way will be mine;
I did not see Thee before as Thou art,
But now that I know Thee I long to be Thine.

Often I trembled at sound of Thy voice,
But, Shepherd, I proved Thee as loving and kind;
Fear came upon me at sight of Thy rod,
But it is to guard me from danger, I find.

I have not sounded the depths of Thy love,
But, Shepherd, I find Thee sufficient for me;
Twilight, or morning, or midnight or noon,—
Dear Shepherd, I'm leaving the future to Thee.

The Christian a Man-Mender.

Great is man's skill in handling engines of force; marvelous man's control of winds and rivers; wondrous the mastery of engines and ideas. But man himself is greater than the tools he invents. And man stands forth clothed with power to control and influence his fellows, in that he can sweeten their bitterness, allay their conflicts, bear their burdens, surround them with the atmosphere of hope and sympathy. Just in proportion as men have capacity, talent and genius, are they to be guardians, teachers and nurses for men, bearing themselves tenderly and sympathetically toward ignorance, poverty and weakness. And all the majesty of the Summer, all the glory of the storms, all the beauty of galleries, is as nothing compared to the majesty and beauty of a full-orbed and symmetrical manhood. Should there be in every village, and city a conspiracy of a few persons toward this refinement and culture, this beauty and sweet Christian living, the presence of these Christ-formed persons would transform our communities. One such harvestful nature carries power to civilize an entire city. We no more need to demonstrate the worth of the sane, sound, Christ-like character than we need to prove the value of the all-glorious Summer, when it fills the earth with fragrance, the air with blossoms and all the boughs with luscious fruit. Each Christian youth is He is to help and not hurt men. This is to walk in love. This is to overcome evil with good. This is to be not a printed but a living Gospel. This is to be a master of the art of right living and a teacher of the science of character building.—Newell Dwight Hillis.

Love's Channels.

From a single irrigation canal ran four channels. The first ran to an orange grove that was heavy with green fruit. The twigs were bent, and the trees were stooping under the bitter, straining burden. It was months before the harvest. But the water helped the trees to bear the load all those days.

The second ran to a newly seeded plat of ground. Seed had just been planted for wheat. It seemed a waste of precious water to spread it over a barren field. But the water made possible belief in the future harvest.

The third ran to a rugged field. Thorns and rocks and trash covered the surface. There was but little room for flowers or fruit. But the water helped to awaken hope for a beautiful garden.

The fourth ran to a field in the process of being torn up and turned and harrowed. Why should soil be so abused? But the water helped to make endurance possible in the light of the great purpose.

We are those soils. Some bear heavy burdens; some doubt the possibility of the future harvest; some see little good that can come from "among the "thorns"; some find it hard to endure the plow and harrow. But there is a refreshing stream that flows through opened channels to each of these fields and makes it possible for each to play well his or her part. Love enables us to bear the heavy load. Love envisions us to see the reasons and the good. Love encourages us to hope even when hope is gone.

James, the First Martyr.

"Are ye able to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" The short life of James was overshadowed with this prophecy of Christ. He was indeed to receive the blood baptism and to drink the cup of suffering. When one looks at his life he realizes that no other alternative existed for James. He was tempestuous, a Boanerges calling down fire from heaven to consume a village. He was ambitious, asking for the seat on the right hand of Christ in His kingdom. He was fearless, and would brook no interference with his plans. He was true musketeer.

This apostle is distinguished from the other James by being called the son of Zebedee, or the brother of John. Much is revealed to us of his parents in the Scripture narrative. The facts of his life history are much the same as those of John until the day of Pentecost. There is a great dispute among scholars about the number of men called James in the Bible, but there is no dispute about this man. We know that he was not the head of the early church, and that he did not write the epistle James, for he passed off the scene.

After Pentecost he and Peter were the intrepid leaders of the church until they aroused such opposition that James was beheaded and Peter almost met the same fate. One can imagine this fearless denunciation of Herod and his condemnation to death. Tradition says that he converted the executioner, who professed his faith and died along with James.—Selected.

Panic.

No man can afford to meet life in a panic. A runaway horse is a blind horse, his terrors are increased by the noise of his own galloping. He will injure himself and carry destruction to others. So the psalmist teaches us our lesson: when your foes come at you open-mouthed, do not run, but remember that you have a great Ally. God is on your side, and in His presence potentates, principalities and powers sink into insignificance. Let your fears generate trust. Whenever you discover your enemies and your peril, remember your Friend and your resources. There is no day when you can calculate on immunity from peril, but there is not a day when God is not present in your life as your refuge and strength.—John Gardiner in Watchman-Examiner.

THE CROSS.

Monica Williams.

The Cross—since once they lifted
Its love borne arms on high,
Has ever since existed
That men may live, not die.

For love and pain are mingled
Through all the ways of life,
But God through Grace has singled
The purpose of Life's strife.

For only pain is pleading
For a still greater love,
And only love is bleeding
Which shares its life with God.

Oh love alone is worthy
Upon the cross to bear,
The pain that is life's glory,
In love's full measure there.

Good Times—With or Without Money.

Patricia Brown hung her swimming suit on the line and came into the house. It was her duty to set the table for dinner, and this afternoon the plates, glasses and silver went on to the table with a clang and a bang.

"Are you in a hurry, Patricia?" asked her mother.

"No, mother," answered Patricia. "Why?" But her mother had disappeared into the kitchen. It was not until toward evening that Patricia had a moment alone with her mother, then she said: "It was no fun swimming at the Park Plunge today because none of the other girls were there."

"Why don't you girls all plan to go together some afternoon after school?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"The girls are not going to the Park Plunge any more," answered Patricia. "They say every one goes there, so they prefer to go to the Athletic Club to swim."

"I don't see why every one's going there should be an objection," answered Mrs. Brown. "The management of the Park Plunge looks very carefully after the health of the children and the cleanliness of the water."

"The girls say they prefer a private plunge like the Athletic Club. Their fathers are members of the club, so they can go there whenever they wish. Can't father join the Athletic Club?" asked Patricia.

But Patricia already knew the answer. The Athletic Club membership would cost quite a sum of money. Her father had suffered some financial losses recently and the whole family were helping to economize. Usually every one was very cheerful about it—Patricia included. So the subject was dropped for the time.

When Friday morning came, Mrs. Brown asked Patricia if she would like to have a little swimming party at the City Park Plunge after school and then bring the girls home to supper. Patricia agreed to ask them, but said that she did not believe they would come. At noon she told her mother that only one girl accepted. Mary Ann Mason would come. "The girls were lovely about it," said Patricia, "but they said that a noted swimming expert was to be at the Athletic Club on Friday afternoon and would give an exhibition in swimming, and then he would give a free lesson in stunt swimming—swimming while reading a newspaper, and things like that. So, of course, they could not miss that for my swimming party."

Mrs. Brown suggested that Patricia invite two younger girls who were near neighbors, and a new girl who had just entered school, and another girl whose father was not a member of the Athletic Club. Patricia rather reluctantly agreed.

So on Friday afternoon five girls with their bathing suits assembled at Patricia's home, and all together they walked over to the City Park Plunge.

At six o'clock, six rosy, tousled-haired girls came racing home, trying to see who would be the first to reach Patricia's house. "Supper ready?" called Patricia. "We are all starved—absolutely famished!"

"Hang your suits on the line," advised Mrs. Brown, welcoming the girls, "and then come in to the table as soon as you are ready. Dinner is served."

When they seated themselves at the table there was a shout of laughter, for Patricia's father was dressed like a chef and appeared at the dining-room door with a platter of baked ham in one hand and a large dish of scalloped potatoes in the other. Flitting around the table in white cap and apron was Patricia's mother filling tall glasses with orangeade. How good that dinner tasted! Hot dishes and salad disappeared miraculously, so did the home-made sherbet and cookies. And after it was all over, the chef and waitress sat down while the guests and Patricia served dinner to them in great style.

When they were all starting for home, they were very sincere when they told Patricia and her mother again and again how much they had enjoyed the swimming party.

Just as the last girl was leaving, Estelle Bradley passed on her way home from the Atheletic Club. She saw Patricia on the porch and stopped a minute. "Did you have a good time at your swimming party?" she asked.

"I'll say we did," answered Patricia, which was the truth indeed.

"Did you learn anything new from your swimming instructor at the Athletic Club?" she continued.

"He wasn't there," answered Estelle. "Had another engagement and forgot all about us, I suppose. Well, see you tomorrow," and Estelle went on her way.

The next day Patricia was quite gleeful when she reached home. She announced at once: "The girls all say they would have had much more fun at my party, and they asked me when I was going to have another one. And Margaret Wilson is inviting some guests to the Athletic Club next week for a swimming party and supper, and Mary Ann and I are invited. May I go, mother?"

"Why, surely," answered her mother. "That will be fine."

"Isn't it nice," continued Patricia, who was somewhat of a philosopher, "that a person can have as much fun without a lot of money as with it, if only she goes about it in the right way."

Trixie.

One of our friends who lives on a beautiful dairy farm brought us a small little puppy. We call her Trixie and the name just suits her. What a clever trick she played on us last week!

Our newsboy leaves our early morning paper on the front steps. We taught Trixie to pick it up, carry it around the house and lay it at the back door. The little dog knew she would not get any breakfast until she had done this for us. One bright morning Trixie was plainly worried. She ran to the front of the house and back to the kitchen door a great many times, whining pitifully, and occasionally letting out short, sharp barks.

"Why," said mother, "what is the matter with that pup? Hasn't the paper come yet?"

I looked out. There was no paper and it was past the boy's usual time. Trixie raced crazily back and forth, as if she had lost her mind completely.

We went to breakfast and forgot for awhile the little dog and her troubles. Suddenly, in the midst of the meal, there came a mighty scratching on the back door. I got up and opened it, and what do you think I saw A stack of papers a foot high piled up there, close against the screen.

The puppy wagged her tail happily and darted around the corner to return within the minute, bringing another paper.

I looked at my mother, my mouth open. The newsboy's supply must have given out before he got to us and he had gone back to the corner for more.

Trixie, hungry, no doubt, had decided not to wait any longer, but helped herself to all the copies of the morning paper she could find in the block. She twinkled her eyes and thumped her tail on the porch as much as to say:

"Now, haven't I worked this morning? Don't I deserve a fine breakfast?"

We agreed that the little puppy had done the best she could, and while she eagerly lapped her milk, I carried all the papers back to their owners.—Child's Gem.

LIFE GOES AND COMES NOT.

Life goes and comes not; so I thought and said
Joy ebbs, but flows not; how shall I secure
The joy that never ebbs, the life that ne'er
Departs, abiding like the constant sky
Or everlasting hills I must be filled
Out of a fountain which is always full;
So shall my life be life indeed, my joy
Be deep and tideless. Poor, I knit myself
To the eternal treasure; weak, I bind myself
To the eternal strength; imperfect, I
Put on Divine perfection; steeped in evil,
I clasp the eternal goodness; sad and empty,
I claim the fulness and the joy which from
The heaven of heavens have visited this earth,
That men might be as God, and earth as heaven.

—Horfatius Bonar.

Finding Relief.

Have you never found relief when you could tell a friend what you were passing through? Well, God invites you to make a friend of Him. He can be better than any earthly friend, for many reasons. He is never weighted with care Himself, and our earthly friends often are. He is always at hand, and earthly friends cannot be. He is always ready to listen, and can impart to us His own peace, which others cannot do. Moreover, we can tell to Him what we could not breathe into any human ear.—Russell Elliott.

Not Too Much For An Indian.

An Indian one day asked Bishop Whipple to give him two one-dollar bills for a two-dollar note. The Bishop asked, "Why?" He said, "One dollar for me to give to Jesus, and one dollar for my wife to give." The Bishop asked him if it was all the money he had. He said, "Yes." The Bishop was about to tell him, "It is too much," when an Indian clergyman, who was standing by, whispered: "It might be too much for a white man to give, but not too much for an Indian, who has this year heard for the first time of the love of Jesus."

IN HIS LIKENESS.

Mabel Brindley.

Sometimes I doubt, for God is good they say,
And yet men hate in this, God's universe.
Quarrel and fight and block each other's way
And find delight in making bad grow wrong,

But good exists. I've seen a human hand
Already worn by work that fills a day
Take time from meager rest at its command
To calm a fear and set a child to play.

I've seen a human soul that met with wrong,
Without a thought of vengance left undone,
Say, "I forgive. Come, hold my hand. Be strong."
I've seen good, yes. And God and good are one.

A Bag of Salt.

Stanton was late getting home from school. There were so many interesting things to see that he forgot the days were getting shorter and he must hurry. There was the little flock of birds feeding in a sheltered spot where he had scattered grain on the way to school. There was the gray squirrel whose home he had been trying to discover for weeks. Only an hour ago he had found it in the old walnut tree.

Suddenly Stanton remembered that Sister Anne had promised to make cocoanut fudge after supper, and he started for the house on the run.

Anne met him at the kitchen door. "Did you bring the salt, Stanton?" she asked. "We're going to have baked potatoes for supper, but there isn't any salt to eat on them."

Stanton hung his head. "Oh, I forgot to stop at the store," he faltered. "And mother said she'd need the salt early in the morning for her butter, too. I'm sorry. I'll run over to Jimmy's and borrow a bit."

"Not until after supper," answered Anne. "It's all ready, so we'll have to get along without the salt."

There was orange shortcake for supper, and Stanton liked orange shortcake, so he didn't hurry about leaving the table. When he did get up, he noticed that it would soon be dark. Hurrying into the pantry, he picked up the first bag he saw and five minutes later he was running across the back lawn.

The snow that had fallen early in the week had melted a little, then frozen, and Stanton's shoes made a loud, crunchy noise as he hurried down the lane, across the bridge over Mile Brook, then up the long hill to Jimmy's house.

Jimmy had a new puzzle, and Stanton stopped to try his luck at putting it together. When he finally started for home it was really dark except for the stars shining overhead. Stanton wished that he had remembered to get the salt at the store in town instead of having to borrow it of Jimmy's mother.

"I guess I'll go through the south pasture then I won't have to cross the brook again," Stanton said to himself. "It'll take longer but I don't like to go past all those juniper trees at night." So he climbed the fence into the south pasture. Soon his shoes were again making that crunchy noise on the crusted snow.

Suddenly Stanton stopped stockstill and listened. What was that noise behind him? Some one must be following him. He could hear feet on the snow. Perhaps it would be safer to run.

So Stanton started to run, but the snow was slippery in places, and he came very near falling flat on his back. He couldn't hear the feet so plainly now, but he didn't dare look behind him to see whose feet they were. And he didn't want to call for Jimmy to help, for Jimmy would think he was a "fraid cat".

Three minutes passed. Then a sudden thought caused Stanton to stop in the middle of the pasture. Why, Jimmy might have forgotten something important he wanted to tell him and be trying to overtake him now. He would think he was running away from him. He guessed he'd better call back to him, after all.

So Stanton put his hands to his mouth and shouted, "Whoo-oo! Who-oo! Jimmy, are you there?" But no one answered, so Stanton trudged on for five minutes more. Then came the sound of feet on the snow, louder than ever this time. What should he do?

Stanton wanted to scream, but he didn't. Instead, he thought of the little song his class had sung so many times, "God will take care of you through the night." It was night now, and up from Stanton's heart went a little prayer that God would take care of him. Then he noticed that the stars looked friendly and he felt better. He was almost at the end of the pasture. If only the feet making that crunchy noise on the snow didn't come too near! If he only dared look around and see whose feet they were! Why, he did dare. He would look right now.

And Stanton looked. A moment later he broke into a merry laugh; for there, only a dozen rods away from him, were Snowball and Molly and Trude and Wooly, Jimmy's father's sheep. All at once Stanton realized that his bag of salt had grown very light, and, feeling of it, he found a small hole. The salt had gone slowly through this, and the sheep had smelled it and followed him.

But how did they get into the south pasture? Did he leave the gate to anything open? It was bad enough to make father and mother and Anne eat their baked potatoes without salt without being to blame for this, too. And how was he going to get the sheep home? Was there enough salt left to tempt them?

Stanton had sometimes helped Jimmy salt the sheep, so now he scraped what salt he could from the bag and started back. "Co'day! Co'day! Co'day!" he called, and Snowball and Molly and Trude and Wooly followed him. Halfway across the south pasture Jimmy came hurrying to meet him.

"Oh, Stanton, you're a good friend to bring the sheep home," he exclaimed. "We turned them into the long shed just before supper, and I forgot to fasten the gate. I was scared for fear they'd get into the road. Thanks a lot. But how did you ever do it?"

"With the little bit of salt that was left in my bag," answered Stanton. Then he went on to explain about the hole. "I guess I'll have to borrow a little more salt for the butter," he said soberly. "Next time I'll remember a lot of things I forgot tonight."

"Guess I'll remember some things, too," returned Jimmy. "I'm thankful the sheep are all safe."—Alice Annette Larkin, in Zion's Herald.

TO DRESS UP ORDINARY DAYS.

There are so many little ways
To dress up ordinary days:
The planning of a sweet surprise
To gladden weary, wistful eyes
A little word of hearty cheer
That turns to faith another's fear;
A friendly call, a token slight
May make a lonely pathway bright.
For when love in hearts has space
To shed abroad its happy grace,
It finds a thousand tender ways
To dress up ordinary days.

A Big Surprise!

Shhh! don't make any noise!

Now come with me into my kitchen. . . . Walk with me real quietly. . . . There! see on that shelf? . . . It's too high for you? . . . All right, stand up on this chair. . . . Now, can you see? . . . Umm! look at your eyes. No wonder they are big. You didn't expect to see that, did you? Notice how the mother wren is watching us, for fear we will get too close. . . .

Oh! and look! there are two of her little baby birds, working their heads out from under wings. They look like they are fast asleep. . . . You can't see the little birds very well? Want to get closer? All right, let's slide the chair right up close. . . . Whew! did that scare you? That was the mother bird flying past. See her perched on the ledge right under that little hole up near the ceiling? Now she's gone. . . .

But we can see the little birdies better. . . . Can you count them? . . . "One, two, three, four, five." . . Yes, Mrs. Wren has five little baby wrens—regular quintuplets, aren't they? . . . Oh, my goodness, did you ever see such a big mouth on such a little bird? . . . Now they are all opening them, begging for food. . . .

And listen to them! all crying at once. That mother bird certainly has a big responsibility, with five little mouths—or rather, five big mouths on five little birds—and all begging for food at the same time. . . .

Now, you've look at the little birds long enough. Let's get back out of the way and watch for Mrs. Wren to come home from the grocery store. . . . We can sit here on this stool in the doorway, and be real quiet, and she'll soon come back. . . . I don't think we'll have to wait very long. Suppose we don't say anything and maybe she'll come back quicker. . . .

Shhh! there she comes! . . . See her perched in that little hole? . . . and she has something in her mouth. . . . There she goes to the nest. . . . And before she can even ring the front doorbell those five little birds start greeting her. . . . Goodness, don't they sound greedy? Or, maybe that's just the very best etiquette as prescribed by the Wrenland Emily Post. . . . Now, they are all feed, and see the mother hovering down over them? She says it's time for another nap. . . . Oh! yes, little birds have to take their naps regularly every day, if they want to be strong, healthy birds when they grow up. . . . We can go now, because we don't want to disturb them any more. . . .

But I surely am glad you got to see them, right in their nests, and really and truly in our kitchen. Lots of people thought I was just using my vivid imagination when I wrote about the "Five Wee Speckled Eggs" on my kitchen shelf. Now, you can say you actually saw them there!" . . .

I don't know how long Mrs. Wren will leave her babies in the nest. They are now eight days old and they seem perfectly contented and happy. In fact, I hope they are so happy that they will stay a long time. Mrs. Wren seems to have no fear of our cook, for she goes in and out, many times during the day, flying right over the cook's head. Back she comes in a few minutes, and I suppose she must go to the Wrenland corner grocery, for she always has a good supply of the very best food for baby wrens.—Mrs. A. B. Brown, in Christian Index.

Runaway Rufus.

"Such a lovely spring morning!" mewed Rufus, a little white kitty, as he ran out of the garage when Bobby's daddy left the door open. It would be simply perfect if it were just a bit warmer. Anyhow, it was much too nice to sit on the doorstep waiting for Bobby to get up; so he'd stroll down the alley and see what he could see.

Of course, both Bobby and his pretty mother had told him over and over again that he must never go away, for kitties were always much safer at home. But he guessed there wasn't anything to hurt him just a little way down the alley, so Rufus started on.

He had trotted along almost two blocks, gazing about at everything, when suddenly he heard a gruff, "Bow wow!" right behind him.

"Oh, my claws and whiskers!" trembled the kitty. He ran as fast as ever he could and crawled in under a woodpile in somebody's back yard. Why, oh, why, hadn't he stayed home where Bobby had told him to? "Oh, oh," he whimpered, crouching low, and stiff with fright. He heard feet above him. Something went, "Sniff, sniff"—then a voice, "Now, Tige, bad dog, come away from there! Go right back home. Go on now!" and the feet that the little cat had heard pattered away.

Next, the wood was being thrown to one side. Pretty soon the shivering kitten was grasped around his middle and lifted out. Now he would be taken far away. He'd never, never see Bobby again. Oh, how terrible!—but, as Rufus peeped shyly from the corner of one eye, he saw that a gentle little girl was holding him in her arms. How good it did feel when he was so cold and frightened! Now she was carrying him into a house.

"Mother, just look!" called Ella Jo, as she opened the kitchen door. The kitty was white, and soft and fuzzy, and his toes were very pink from the cold. "Oh, mother, isn't he cunning? He's surely lost and hungry, so can't I give him some of my nice warm mush and milk?"

"Why, yes, dear, we must feed the rusty little thing."

So then the kit was happy and cried no more. Presently he looked up into Ella Jo's face and purred. His big, wondering eyes said very plainly, please lovely little girl, can't I be your kitty always?"

And the child soothed his white coat and patted his soft head as she whispered back :"Yes, sweet, I think you're going to be my own deary kitty forever and forever!"

Ella Jo took such good care of her new kitten that he was sleek and playful. He often chased a string or a catnip mouse; but, best of all, he loved to romp with one of mother's old shoes. Then Rufus would roll and tumble, bite and kick, while Ella Jo looked on and laughed till she cried at the funny antics.

In pleasant weather these pals played on the porch in the fresh air and sunshine, while mother was busy inside. When Rufus was tired of romping, his small mistress put him on her doll's bed in a sunny corner to take a nap. One day Ella Jo told him, "Now, my little Rufus, I'm going in to help mother do the dishes. I do hope you'll stay till I come back, won't you?" Then she patted his soft silky coat, and went inside.

Rufus blinked and yawned and shut his bright eyes tight for as long as half a minute, then they popped wide open again. My, my what a fine day to be just sleeping! He believed he'd take a short walk as far as the gate, and look around a bit. Oh, no, he wouldn't go any farther at all. He remembered quite well how a very few days ago that big dog had almost caught him. Then, besides, he wouldn't do anything really to displease Ella Jo, for he did love her so, even better than Bobby!

So Rufus jumped up and sat on the gate in the warm spring sunshine. Pretty soon a boy came along. The kitten started to climb down and ran; but saw, upon looking closer, that it was the nice freckled-face Tommy who left their milk every day.

"Oh, hello there, you little white kit! Why, you belong to Bobby over on the next street, don't you, now?" And Rufus mewed a faint, "Yes, I do; but I'd so much rather stay with Ella Jo, please, and be her kitty.

Tommy lifted Rufus to his shoulder and went on to the back porch with the milk. "Oh, hello, Ella Jo! Do you know whose kit this is?"

"Why, he's Rufus, my kitten, Tommy! I drove away a big, bad dog that was trying to get hm. I brought him to the house and fed him. Isn't he a lovely white kit?"

"He sure is a nice one, Ella Jo, but he really belongs to little Bobby on the next street over. I've seen him there ever so many times. Just this morning Bobby was crying 'cause his kitty is lost. But I must hurry. Good-bye, Ella Jo."

"Good-bye, Tommy," answered Ella Jo in a mournful, small voice.

The child stood by the steps and hugged the kitten close. She lovingly smoothed its fur. "Oh, my sweet little precious, how can I ever let you go?" and the big tears chased each other faster and faster down Ella Jo's face. "But," she told Rufus after a minute, "if you had been my kitty first, and you got lost and went to Bobby's house, I'd want him to give you right back to me, wouldn't I? I'd think he was a real bad boy not to do it."

Ella Jo's throat ached with grief, but she tried very hard to stop crying, and pretty soon she went into the house.

"Mother dear, did you hear what Tommy said about the kitty?"

"Yes, darling."

"Well, mother, I guess I'd better take him right over to Bobby."

"I think you had, dearie," and mother very tenderly kissed her small daughter, and dried her tears.

A short time later, Ella Jo, with Rufus on her shoulder, rang the bell at a white house back from the street. A sweet-faced lady came to the door.

"Is this where Bobby lives, please?"

"Yes, dear, come right in, won't you? Oh, look here, Bobby! He's been crying all morning for his little lost Rufus kitty."

The small boy's face brightened with smiles as Ella Jo handed the kitten to him.

"Oh, pretty kit, pretty kit," the child went on as he held his pet tight in his arms. "Bobby does love you so! Please, please, don't ever go away any more!"

As soon as the kitten was put down he rubbed around Bobby's fat legs and started purring. Then the boy laughed and clapped his hands with joy.

Ella Jo watched Rufus with a sad little smile, then: "I must go, for mother told me not to stay long."

"Thank you so much, my dear," said Bobby's mother, "for bringing the kitty back home. You must come real often to see Bobby and Rufus. I'm sure you'll all have fine times playing together."

"Good-bye, Bobby—good-bye, sweet little Rufus," and Ella Jo stroked the silky fur with her cheek. I'll be seeing you both tomorrow!"

Ella Jo smiled at them all as she ran up the street toward home. Two big tears tumbled down when she caught a last glimpse of the kitten; but as she thought of little Bobby's shining face, Ella Jo was happy —The Sentinel.

Man with his burning soul
Has but an hour of berath
To build a ship of truth
In which his soul may sail—
Sail in the sea of death,
For death takes toll

DEATHS

MRS. THOMAS NELSON LANGHORNE.

On Sunday morning, April 28, 1935, ANNA KATE HEWITT LANGHORNE died at her home "Wyndholm" near Evington in Campbell County, Virginia. The funeral services were conducted by Bishop Robert Jett at the Church of the Good Shepherd.

Mrs. Langhorne was born on August 26, 1850, in Pittsylvania County and was the oldest daughter of Dr. Richard Newton Hewitt and Frances Dorothea Michie of Albemarle County. When she was a baby her parents moved to "Otter Oaks" east of Evington where for many years her father was a loved physician in the county. Here she spent her girlhood and young womanhood. On October 8, 1878 she was married there to Thomas Nelson Langhorne of Lynchburg, a young civil engineer who had recently come to that part of the county in connection with railway development. They lived for all the years of their married life at "Wyndholm" and their home become the center of friendship and warm hospitality for a wide circle of family, acquaintances and friends. Mr. and Mrs. Langhorne were confirmed by Bishop Randolph and remained all their lives devoted members of the Church of the Good Shepherd, one of the four churches in Moore Parish. Mr. Langhorne was for many years an active vestryman and junior warden of this church until his death in April 1925. The family consisted of five children—Mrs. Smelzer V. Kemp (Frances Michie Langhorne) of Lynchburg; Chiswell Dabney Langhorne, died 1922; Richard Hewitt Langhorne, John Scaisebrooke Langhorne, and Mrs. Charles W. Haden (Kitty Langhorne) all of Evington. Of Mrs. Langhorne's own family only one sister, Miss Betty Hewitt of Evington, survives her.

Mrs. Langhorne was a woman of beautiful character, consistently Christian in every thought and deed through all the years of a long and unselfish life. She was a woman of sincerest kindliness, understanding sympathy and insight—warmly generous and affectionate. Her personal charm was felt by a wide group of relatives and friends in Campbell County and wherever she was known throughout Virginia. Her service to her church was active and unfailing and in herself she was the true exemplar of a faith profound and clear. The many friends who loved and appreciated her can never forget the truth and purity of a life so devotedly lived in the daily triumph of the Christian faith.

tant work among the sick people of Honolulu.

With its new name and its modern methods, people do not always realize that its roots extend back nearly half a century, to days when hospitals were not so efficient as at the present time and when the curative value of building up the morale of patients was not fully appreciated.

The Hospital Social Service Association was an outgrowth of the Hospital Flower Society, which was organized here in 1890. In those days, Florence Nightingale was still alive, waging her battle for modern nursing and for the inclusion in the efforts of doctors and nurses of more than alleviation of pain.

Full-time Workers.

From annual sales and from the contributions of members is raised the modest budget with which the association employs five workers, including three at the Queen's Hospital. An eye worker, paid by the territory, also works in cooperation with the association's representatives. An average of more than 500 cases a month are cared for by the group.

This is a far cry from the original work of the society, although it takes the same general objective as was laid down in the first article of the Hospital Flower Society constitution in 1890: "To encourage the spirit of benevolence and to promote sympathy among the ladies of Honolulu with the sick in the hospital."

The Rev. Alexander Macintosh, canon of St. Andrew's Cathedral and for many years prominent in island life, is credited with having organized the women of Honolulu into the flower society. Many of the families still well known in the islands were represented at the first meeting.

Royalty Interested.

The queen and the princess of the royal family were among those taking an interest in the society in the early days.

When the suggestion was made that flower beds be established on the grounds of the Queen's Hospital, Her Majesty the Queen, HRH Princess Liliuokalani and HRH Princess Poomaikalani "offered to support the care of flower beds," says an account of the history of the society. "The princess also attended the meetings and took part in the committee work of distributing flowers to the patients in the wards.

The true spirit of social service was evident in the early days of the society when much was done for the comfort of individual patients outside of the weekly visit of the flower committee. Personal interest was taken in many of the individual cases and often continued for a long time after the patient was discharged from the hospital."

Ordination of the Rev. Shannon Walker.

The date announced for the advancement to the priesthood of the Rev. G. Shannon Walker of Kealakekua was the last Sunday in June, but the Bishop's absence makes it necessary to defer the ordination. August 8, the Feast of the Transfiguration, has been set for the ordination tentatively, contingent upon the Bishop's return.

Visit of the Fleet.

For a number of days during May more than one person out of every seven in Honolulu was an officer or enlisted man of the U. S. Navy. On some days no less than 25,000 men came ashore. We express great satisfaction at the discipline maintained. Obviously every effort on the part of the naval authorities was made to uphold the good reputation of the Navy. There is no doubt that they succeeded to a remarkable degree. On all sides favorable opinions were heard, and Honolulu was impressed by the fine type of enlisted men, who seemed to be an intelligent cross section of all ranks of our people. Our city did not fail to extend to the visitors the welcome and hospitality for which it is famed.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman D. D. Bishop.

Two New Members for Cathedral Council.

The election of Douglas Southall Freeman, LL. D., editor and author, of Richmond, Virginia, and Harry Lee Rust, Jr., of Washington, to membership on the Council of Washington Cathedral is announced with much satisfaction by the Bishop of Washington. Their nominations were confirmed at the last semi-annual meeting of the Council, and they will attend their first meeting next November.

As author of the definitive biography, "R. E. Lee," which won the Pulitzer prize from the Columbia School of Journalism this year, Dr. Freeman has proved hmself to be one of the foremost leaders of thought in the South. Born in Lynchburg, Virginia, in 1886, he received his A. B. degree from Richmond College in 1904. After serving as a fellow at Johns Hopkins University for two years, he received his Doctor of Philosophy degree from that institution in 1908. The honorary degree of Doctor of Laws has been conferred upon him by Washington and Lee University, William and Mary College, the University of Richmond, and Wake Forest College.

Dr. Freeman began his journalistic career with the "Richmond Times-Dispatch" in 1909. He served as secretary of the Virginia Tax Commission for two years and then became associate editor of the "Richmond News Leader" of which he has been editor since 1915. He was civilian aid for Virginia to the Secretary of War from 1923 to 1928. He is a member of the Alumni Council of Virginia Colleges; a trustee of the University of Richmond, and of the Children's Memorial Clinic; secretary and trustees of the Confederate Memorial Institute; member of the advisory board of the Confederate Museum; member of the National Economic Council, Southern Interracial Commission; vice-president of the Battlefield Parks Association; president of the Edgar Allan Poe Shrine; member of the National Council, Boy Scouts of America; historical consultant for Virginia for the United States Department of the Interior, and member of the State Planning Board of Virginia. He received the "Parchment of Distinction" awarded by the New York Southern Society in 1933, and is president of the Southern Historical Society. A member of Phi Gamma Delta, Phi Beta Kappa and Omicron Delta Kappa, he is a Democrat and affiliated with the Baptist Church.

Dr. Freeman is the author of "Reports on Virginia Taxation," 1912; "Robert E. Lee," a monograph published in 1922; "Virginia—A Gentle Dominion (In These United States)," 1924; "The Last Parade," 1932, and other studies in Virginia and in Confederate military history, quite apart from the five volume biography of General Lee which has appeared recently. He married Miss Inez Virginia Goddin of Richmond in 1914 and they have two daughters and one son, making their home at 806 Westover Road in Richmond.

Dr. Freeman delivered the address at the first memorial service for General Robert E. Lee to be held in the Great Choir of Washington Cathedral on January 13th. He has been a member of the National Cathedral Association for some years and has been associated with Dean Carl W. Ackerman, another member of the Cathedral Council, as lecturer at the Columbia School of Journalism, New York City.

Harry Lee Rust, Jr., the other new member of the Council, has come to the front during the last few years as one of the effective young leaders in community and civic work in the Na? tional Capital. He was born in Washington August 3, 1893, and is the son of the treasurer of the Diocese of Washington. After attending public schools, he studied at St. Albans, the National Cathedral School for Boys, for two years and entered Lehigh University in the class of 1916. He was forced to withdraw two years later on account of ill health, and worked for eight months in the coal fields of Kentucky.

During the World War he enlisted as a Seaman, Second Class, and was commissioned as Ensign, U. S. N. R. F., on April 18, 1918. He received his honorable discharge as Senior Lieutenant on August 25, 1921. Since that date he has been associated with the H. L. Rust Company, which his father founded, and is now vice-president and treasurer.

Mr. Rust married Miss Mildred Anderson on October 7, 1916, and they have a daughter and a son, the latter a student at St. Albans School. Mr. Rust is a member of St. Paul's Parish, Washington Circle, where he was baptized and confirmed. He is a director of the Acacia Mutual Life Insurance Company and the Security Storage Company. He makes his home at 2101 Connecticut Avenue in Washington.

This new member has rendered notable service through the Washington Community Chest since its inception seven years ago. After serving as chairman of the Metropolitan Unit and vice-chairman of the general Campaign Committee, he became campaign chairman for the 1934 effort when approximately $1,600,000 was raised to meet the needs of seventy local agencies. Mr. Rust will act as vice-icharman under Dr. William McClellan in the 1935 campaign which is now being organized. In his work for the Community Chest he has been associated with the Bishop of Washington, Canon Albert H. Lucas, headmaster of St. Albans School, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes, Coleman Jennings, Esq., Rear Admiarl Cary T. Grayson, National Chairman of the American Red Cross, Corcoran Thom, Esq., Robert V. Fleming, Esq., an dother leaders of the Cathedral enterprise.—The Cathedral Age.

Tithing.

Tithing is the answer to the Church's chronic financial problems. What is it? Based upon the promise that all we have is a stewardship for God—it is simply this: One-tenth of all income plus one-tenth of the rental of a house wholly owned and used as one's residence is scrupulously and joyfully set aside as God's property to be administered for Him. This tenth should be ethe first tenth taken out before any of the income eis spent. Out of this fund can be paid the regular subscription to the Church, gifts to thee Community Chest, and to special appeals for benevolences. What does it accomplish?

1. It puts joy into giving. Instead of the everlasting grumble over "Many appeals," there is the joy of administering God's fund.

2. It makes an intelligent giver. One gives not reluctantly and yet no indiscriminately but wisely as the trustee of a sacred trust.

3. It provides an adequate share of cne's income for enterprises which must be supported by unselfishneses.

The government allows a 15 per cent reduction from the income tax schedule, as if to say 10 per cent for the tithe and 5 per cent extra for gifts. And yet in 1929 the average report on income tax showed less than an average of two per cenet given away by individuals; a great host of clergy and laity have tithed for years. They are the ones who in largest measure support the Church.

Think it over!—Bishop Stewart.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

Happy are we if we accept truth in whatever form it may come to us!

It is magnificent to grow old, if one keeps young.—Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick.

"There is no need for sad despair,
When God is shining everywhere."

Next to knowing when to seize an opportunity, the most important thing in life is to know when to forego an advantage.

"Ill that He blesses is our good,
And unblest good is ill,
And all is right that seems most wrong,
If it be His sweet will."

"Truth, be more precious to me than the eyes
Of happy love; burn hotter in my throat
Then passion; and possess me like my pride;
More sweet than Freedom; more desired than joy
More sacred than the passing of a friend."

I do not ask for earthly store
Beyond a day's supply;
I only covet more and more
The clear and single eye.
To see my duty face to face
And trust the Lord for daily grace.

What is excellent
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain;
Heart's love will meet thee again.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Livingstone was the man who was the only lad to join a little Scottish church during one long year. His pastor looked sadly upon what seemed to be only a poor fruitage for his faithful labor. But Blantyre rejoices today in being the place from which this great man of God went forth to his great service, proclaiming the Gospel of the shed blood of the Lord Jesus and his high abilities.—The Presbyterian.

Defeat may serve as well as victory
To shake the soul and let the glory out.
When the great oak is straining in the wind,
The boughs drink in new beauty, and the trunk
Sends down a deeper root on the window side.
Only the soul that knows the mighty grief
Can know the mighty rapture. Sorrows come
To stretch out spaces in the heart for joy.
—Edwin Markham.

"O Bread of Life, Thou in Thy word hast said:
Who feeds in Faith on Me shall never die!
In mercy hear Thy hungry children's cry—
Father, give us this day our daily bread!"
—Wm. Henry Gill.

Omnipotence is not to be thwarted. His will will be done. Men may fail and we may well be anxious for men, but let us never touch with conceited and unnecessary fear for its safety the ark of God.—A. R. Wells.

"The finest and most eloquent tribute paid to Robert Louis Stevenson," says The Animals' Friend, "was that of the Samoan chiefs whom he had befriended while they were in prison. On their release they dug and completed the road that led to his house and named it 'Ala Toto Alofa'—The Road of the Living Heart."

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE VERDICT AGAINST "THE CHURCHMAN."

Mr. Editor:

I have read the appeal for funds of Marlen E. Pew which apparently has been sent to all religious publications on behalf of "The Churchman" and its editor, Dr. Guy Emery Shipler. I have also read the editorials which have appeared in several religious publications concerning the judgment in favor of Mr. Hess in his action for libel against "The Churchman" and Dr. Shipler. I write this letter as the trial attorney for the plaintiff in the action, not to counteract or criticize the appeal for funds which is being made in Dr. Shipler's behalf nor to defeat its purpose, for this is a matter not within my jurisdiction either as an attorney or as a citizen.

I am concerned, however, with a number of unfortunate impresssions which have been created concerning the verdict against "The Churchman" and Dr. Shipler and the reasons for it. Such references to this verdict as "the most amazing verdict in the history of libel suits in journalism" indicate that the astonishment is due to the incomplete and an incorrect understanding of the issues involved.

In the first place, the action was instituted by Gabriel L. Hess as an individual of high professional and personal standing who had been injured. The so-called "Hays Association" had and has nothing to do with the suit directly or indirectly in any sense. The persistent impression in the letter appealing for funds and in editorial comments, that this action was in some form or another a retaliation for "The Churchman's" editorial treatment of motion pictures is entirely unwarranted. Mr. Hess's libel action would have been instituted and the result would have been the same if "The Churchman" and Dr. Guy Emery Shipler had never written one word concerning motion pictures. There was involved, solely, the reputation and character of Mr. Gabriel L. Hess. The following gentlemen testified at the trial to his high standing, both as a citizen and as an attorney of over thirty years' standing,—Hon. James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany; Richard E. Dwight, Sr., formerly a law partner of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and a member of the firm of Hughes, Schurman and Dwight; Frederick Wood, a member of the firm of Cravath, De Gersdorff, Swaine and Wood; Max D. Steuer; George Zehrung, director of the Motion Picture Division of Y. M. C. A. and David L. Podell.

In the light of the high standing and reputation of Mr. Hess, and the seriousness of the libel, the verdict may be considered very moderate.

Secondly, the misunderstanding indicated in the letter of appeal and in some editorials in religious publications is based upon the assertion that "The Churchman" had merely copied the libelous statements from "Harrison's Reports," and that therefore, this was a technical libel. This is simply incorrect. "The Churchman" did copy a substantial portion of the libelous article from "Harrison's Reports," but its own witnesses admitted that it had, on its own initiative, extended the libelous comments and added additional untrue statements. These additions were of even more serious import than the original libelous statements copied. For example, "The Churchman" stated incorrectly not only that Mr. Hess had been indicted in Canada, but went on to state falsely, that he had been indicted in Oklahoma. This latter charge was not made in "Harrison's Reports." "The Churchman" also in its libelous article assumed that Mr. Hess was guilty of the charge, but that he would probably not place himself within reach of the "provincial prisons" in Canada. There was nothing in 'Harrison's Reports" of similar nature and "The Churchman" witnesses admitted this. Indeed, the writer of "The Churchman" article admitted that he had no factual basis for these additional libelous statements. The jury had a right to spell out malice from these false additions which "The Churchman" made to the article from "Harrison's Reports."

The so-called retraction which "The Churchman" made failed to mention the most serious charges made by it and evasively pointed out that "Harrison's Reports" were mistaken without making comment about its own libelous statements. The final sentence of the retraction actually cast a new slur upon the plaintiff and, on the whole, the jury had a right to find that the retraction instead of constituting a wholehearted apology, skilfully repeated the false innuendo and aggravated the damage done to Mr. Hess.

Certain it is that the libel in "The Churchman" case was so much more serious than that in "Harrison's Reports" that if the verdict is disproportionate in comparison with the verdict in the "Harrison" case, it is unfair to the plaintiff rather than to the defendants.

It is notable that the writer of the libelous article for "The Churchman" had on a previous occasion written a libelous article printed in the Liberty magazine which resulted in a $30,000 verdict against that magazine. The recklessness and carelessness with which the article in "The Churchman" was prepared by Don Seitz and approved by Dr. Shipler, was virtually conceded in the lengthy cross-examination of the defense witnesses. An important reputation was assassinated without a single precaution being taken to test the accuracy of the serious charges being made.

"The Churchman" had pleaded many partial defenses, such as the right of fair comment, qualified privilege and others. On a motion to strike some of these defenses as improperly interposed in this case the motion was granted and "The Churchman" appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court. This higher court affirmed the order of the Supreme Court. Thus, long before the case came to trial the propriety of the issues had been thrashed out and clarified and there was no possibility of the trial court at the last moment going off on a tangent.

One has the right to disagree with any verdict rendered in our courts, but when the facts are known in this case there is no room for the impression that martyrdom has been suffered. I write this letter because I believe false impressions concerning the verdict and the issues have been given and an appeal for money has been made based upon an inaccurate picture of the circumstances. The litigants in this controversy received a full and fair trial before one of the ablest Judges of our Supreme Court, and before a fairly selected jury. Respect for our judicial processes at least requires that a full statement of the controversy be had before condemning the verdict and implying ulterior motives for the suit.

Respectfully yours,
LOUIS NIZER.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 100. RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 3, 1935. No. 31.

How About it?

A good bit if fun has been poked lately at various organizations with the name "Evangelical" prominently displayed who have protested that the word "Protestant" has been deleted from much church literature and reminders have been sent to the Presiding Bishop and the Chairman of The Forward Movement Commission that the official name of our Church is still "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America".

While we are not impressed with the method used, and feel that quite probably the protests were aimed at people and organizations in a way that may prove to be unwise, nevertheless we do feel that from time to time it is a good thing to remind our general public that there is a very large element in the Church who love the name "Protestant" and feel that our Church would lose her real identity if that name were dropped.

It is natural in the present day for many to feel a re-action to Protestantism in general. We forget that Protestants pushed forward into our pioneer country when others were either too lazy or too indifferent to do so. We forget that primarily Protestantism is a spirit of earnest liberalism that allows the individual freedom of conscience. In the mistakes that Protestants have made, we lose sight of the great contributions to present day Christianity that would never have been heard of if Protestants had not existed.

In our own beloved Church we have boasted that we were a Church that had a great comprehensive ideal. Even extreme churchmen have proclaimed that we stretch forth a hand "to either side in the great division of Christendom". It we withdraw one hand, where would our boasted comprehension go?

So let us not just poke Mid-Summer wit at a group of earnest people who want our Church to continue to carry on many of its best and noblest traditions. It is not easy to be a Protestant champion, and instead of merely serving as the butt of the wit of people who have not always thought things through, perhaps we would do well to remember that unless a good strong Protestant party is kept alive, our Church might become a mere order of priests and acolytes.

The Value of The Church Boarding School.

Throughout the year The Southern Churchman contains advertisements of various schools. Most of them are under official church auspices, either diocesan or general. They are all Christian schools. We have no hesitation in recommending them to the readers of our paper who are contemplating sending their children away to school.

There has been a good bit of speculation as to whether the Church has been wise in providing the public with schools. Historically there was of course the need of decent education. Both North and South with rare exceptions, like The Boston Latin School (now three hundred years old), the better type of higher education either for college or for preparation for business would not have been available, had not the Church pioneered with schools of good learning.

While the public school has progressed and today gives a fine education, there is still the need for those who wish in more traditional ways to have their children influenced by the historic culture preserved by the boarding school. There certainly is a need for schools where the emphasis is placed upon Christian education.

We have no sympathy with those supposedly church schools and colleges which seem to care little about the churches that gave them backing and who have constantly wandered away from the church ideal. We do not believe such schools exist in the list which uses The Southern Churchman. Of course no school can actually be "in the place of parents". We cannot expect worldly people to produce spiritually finded children, and no matter how fine a church school might be, it cannot do what parents for years have neglected to do.

But to those earnest parents who want the education of their children to be along the higher ideals and lines which they feel vital in their own lives, we can say that the best Christian ideals will be included and time will be given to the teaching of the Christian religion on a plane at least as efficient and thorough as in the more worldly subjects.

This magazine, as always, will be glad to correspond with parents and guardians and gladly and without charge will make recommendations of schools within the means of its readers.

A Correction.

We are not in favor of placing blame on conscencious printers, so when we said something in the last paragraph of the second editorial in the July 20th edition (found on page 10) it is demonstrated that the error carelessly originated on our own typewriter. The sentence reads, "We do not need the 'religious' life". Our intention was to say, "We do need the 'religious' life", which is quite a different meaning, and lest any of our devout friends who are particular admirers of the various religious orders take offence at what was printed, we hereby apologize.

Church and World Problems as Others See Them

Making the Choir Invisible.

Elwood L. Haines. in The Witness, July 18, 1935.

I am for making the choir invisible. The reason for my new-found heresy is a recent visit to a certain church, and the unusual experience of sitting in the congregation. The day was torrid, but I cheered myself with a fan which suggestively referred me to a local undertaker. The service began with a distant onrush of song, welling in volume as the choir appeared. Immediately I became conscious of hot, mussy vestments, and above them, moist faces and moving mouths. I felt hotter, watching them. If the following parody occurred to me at the moment, I hope that, in view of the prevailing temperature, I may be forgiven:

A boiling army, men and boys,
The matron and the maid:
Not one his vocal toil enjoys,
In red-hot robes arrayed.

The service progressed; so did my awareness of that unhappy army overflowing the choir stalls. It was quite obvious throughout that the choir was there to perform. The rector, by speeding up the prayers and amputating his sermon to seven minutes, made it possible for the choir to exhibit its wares without extending the service beyond hot-weather limits. I stood with the rest in rapt apathy during a festival Te Deum, and the Benedictus unabbreviated, and sat for the anthem which might just as well have been in the Choctaw dialect, so far as intelligibility was concerned. I watched entranced the antics of the angular tenor. And there came to my mind, ironically, I supose, the lines

"My tongue shall never tire
Of chanting with the choir."

and I realized that, however desirous my tongue might be of praise, it had no chance. How is it possible, I wonder, to praise God through the medium of choristers who have taken even the Amens away from one?

Crushing Out Religion.

Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle.

Recognition of Russia was accompanied by assurance of religious toleration. Dispatches from Moscow reveal clearly that such assurances were not made in good faith.

More energetic measures to disperse clergymen and priests and close churches have been instituted, in the words of one correspondent, "because of the slow progress of the 'godless five-year plan announced in 1932.' The authorities said at that time that the purpose was not to leave a single house of prayer on the territory of the Soviet Union, and to extinguish in the minds of the people the very notion of God."

While in the course of this campaign, thousands of churches of the Greek Orthodox faith have been razed and the priests dispersed, even more reliance has been placed upon weaning the younger generation away from religion entirely, leaving the church without any followers when death has removed the older people.

The progress of the campaign, so far as the Greek Church is concerned, is veiled behind the censorship, but figures are available in the case of the Lutheran clergymen who have served German and Latvian Lutheran communities in Russia.

At the time of the Revolution, Lutheran Churches were served by 252 clergymen, and maintained a theological seminary in Leningrad. By last December these had been reduced to fifty-one. Since that time twenty-nine have been arrested and exiled and the sminary in Leningrad closed. Only twenty-two Lutheran clergymen now serve Russian Churches, all other churches having been closed.

And yet it may prove more difficult to kill religion in Russia than the authorities realize. Foreign visitors noted a fair representation of young people at the Easter services at the two Greek churches still open in Moscow. In the country, in the homes of the peasants, religious forms are still generally observed. What the child learns at his mother's knee will not be forgotten easily in spite of dictatorial decrees and harsh forms of suppression.

"Essential That He Should Be a Converted Man."

The Church of England Newspaper, June 21, 1935.

"For the work contemplated, one need be neither a Welshman nor an Anglo-Catholic; but it is essential that he should be a converted man."

This is not an extract from a Methodist advertisement. It is a passage in a letter by the Bishop of Llandaff in the Church Times. More strange still the words—"he should be a converted man"—do not refer to laymen but to clergymen! The Bishop says he is forming a band of young priests to work on Bush Brotherhood lines in his diocese and he has the courage to place "conversion" as the first essential. We confess that at first we were startled. Has it not become customary to take conversions for granted before ordination? We wonder how many Bishops, or their examining chaplains, seek to find out whether their ordination candidates have been definitely "turned to God." On the surface this seems an absurd and even an impertinent question, but evidently the Bishop of Llandaff does not think so.

Spiritual Foundation.

The Christian Observer.

Some years ago Woodrow Wilson sounded a note of warning that material prosperity could not continue indefinitely unless we built more stable spiritual foundations. In the days of prosperity the warning was but little heeded. Later Mr. Coolidge sounded a similar note in the following words: "We do not need more national development; we need more spiritual development. We do not need more intellectuaal power; we need more spiritual power. We do not need more knowledge; we need more character. We do not need more government; we need more culture. We do not need more law; we need more religion." We are beginning to see now the wisdom of these two far-seeing leaders of our national life. Perhaps as never before business and professional men, scientists, statesmen and jurists, as well as preachers, are proclaiming the conviction that we must have a more adequate spiritual development than we now possess before there can be a return to normal economic conditions.

Too Much Homework.

Parents and children alike are protesting in increasing numbers about the amount of homework that the latter have to do. Many heads of schools realize that there is room for improvement in this direction and are endeavoring to reform matters. At Keighley Girls' Grammar School the experiment, begun last term, of no homework but longer school hours is being continued.

"The girls themselves are practically unanimous in preferring this new arrangement," said the headmistress. "I think that quite as much work is being done, and in far less time than it has taken pupils to do it at home."

Our Students

An Important Work of the Church.

There is no more important work that needs doing at the present time, than that of saving the students of our Colleges and Universities from losing touch with the spiritual facts which should enter into and form the most important part of their experience. A year ago, in the August number of Harper's Magazine, there appeared an article, by Professor Leuba, of Bryn Mawr College, in which he gave statistics of the proportionate number of scientific professors who did not believe in a Personal God, and also of those who did not believe in immortality. He also gave figures to show that among the students a distinct loss of faith was apparent after several years in college. It may have been the case that many professors did not answer the questions sent to them by the investigator, who did not happen to be Professor Leuba himself, but the figures were sufficiently significant to show the urgent need of the presence and active work of Christian leaders in our educational institutions, men whose character and devotion to Christ, as well as fine educational equipment render them equal to the task of meeting and dealing effectively with a very difficult situation.

Church Society for College Work.*

The subject of this article was suggested by the arrival of a pamphlet, issued by the Church Society for College Work, the purpose of which, as stated in the booklet, is, "To promote knowledge and acceptance of Christ's religion and in other ways to strengthen the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in College, in University centers; and to establish a Fund for this purpose." Good work has been, and is being done among the students by our Church, but the field is so large and the need so urgent, that a great deal more will have to be done in order to take advantage of the great opportunity for service which lies open to the Church. Of course, the Episcopal Church can by no means assume the full burden of responsibility for meeting this urgent need, but she should be ready to do her full share of the work by properly caring for her young people at a time in their lives when their future is being in a great measure determined by the influences which surround them.

The Danger of Specialization.

The principal reason for the crowding out of religion in our system of modern education, is due in a great measure, to the fact that Natural Science has opened up so many fields of investigation that the pursuit of knowledge has become highly specialized and that the specialist becomes so completely absorbed in his own particular subject, that his field of vision is narrowed down to a single point. This means a loss of perspective which disqualifies him from understanding the significance of other fields of investigation, and if he realizes, as he should do, that he is not an expert in any special branch of knowledge, save his own, he will not presume to speak with authority on such other subjects. This should make him humble and modest about claiming the right to lay down the law in matters of religion, or at any rate of religious experience.

The Limitations of the Scientific Method.

It must be borne in mind that we have been told within the last few years, on high scientific authority, that the scientific method is not capable of dealing with ultimate reality. Thus Professor Eddington in his book on "Science and the Unseen World" (Page 73) says:—"Briefly the position is this. We have learnt that the exploration of the external world, by the methods of physical science leads not to a concrete reality but to a shadow world of symbols, beneath which those methods are unadapted for penetrating." It is important that the limitations of the scientific method should be made clear to our young people and by those who have the necessary qualifications for winning their respect and confidence.

The Problem of Control.

It must also be borne in mind that Natural Science in the speeding up progress which has of late been releasing new facts and forces to a bewildering extent, has no means at its command of controling the uses to which this new knowledge shall be put, and does. we believe, claim to be entirely neutral on this point. But the future of civilization depends upon, and will be ultimately determined by the character of those who are able to exercise a controlling influence upon human affairs, such for instance as the Mussolinis, the Hitlers, and the Stalins of the future. In a leading full page review, in the London Spectator, June 28, 1935, the reviewer of a book, entitled, "Science in the Making," says:—"It is applied science which threatens to end our civilization in the next war through our inability to control the weapons of destruction which it has devised for our bedevilment. It is applied science which has brought our economic system to the verge of collapse through our inability to distribute the spate of commodities which its instruments of production have poured forth for our embarrassment. It is applied science which has destroyed the liberties of half a continent, by virtue of the new and unprecedented powers for manufacturting men's minds and moulding their outlook which its instruments of communication— the cinema, the radio and the loud speaker—have placed in the hands of those who would exploit them for their own purposes. Finally, it is applied science which has so numbed and bewildered the ordinary man with its hail of new facts, so overwhelmed him with new powers, required of him such rapid adjustment to the changes which it is continually inducing in his environment, that, like a piece of elastic stretched to the limit of its powers, his mind snaps back, with the result that a deliberate return to the primitive in government and behaviour, in thought and belief, appears, as events upon the Continent bear all too tragical witness, as one of the chief by-products of the scientific age."

Christ the Hope of the World.

This may be a one sided point of view and much might be said on the other side, but it can hardly be gainsaid that the safety of civilization and the hope for a better world are bound up with the general acceptance of Christ's ideal of human brotherhood and

Religion in Education

By ARTHUR LEE KINSOLVING,

Rector of Trinity Church, Boston.

EDUCATION has enjoyed a good name—indeed the mark of the last half century has been the ambition on the part of millions to procure the advantages of education.

But the reputation was won, not by education, but by Christian education. It was the day when education was consecrated, not only to the sharpening of brains, but equally or supremely to the development of Christian character that established the community verdict that the process was of unquestionable worth.

In the days of John Stuart Mill, there swept over the Western world a great hope that the world's salvation might be wrought out by education—that, if we concentrated on giving youth an adequate start, we could promise a new world, redeemed from the doom of ignorance, selfishness, weakness, folly.

That faith, which prompted the giving of billions of dollars in private munificence and public grants, is largely spent. For our experience of the results has failed to justify the judgment and sustain the faith that education can furnish a new world. As a sequel to the unprecedented expansion of education, we have only to show a world in sorrier state than it was before.

But it is not Christian Education that is found wanting; it is secular education, divorced from the religious impulse and a clear moral objective.

The community has come to accept and take as a matter of course this divorce—the necessity of accepting extreme secularity in education.

The Protestant Churches have been financially able to sustain, here and there, a Church School or a College, but their results have been largely engulfed by the secular or pagan influences of the larger places of learning, to which their graduates go for their higher education.

The Roman Catholic Church alone has managed to maintain intact a considerable sector of its educational system within its own authority and supervision, and if the adherents of that communion have grown to twenty millions, and its influence with its own people has survived better than that of the other churches, this is no small part of the reason.

The expense of this mighty enterprise has absorbed the great majority of Roman Catholic giving. While nine-tenths of Protestant philanthropy is invested in homes for the aged and other agencies of mercy for those maimed in the economic warfare of life, nine-tenths of Catholic money is apt to be invested in the future, through the adequate provision for the Christian nurture of the young.

And though there cannot be an "either or," I believe their emphasis is rightly placed. For the greatest service we can render humanity, and the most humane, is to save young lives from the inevitable disaster to themselves and to the world of entering into life devoid of an adequate sense of their relationship with God.

As we survey this often restless, dissatisfied, sinning, short-sighted, selfish, digruntled, turbulent world, and ask the profoundest of questions,—"Has it prospects of real progress?—we note that the churches are about what they always were in facilities and proportionate numbers, but education is eminently not what it once was,—it is no longer Christian.

The Church, in losing its authority in education, has lost more than half of itself. And if the church, as it faces the future, suffers most severely from lack of leadership, that in itself derives from the comparatively weakness of spiritual life in universities, where the leading citizens of tomorrow are setting their courses and shaping their destines.

If you wonder that religion and the Golden Rule do not count any more in life today, only consider the fact that the mass of young Americans, from grade school through high school, college, professional school, from five to twenty-five, live, move and have their being in an atmosphere that is largely shaped as if the modern world had no clear access to religion, or as if it were questionable whether religion counted at all.

In the face of this, I have said, say now, and shall continue to say, in the spirit of that little Roman Senator, who knew that Carthage was a menace to Rome, to all that was sacred to him—"Delenda est Carthago."

So, I say,—our educational institutions must be redeemed, must be won again, for the spiritual and moral influence which God intended for them.

Is this too ambitious a project?

The founding of educational institutions was one of the most colossal undertakings of history. Read the story of the early days of Harvard, as Professor Samuel Eliot Morison, our own distinguished historian in this congregation, has told it, or of any other institution, and you will find the indomitable willingness for self-sacrifice of Christian character alone prevailing against enormous obstacles and odds.

If a thing should be, it must be.

I know in my soul that God intends to preside in education. He has made us for Himself, and our lives are sadly incomplete, and all too often tragically misshapen until they find their way in Him.

At the present, thousands of boys and girls are going out into life without any comprehension of the most precious experience of the race, the truths about living which have come to us from prophets and seers, and supremely from Jesus Christ.

But, you say, "Our youth is fine." Of course they are, they are youths who have it in them to exert a Christlike influence on the world—Grenfells and Florence Nightingales, and Pasteurs, and Robert E. Lees—who in thirty years will be leading unhappy and ineffective lives, not from their own fault, but because the educational system under which they lived was misleading.

There never was a time in history when religion was given so little recognition in education. And I maintain that this situation is abnormal, patently unwise, improvident, short-sighted, unnecessary and doomed. Christ will return, as He did to Jerusalem, to claim the central city of education.

And all the contemporary slogans, from that to make the universities utilitarian to the economic business of earning a living, to that of the emphasis on research and the production of scholars, are subordinate to the main need of the time, to restore the recognition that education must be of the whole man—his spirit and character, as well as body and mind.

II.

Well, what can we do?

The public schools are ultimately in the control of the voters. Sunday Schools are good as far as they go. Summer Camps and Conferences even more effective, for to give youth friendship in his play time has been one of the discoveries of our age as the most effective-medium for winning his enthusiasm to the things that are high.

But there will never be any satisfactory basis until we reinstate religion in the public schools, the order of the day to most children.

In a far New England town, a very able Episcopal Rector sensed that the important contribution he could make would be to youth.

He gained permission to teach religion in the town grade school. He invited other ministers to join. They accepted, so soon as they saw their own children in danger of this early contamination from an Episcopalian. In the high school the students themselves petitioned for continuation courses, for religion is a subject of perennial fascination to the thought of youth, if at all adequately presented. The large majority of high school students enrolled still elect this optional course.

When a town was noted that had known but one instance of juvenile delinquency for a long number of years since 1922, a Commission from New York City sent a representative to investigate and found that this was the very town where a normal attention to religion had been brought back into the public schools.

If the Priests, Ministers and Rabbis were given an hour in the curriculum several times a week, to meet their own children registered in the school, to teach the Scriptures and the way of life, it would cost the government nothing, do the ministers a lot of good, give many of them just what they crave, create a new Church, reduce the sad statistics of juvenile delinquency, and pave the way for a new moral tone in America, and be a long step forward toward the Kingdom of God.

If you approve, pray for this, and work for it, and use your influence where you can to secure it.

In private school life you will find almost always a humble recognition of the need, and the desire for a further inculcation of the religious spirit.

But ordinarily also a sad sense that the best efforts in the past have yielded meagre results.

Somehow, in our Church boarding schools, too often the forms of religion have grown oppressive and distasteful in their punctilious repetition, but the spirit of Christ's religion, the human brotherliness and the social passion have been missed.

So it turns out that the dose has been just enough to be an innoculation against religion, rather than an ardent contagion.

Many of you talk about this. Do your utmost while you live to help your school create a more vital religious life. An influential minority of schoolmasters and professors, a majority of Head Masters and Presidents long for a greater spiritual emphasis in their institutions; as yet they lack adequate backing to secure it.

And in the universities or colleges in which you are interested, with their officers and boards, try to make your influence felt in this all-determining regard. Ask at least for an adequate religious department, which some of our most noted universities notably lack.

III.

But behold. I show you a more immediate way.

Make friends with some students.

Within three miles of Trinity Church, there are said to be 30,000 of them. Show an interest in some particular ones. Break the ice by making the advance and speaking to them on the street. They won't mind. Every incident at this time of life is an experience to them.

Then go and visit them in their dormitories and fraternity houses. Invite them to your homes. Take the initiative in Christian friendliness, and then try to mean what you can to them.

In the railroad station of a mid-western university town, the present Bishop of Chicago once found himself with two hours to spare.

Meditating on the early Christians' adventuresomeness for Christ, he went to the University Campus and spoke to the first two students he met.

They invited him to their fraternity house. The subject got around to religion. They thought it a shame there was such apathy. He told them he was a clergyman. They introduced him to the President of the University. The President invited him to give a course of lectures on religion.

So one thing leads to another when we practice Christian initiative.

Or, if you prefer, tell us this spring of your interest and next fall come, join and help us make our visiting among students and our discussions with them more vital.

Last week there was founded in New York The Church Society for College Work. My friend, Brooke Stabler, was the moving spirit. Some distinguished men, such as Mr. Norman Davis, were co-founders. If you would like to be a member, let me know. It is a society that is bent on seeing to it that the Church shows more attention to college students.

We have over sixty thousand Episcopalians in College and three times that number who might be reached. And yet, less than a dozen clergymen giving full-time to ministering among them, less than one hundred who can give even one day a week.

It is clear that we must augment their efforts by our own, and some can show their sympathy by putting into the hands of this Church Society for College Work money to provide more full-time workers.

Most of us do not turn out Christians as a matter of course. We need some one's friendship and encouragement and inspiration to make Christ vivid and compelling to us, until He leads us past the lying promises of successful worldlines.

College Professors are nice people given to plain living and high thinking, but often diffident about admitting religious convictions, and preferring not to undertake spiritual leadership.

As far as religion goes, the expression a college wears is too often a bewildered stare, while worldliness, day after day, takes the case by default.

Colleges were founded by Christian citizens, who gave and worked for them. Portraits of these men still hang on college walls, and sometimes I feel they are mocked by what goes on. Their sacrifice is mocked.

Christ, to whom these institutions were often dedicated, has been often crowded out. His ways are being supplanted by the mores of the movies. And yet our students are more serious, earnest and anxious to find reality than we were at their age.

The younger generation is looking for a way of life, and it is entirely possible for one person, by his friendship, to win them to this way. We need not be intellectual giants to do it. It is not a matter of that.

In New England, perhaps no one has done more for Christianity in academic institutions than a poor employee in a Boston shoe store, in whom was truly the vision splendid.

From a Sunday-school teacher he became an evangelist, and then a great one. He was preaching once to many thousand educated people in England and was heckled by a dilletante gentleman, who said:—"Mr. Moody, you do not even speak good English."

The Evangelist replied, with deep humility,—"I know that, but I am using my poor English as best I can for Christ. What are you doing for Him with

Moving Forward

By NOBLE C. POWELL,

Rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore.

DURING recent weeks the Church has been thinking of and trying to respond to the call of our leaders in "The Forward Movement." This is a great adventure, not a picnic party with naught but idle hours and fleecy clouds. It is a call to a great mass movement of the whole Church. Every communicant and every congregation is asked to take part. As we individual congregations, consider the situation in the world today, we cannot fail to see the need for such a movement. But if we are to do our part, we must also see the dangers. The realization of the purpose for which the Christian Church lives in the world today is, in itself, dangerous. The winning of God's Promise is a dangerous undertaking. But unless the danger be met, the land of our dreams will never be ours, and while others in other years will win, we will have failed. The Forward Movement is to stimulate the whole Church to a more determined effort to win the promised land—God's Kingdom. In our effort in The Forward Movement we do not commit ourselves to utterly unknown principles, but rather principles which have been tried before. And it ill becomes intelligent people to have the record of what others have done, and not make use of that record.

Such record lies in the story of the Israelites as they made their way toward their Land of Promise. They sent emissaries to investigate the land. These returned with stories and evidences of it being a fairer land, even than they had imagined. But they also brought stories which struck terror into the hearts of the people. Taking counsel of their fears, the Israelites refused to make the effort to enter into their heritage. Finally their great leader recalled them to a ralization of their responsibility and told them there was a way by which they might attain their land. He told them there was a road through the Land of Edom and sent a committee to ask permission to enter that way. How human it all sounds and how like us today! They asked permission to go through the country by the King's Highway and promised that they would turn neither to the right hand nor to the left. They would not drink of the water in the wells and they would not have contact with the people in the land. If, by chance, water was drunk or contact made, payment would be made. In short, what these people asked was that they be allowed to pass through to their destination without the Edomites knowing they had gone.

Edom refused, nay more, they marched their armies out, and at the first show of opposition Israel turned away.

Do we not find a warning and a challenge to those of us who have listened to the call of the leaders of the Church in The Forward Movement? God has given to the Christian Church a magnificent heritage. But that heritage must be won, and in the winning, fearful hearts will have no part. Israel was afraid to meet dangers, afraid to grapple with obstacles, despite the fact that the spies reported the land as exceeding their wildest expectations, yet they were afraid to go in.

WHAT an object lesson to us today! We Christians have been sent to realize God's Kingdom. That Kingdom exceeds our expectations as is evidenced by the reports of its glory which have come from those who have entered in. It is a kingdom of truth, and justice, and right. It is a kingdom of gentleness, kindness and love; a kingdom of brotherhood and life that cannot end, where our finest ideals will be realized and our hopes become facts.

But it must be won. There are giants of selfish greed, lust, fear, hate, bigotry, oppression, which must be met and overcome. Consider the giant of public opinion. How we fear it! Our opinion may not be in line with the opinion of others. Animosities may be stirred up. We may become unpopular. All this is true, but our standard is the mind of Jesus Christ, and wherever there is disagreement with this standard, we, as Christians, should make no peace. We fear to take a definite stand on many questions, excusing ourselves by saying that others have a right to their opinions. That is very polite, but is it true? Do we have as much right to our opinion about the body as the medical specialist? Do we have as much right to our opinion about the stars as the astronomer? If we are Christians we have the mind of Christ. We believe is it the only true mind that will lead us into the whole realm of truth about living. We believe that in the light of that truth we can see more clearly what God means for mankind than others can see. It is because men like Athanatius, who have dared to stand squarely opposed to public opinion, that we have the truth which is ours today.

ONE of the things that is keeping the Church of God from entering into her heritage is a sense of possession. In the story referred to above, when Edom said "No", how supinely the Israelites took it. It is to weep—"Wherefore Israel turned away!" Here is a people chosen of God, trained by men especially set over them by God and trusted with an especial knowledge of God's truth. They had been with God about Sinai in a peculiar and unique relationship. They bore in their midst evidences of God's Presence, in the Tabernacle and in the Ark of the Covenant. They were loaded with God's riches. They had other ideas, other purposes, nobler and higher conceptions of the world and of life than the Edomites, yet they offered nothing of all these to those through whose borders they wished to go. "We will leave you alone. We will make no contact with you, if we can possibly help it." Does it not really mean, "We, who are God's chosen, who are bearers of His truth, who are set to realize His will, will keep all this to ourselves, and all our dealings with you, if such there must be, will be on a plane now perfectly familiar to you, namely the commercial?" They promised to pay for any contact made. What a tragedy this is! Edom, with all her blindness, her ignorance, her sin, to be left alone untouched, unchanged, while God's chosen people marched to their land of promise. Is it too much to say that this tragedy was due to a sense of possession; the people feeling that what they had was theirs?

Is the Christian Church, with the new life of the Risen Christ, to be kept safe from all harm? Is it just for the elect? Is it to have no relation with those through whose ranks Christians pass? Shall the world outside the Church know nothing of the Church's new attitude, new hopes, new quality of life, nothing of God as Christians know Him? Shall none of the radiance of our Christian love shine out and brighten other lives? Shall none of the glory of a Christian's release from the captivity of sin and blindness, be shared by those who are not Christians? In short, can we Christians today give our own consent even to make the effort to get through to our promised land, be it the Kingdom of God or Heaven, without anyone being in the least awakened, touched, enlightened?

Israel had a new conception of society. God was King. Men were brothers. And they were on their

"Be Courteous"

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,
Bishop of Washington.

THAT courtesy constitutes an important and essential element of religion, may not be widely recognized, and yet the admonition contained in the above caption was written by a great teacher, St. Peter, to the early Christians. He had been writing of certain values in human intercourse that he regarded as of primary importance, such as the right relation between husbands and wives, of children and parents, etc., and he concluded with these words: "Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." Courtesy, which means literally, "genuine and habitual politeness," is the lubricant that eases and makes smoothly operative life's fellowships and manifold relationships. It has a practical value and concerns every condition of life with which we have to do. The absence of it causes friction, misunderstandings, breaches, sometimes tragedies and war itself. It is a quality of life disclosed in daily habit that needs cultivation, quite as much as any other gift or virtue. It is the hallmark of gentility and good breeding and without it even rare intellectual gifts fail of their large usefulness.

It was said of Thomas Carlyle that he was "hard to live with" and that much of his splendid genius failed to appeal, because of his rude and rough manners, that repelled those who sought his companionship This great American admirer and friend, Ralph Waldo Emerson, in respect to gentility and courtesy, was distinguished for the qualities Carlyle lacked. Some men cultivate the habit of brusqueness and rudeness. They same to think it the badge of distinction and originality. Courtesy shows itself in many ways, not alone in the home, office and drawing-room, but in every relation we sustain to our fellows. It has its distinct place in our play as in our working hours; in our correspondence as in our conversation. It is the conspicuous adornment of the man who prides himself upon his gentility, the commanding grace of the woman who seeks the high esteem of her companions.

It may be that our generation has lost much of the old chivalries and refinements, that we have become so engrossed with the concerns of our machine age, with so-called practical matters, that we have subordinated the amenities to a place of unimportance. If this is so it is a tragic misfortune. Courtesy may call for more of kindly consideration of the feelings of others, it may lay upon us certain exactions and entail a bit of time, but in the end it has compensations of lasting value.

Our profession of religion makes this virtue, if such it may be called, utterly indispensable. It governs us in our approach to those who differ from us in devotional practice. In the matter of cultivating Christian unity it is more important than agreements and concordats. That which hinders the closer knitting of Christian ties, is conceit and arrogance, an assumed superiority that makes fellowship impossible. Beyond this, even the propagation of religion itself, no matter in what form it may express itself, is largely rendered futile or successful by the method of its presentation. A winsome personality, one that expresses its conviction in courteous and kindly terms, better still through a gentle and consistent life, is more persuasive than an eloquent if rude habit of speech, however logical its argument. The sheer courtliness and kindness of the Master were so irresistible that men and women fell under their sway and abandoned ways long indulged in and habits that had rendered them coarse and repellant. His consideration for the circumstances and conditions under which sinful men and women had become grossly unresponsive to their better natures, and His gentle approach to their lives rendered them obedient to His will and responsive to His call.

Those who have caught His spirit and learned His method have always been the most persuasive of His followers. Courtesy, Christian courtesy, is needed in all our relationships today. We will not restore our economic, social or political order, nor secure a better understanding between nations and so set forward world peace, until we learn that a "soft answer turneth away wrath," and that courtesy and not arrogance is the Christian method of right conduct in every human relationship.

MOVING FORWARD.

way to establish a commonwealth of God. Edom had a king, laws, and order. Was that enough? God did not think it was enough for His people. What about the Church? We speak about the ideal commonwealth of love and of brotherhood, but what about God's Supreme Kingship? This is a dangerous thing to be talking about in a world in which a cheap patriotism is so vocal and where a great monk can suffer penalties because he claims Christ as King. It is a dangerous thing to talk about universal brotherhood. We shall never get to a new order by passing through the midst of our neighbors. We shall have to build that order as we go.

THERE are certain dire consequences which face the Christian Church, as they faced Israel. Israel wandered forty long years in a desert. Who can measure what that time might have meant? Who can measure the waste of life, the disappointment and monotony that would have been saved had they entered at once into their land of promise? We are very much like that now. Certainly we are wandering aimlessly about with this nostrum and that theory offered. What God calls the Christian Church to do, is to enter boldly into the land of promise.

Not only did they have to wander aimlessly in a desert, but Israel lost a whole generation. May not the Christian Church do the same, unless it boldly enters and takes its heritage?

Those who wandered bore untold suffering. They lived physically, but read the record of that physical life and you will see its horror. The Forward Movement of the Church today is the same Forward Movement that God has set His chosen people on in every age. But those who set forward the standard of the Kingdom of God are those fearless ones who realize that what they have is not their own, but a trust from God—a trust which they must use for the good of all men everywhere.

of his law of service as being the best and in fact the only perfect means of insuring human welfare. Then all that Natural Science can give us would be under the control of those who have the best and highest interests of mankind at heart, and would thus save Natural Science from being converted into a curse instead of the blessing which it should be. Our students should be made to realize this.

A Religion of Joy

By THOS. F. OPIE,

Rector of St. John's Church, Olney, Maryland.

CHRISTIANITY is essentially a religion of joy. Every community ought to do homage to the man of good cheer. The psychological effect of whistling, of smiling, of glad words of good cheer cannot be over-estimated. The effect produced reaches everyone with whom we come in touch. There is so much stress and strain and so much uncertainty and sadness and sorrow in the world, that a reinterpretation of Christianity as a religion of joy is timely and apropos.

"These things have I spoken unto you that your joy might be full"; "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy"; "Break forth into joy; sing together ye waste places"; "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord—rejoice evermore—and again I say rejoice." These are a few of the terms in which our religion is couched. It is a religion of joy inexpressible. The primary business of Christianity, some one reminds us, is not to "get men into heaven", but to "get heaven into men". This would assure a real abiding joy in the heart.

There are sufficient grounds for joy in the life of the sincere Christian believer. Should a slave set free rejoice? Should a prisoner released rejoice? Should a condemned man absolved rejoice? Should the Prodigal embraced in the arms of love rejoice? Should the weak made strong rejoice? Should the man whose darkness is turned into light rejoice? Should he whose mourning is turned into joy rejoice? Then surely the Christian should rejoice with joy unspeakable, for his life-experiences are analogous to these in many particulars.

Living in the midst of peace and plenty, in a day of progress, opportunity and culture, surrounded by beauty and refinement, the average Christian in America has no excuse for pessimism or for morosenes.

As to realms of joy, the kingdom of joy is threefold. It embraces the state of the mind. This is the province of truth. It embraces the state of the body. This is the province of beauty. It embraces the state of the soul. This is the province of goodness. No man who has a proper Christian conception of goodness, truth, beauty, has any cause not to rejoice. He should publish it abroad with smiles and laughter, with sparkling eyes and radiant face, with glad voice and joyous temper, with buoyant spirit and happy demeanor that he is a member of Christ, the Child of God and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven—for the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of joy.

There are means of joy that all should take every advantage of. The Christian must guard his mind against falsehood, against impure thoughts, wrong ideas and hurtful imaginings. He must guard his mind against the mean, the low, the despicable—the dishonest, the revengeful, the unbrotherly and the un-Christian. He must make his mind the reservoir of all that is elevating, uplifting, inspiring, wholesome—by good reading, pure thinking and proper action.

The Christian must guard his body. No man can have a glad buoyant spirit and a happy temper if he abuses the body in dissipation, in intemperance and in physical follies and lusts. These mar the nervous system and create an irritable, fussy, depressing temperament. We must keep the body in temperance, soberness and chastity.

To know the highest joy, the Christian must constantly cultivate the spiritual life. He must know Christ intimately. He must not be ashamed to be known as God's good man. No man can long be joyous and joyful unless he be good, pure, clean and straight. He must guard the portals of his body as though it were the temple of all that is holy and divine. He must guard the portals of the mind as though it were too sacred to admit anything foul or unworthy. He must guard the portals of the soul as though it were the very home of God.

"All who joy would win Must share it! Happiness was born a twin."

The Holiness of Scripture.

William Olney, London, England.

The Holiness of Scripture witneses
Its coming from the "Holiest of All".
What speech of Man is there so perfect found?
Well might God's servant witness in the past:
"Thy Word is pure, therefore it claims my love."
Its Holiness is seen in the exact.
Unflattered, unexaggerated tale
It tells, hiding no fault even of those
God called of old His chosen saints to be.
Its Holines is felt as with a sword
It pierces to the innermost of Thought
And wounds the Conscience with the sense of guilt.
Its Holiness streams out at Calvary
Where Christ redeemed by holy Sacrifice,
Paying to Justice all the sinner owed.
And yet again the Holy Word of God
Was carried out by the Blest Spirit's work
Producing in the heart and life of those
Who trusted Christ, the "fruits of Holiness."
O Holy Word! Thy Message ever rings:
"Be perfect, as your Heavenly Father is."

your good English?"

Look at this young tide of life. Aren't they worth more than all else on earth?

If we care, we shall take the initiative in bringing Christian friendship to these young people, and try to reveal to them in our several ways that there is One of paramount importance to us and to the world—and that is Christ, the way, the truth, the life.

I believe in the future of this country.

I believe that Jesus Christ is vitally connected with the destiny of mankind.

Let us connect the two. Let us make haste to close the needless gulf between the places where we mold the men and women of tomorrow, and the Master of Men.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Government's Change of Attitude in Regard to Religion.—Japan.

For many years the teaching of religion in Japanese Schools, which are licensed by the government, has been strictly prohibited. The Department of Education has now changed its attitude and is urging the schools to have lectures on religion in all secondary grade ones. It is compulsory in the normal schools, I think. So some time ago I went with some others to see the men in the Provincial Office about it. The obvious difficulties were clear. If they get any one religion in, the rest are up in arms, and if the lectures are on religion simply in a general way, they are useless as a moral force.

But as a result of that interview, I wrote to one of my old students in Hyogo Ken and asked if he thought that some of the schools where my old students are would like to have me come. I said I would have to talk straight Christianity but it would be explanatory, not "hortatory" and if they liked I would give them a little English at the end. His reply was that I need not confine myself to such schools but they would all welcome me and offered to make the arrangements.

Last week I went to Kobe and spoke to the boys of the upper class in the three Kobe Middle Schools and the Sanda Girls' School, all Ken schools and the private Sanda Middle. I used the same talk I have given as an evangelistic sermon many times except that I did not urge them to accept it. Everyone seems pleased and I have invitations to go to two schools in Niigata Ken and an offer to arrange for me to go to all the secondary schools in Ibaraki Ken if I can go. I think I can make the two schools in Niigata Ken on my way up to Karuizawa but the Ibaraki Ken work will have to wait till fall.

I learned a lot the other day on my trip to Kobe and Sanda. The schools are afraid of the opposition that will arise if they call in a local pastor and few missionaries are prepared to talk to students. Also what they want is very simple and fundamental talks. The boys have no religion or religious ideas at all so they need the most fundamental teaching such as what God is, who Christ is (in the simplest form) etc. I used the little English at the end for two reasons. One was that it made the boys listen to me with a feeling of good humor to know that I was going to do it, and the other was to give the principals an alibi if they were blamed for inviting me!

In the Kobe First Middle and in Sanda there was another meeting of special groups later at which the principals urged me to go deeper and lead the boys further. In the Kobe Second M. S. the teachers met, some dozen or more of them, afterwards and asked me all sorts of questions. It seems to me it is a unique opportunity and I am going to try to folow it up as far as I can and it seems to pay.

Here in Hikone the work goes on slowly and steadily. Morning congregations are increasing in size but the evening ones are down. The fruits of our S. S. work are beginning to show and some of my boys and girls are coming into the adult congregation. Some have wandered off of course but some stay. Saeki San is doing good work with the students too so I feel that things are really going fairly well here.

The Church's Day Nursery.

The Episcopal Church's Day Nursery in the city of Kyoto is always full. Government authorities have shown their appreciation of this work by recommending gifts from philanthropic sources. Many mothers with young children have been widowed or deserted, the latter circumstance due to discouragement over continued hard times. An increasing number of women have been killing themselves and their children in despair. The Day Nursery has been able to prevent a few and provide at least a place to live.

Kindergartens.

The latest figures available show just two thousand children enrolled in the Episcopal Church's fifty-five kindergartens in Japan. Most of these are one-teacher schools and practically all are under Japanese teachers, one young woman managing twenty to fifty children.

With a million new babies born every year in Japan, the mere numbers enrolled may not seem impressive but from these Church kindergartens there might come the influential leaders of Japan thirty years from now. Bishop Nichols writes from Kyoto that in some of the conservative and difficult towns the kindergartens have never been more vaulable than at this time when an enlarged nationalism deters many adults from interest in what seems to them an alien Church. The kindergartens win their attention and respect. For this reason, Bishop Nichols says, it would be most desirable to open several new ones but funds are lacking.

Hospital.

St. Barnabas Hospital in the city of Osaka continues to win the friendly regard of the people. The hospital, with 91 beds, specializes in maternity work and child care. Its earned income increased last year, though because of financial pressure the hospital could not do as much charity work as it has done and would like to do.

Christianity in Action—to the Limit.

A government hospital for lepers with 800 patients is now in operation in Kumamoto, Japan, on the other side of the city from the Hospital of the Resurrection of Hope, founded by Miss Riddell. The doctor at the head of the government hospital is an earnest Christian. In his student days he worked in the laboratory of the mission hospital. The mission, when Miss Riddell's niece, Miss Wright, is now in charge, reports 43 lepers preparing for confirmation, many of them from the government hospital. The mission doctor wanted to give two transfusions last year and both times he gave his own blood at the risk of contracting the disease.

Buddhist Books Best Sellers.

One of the chief bookstores in Tokyo reports that more books were sold last year on religion than on any other subject, sport being the second most popular. The religious books were mostly by Buddhists. The Buddhists have made skilful use of opportunities to broadcast over the radio, though it is said that much of their material was taken from the Bible.

Church Literature for Japanese.

The Church Publishing Company of Japan does all it can to increase the scant supply of Church literature for Japanese clergy and lay people. Among the achievements of last year were translations of the Apochypha, the Rev. Dr. Nairne's "Everyman's History of the Old Testament," and the Rev. Dr. Francis Hall's "Catholic Faith and Modern Scholarship." Among smaller publications a little book on the duties of godparents is meeting a long-felt need.

The Society hopes to bring out Bishop Gore's "Belief in God" this year, and also, among other things, some kindergarten stories collected by Miss Bernice Jansen whom many people remember hearing on her last furlough. Suitable kindergarten stories are pitifully scarce.

The S. P. C. K. assists the Japanese Church's Publishing Society. It is hoped that the latter may become as well known in Japan as the S. P. C. K. is in England. The Rev. Charles H. Evans of Tokyo is secretary and treasurer of the Japanese society.

THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY

JUNIOR WOMAN'S AUXILIARY PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE REPORT.

There were 98 people at the Junior Woman's Auxiliary Conference held at Shrine Mont, Orkney Springs, Virginia, June 10 to 15.

This enrollment included 67 registered delegates and missionaries from six dioceses of the Washington Province.

Classes on Prayer and Meditation, Alter Guild Work, Missions in the Home, and Latin America were held each morning.

The membership of the Conference came from such different groups that it was possible to obtain a very varied and interesting viewpoint. High school girls bringing a fresh reaction in contrast to that of the more mature Auxiliary member.

A well rounded conception of our Lord's first, and great Commandment was given by the combination of intellectual approach in Rev. Thorne W. Sparkman's classes on Meditation and the emotional approach to the Creed by the Rev. John W. Gunmere, the Chaplain.

The effect of these teachings was shown by real study and preparation and the resulting discussion in the class on Meditation as well as the many small group conferences with the Chaplain.

Interest in missions was strengthened not only by the knowledge gained in the two classes, Missions in the Home, by Miss Rowena Brown and Latin America by Mrs. A. M. Chapman, but also by a pilgrimage to three of the mountain mission stations, Yancy, Rocky Bar, and Lynwood. Here the results of mission work were shown vividly by the pageant at Rocky Bar long to be remembered.

Mrs. Stewart Symington's class enlarged the understanding and the meaning of worship by her clear explanation of the symbols of the church as the visible signs of the mystical truths contained in worship.

The Conference was well balanced, the mid-afternoons being given over to swimming, mountain climbing, and other forms of recreation in contrast to the serious morning classes. In the late afternoon informal conferences were held on the organization of the Woman's Auxiliary led by Miss Sallie Dean, Chairman of the Conference, and "The Use of Pageantry" in the church's work by Miss Mary Simms of Philadelphia, under whose direction the Junior Woman's Auxiliary of that city gave a lovely pageant.

Long in the memory of each member will linger Shrinemont, built by Dr. Woodward, a true builder of beauty in stone, and the home-like atmosphere created by our gracious hostess, Mrs. Woodward, so ably aided by the Misses Slingluff of Baltimore.

At the opening Communion Service the influence of nature in worship was very present, particularly with those who were for the first time communing under the sky and trees. A clearer realization of the truths which had been pondered over during the Conference days enriched the closing Communion Service so that a deeper meaning of the joy of discipleship entered into the hearts of those who were present.

Diocese of South Carolina.

Many times in the past the executive board of the Woman's Auxiliary has wanted to get away from the always pressing needs for action on specific cases long enough to consider underlying questions of policy and the character of the work as a whole. This procedure was accomplished, or at least begun, at the April meeting. Of the seven morning, afternoon, or evening sessions, six were given to conference on the work as a whole. The desire for further exploration and study was so evident that the chairman asked the board members to continue their work all summer, for report and further conference at the next meeting.—The Diocese.

PHRISTIANS, AWAKE! By Rosamond Crompton. 262 Art paper. Pp. 96. Published by Prohobotion Facts Service, 986 Fifteenth Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn. 10 cents.

Now that repeal has had one year of life, we are able to assemble cold and perhaps startling statistics and observed conditions. We have not delivered our coast from rum-runners; drinking has not decreased; the open saloon has refused to keep out; the deaths through drunken drivers, if we may depend upon figures, have not decreased, but in some States have alarmingly augmented. There is now the old problem of protecting the prohibition States from the corruption of neighboring States where the open sale is prevalent. In short, we miss all the high-sounding assurances of the political leaders that we should have temperance, instead of enforced total abstinence, a happy people no longer bound by the shackles of a law they both despised and openly flaunted. a new generation having high ideals of sobriety and a regime of popular unity, the financial proceeds of which incidentally would relieve our tax burdens. This little book will give us the pros and cons of this burning problem. And it will answer as well the many prohibition questions.

C Art paper. Pp. 96. Published by Prohibition Facts pages. Price $2.50. Published by the Morehouse Publishing Co., Wilwaukee, Wis.

A really helpful book of twenty-seven essays on what the Christian Church should and is able to give to men and women of today. The topics are of a wide variety which make the book fresh and its message interesting. Such topics as "Conversion", "Growth", "Selfishness", "Temptation", "Obedience", "Doubt", "Leadership", "Choice", and so on, are discussed. They can be made the basis for a series of sermons. The book is full of quotations which show that the author has been in touch with many minds. The reader will be impressed with the author's rather alarming temper and open denunciation of other people's views in matters of faith as we read in Chapter XIV, page 123. And more than this, the writer seems to accept literally the old tradition of demonology and the Apostolic Succession. However, the book is a fine exposition of the doctrine of the Church from the conservative Anglo-Catholic point of view.

JOHN BUNYAN, MECHANICK PREACHER. By William York Tindall, Columbia University Press, 2960 Broadway, New York City. 309 pages. Price $3.50.

This is the best and most analytical treatise on the life and character of John Bunyan and his contemporary, "Mechanick preachers". It is a commentary on the religious abuses in England during the early Seventeenth Century which has no parallel in the history of our English Christianity.

The author is a professor of English in Columbia University, who has undertaken to examine every possible source of information so that he may give a real and unbiased picture of Bunyan and his co-religionists. This he has done successfully. We appreciate this commentary for its clear statements based on facts, for Bunyan's writings have exerted much influence on our American Christianity —and are still doing it. The writing of such a book will help the reader to understand that ". . . the characters whom we recall in Pilgrim's Progress are portraits of Bunyan's sectarian enemies and friends, and the episodes of their pilgrimage were determined by the social and religious preoccupations of the literary mechanick." "Grace abounding, which is shown to be one of many similar works produced for the guidance of others and for the advertisement of their own conversion, call, and gift by enthusiastic preachers." (Page 9.)

The reading of this book is interesting and illuminating for any one who wishes to have a better understanding of John Bunyan and his writings and of the age he lived.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

Saint Chad

When the Church was very young and a great man like St. Peter or St. Andrew died, Mother Church decided that it would help people to remember his life if the day of his death was remembered as the day in which he left this world to be with Jesus. Not only was this done for the Apostles and other friends of Jesus, but for any man or woman whose goodness and example were such that they were called Saints. The Church, however, in the course of time had so many saints that there was one for every day in the year, and quite a number of days had several commemorated on it, as we remember St. Simon and St. Jude on the same day.

When the Reformation came and the Prayer Book was being revised it was decided that all but a very few of these days would be taken out of the calendar. This is the reason that in Roman Catholic countries they have so many saints' days of which we know nothing. Of these that remained two groups were made. The first was called the red letter saints and are made up of saints mentioned in the New Testament only. These we will find in the American Prayer Book. The other group were known as the black letter saints' days, as their names were printed on the calendar in black, whereas the red letter saints' days were printed in red.

These black letter saints were fifty-two in number, and were usually saints connected with the Church in England in some ways. One of them is St. Chad. His day comes on March 2.

He was one of four brothers in Ireland, all four of whom went into a monastery at an early age and then went into the ministry. They all seem to have come to England through Scotland and to have done fine work among the heathen English. These had not yet conquered all of England, but about half of it still belonged to the British or Welch. Of the two who remained priests, the historian tells us "they were celebrated priests of the Lord". One of them, Celin by name, was chaplain to the king of East Anglia and brought the king to know his brother Cedd, who was a bishop. The king got Bishop Cedd to build a monastery near his home and here Bishop Cedd seems to have brought his two other brothers down from Scotland to live in the monastery. His brother Cynebil finished building the monastery and Chad became its first abbot.

Chad soon attracted attention in other countries as well as at home by his zeal and ability and was selected to be Bishop of York, the place where Gregory had wished Augustine to establish an archbishop. But when Chad came to Canterbury he found the archbishop was dead and that there was only one bishop in all England who had been consecrated by the Roman custom, so he got two British bishops to assist Bishop Wini in consecrating him bishop.

Some of the kings saw what a bad thing it would be not to have any bishops in England, so they sent a man to Rome to be consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury. This man died, but the Pope consecrated another man named Theodore to be Archbishop and Theodore came to England.

As Theodore went on his rounds he heard of Chad having been consecrated bishop by Wini and two British bishops. He told him he was really no bishop, not having been properly ordained.

Chad's reply was that he was sure there had been some mistake, as he felt he was not worthy to be a bishop. When Theodore heard this he decided Chad was the kind of bishop he wanted, so he reconsecrated him and made him the first Bishop of Mercia, just south of York.

On his next visit Theodore found Chad had been walking around to visit his parish. Theodore said he should ride, and, indeed, finding Chad preferred to walk as more humble, got a horse and lifted Chad onto it, telling him he ordered him to ride.

Chad built himself a little chapel near the Cathedral he had built, and here he used to like to retire with seven or eight friends to pray as often as he could get away from his duties.

One day, the story goes, a stranger was passing and heard strains of beautiful music coming from this chapel. No one was there save Chad, however, who soon opened the door. The stranger asked what the music was and Chad said it was angels who had come to tell him he would soon be called to heaven. A week later a man claimed he saw angels carrying the soul of Chad to heaven singing sweetly as they went.

So when we come to the story the thought comes of what we shall say of him.

In the first place, Chad was an Irishman and a most lovable one, for every one seems to have loved him, even though they came to give him a rebuke.

Next no one can read of him without seeing how much Chad loved prayer. He was a mystic and used to love to go off and pray with a few friends in times others would have wanted to rest.

The story of the angels' songs, if it stood alone, might be doubted, but there have been so many good men who have heard sweet music just before death we cannot help but think that God does thus often softed the pangs of death by that method.

Then we note the humility of Chad. He was glad not to be bishop. He did not wish to ride. He wished to be always of the poorest of the land. There is something very touching in this, and finally we note the anxiety he felt at all times to explain Jesus to all who knew him not. He was as anxious to tell people about Jesus as we are to tell of our sports or homes. He seemed really to walk with Christ and to want every one to know his Friend.

Times have changed greatly, but we wonder if the four qualities of Loveableness, Prayer, Humility and Loving men and God are as much out of date as we sometimes think they are and we wonder if we would not be happier if we had just a little bit more of them.

Just a personal word to Leaguers:

The life of St. Chad is one that fascinates us today, but we are so apt to think that as a life it belonged to the distant past and so does not touch our own time.

But today the Church Army on which we had a program a few weeks ago offers the opportunity to give our lives to Christ in much the same way. For Captain Mountford has written us that there are several vacancies in the training school this fall. Any one interested should write to him at 416 Lafayette Street, New York, N. Y.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

STREET PULPIT.
First Presbyterian Church
Pittsburgh, Pa.
(See Cover Page.)

The Street Pulpit stands directly in front of the church, and directly over the side-walk and street. The First Church is situated in the very heart of business Pittsburgh. I conduct the service from 7:30 to 8 o'clock P.M., just before the regular service at 8 o'clock. The people gather in front of the church, on the steps, along the side walk, on both sides of the street, in automobiles, and in the windows of the Duquesne Club across the street, and elsewhere. We have three hymns, an invocation and a brief sermon. The theme last night, "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that the Judgment." When one is preaching on the street by a broadcasting system. All great cardinal truths of the Gospel are worth talking about. The sermon is broadcast through a loud speaker which penetrates through the traffic of the street. The choir is at the organ in the church and the music is carried to the stret by a broadcasting system. All who have taken part in these services seem to feel that it is one of unusual interest and inspiration.

Clarence Edward Macartney,
Minister.

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT NEWS.
Watch for the Forward Movement Autumn Pamphlet.

The Forward Movement has thus far been placing the chief emphasis upon the first part of the task committed to it,—"to reinvigorate the life of the Church" as a preparation for the second part which is to "rehabilitate its work." In accordance with this policy it has distributed the three pamphlets on Discipleship as aids to daily Bible reading and prayer. Reports from all over the Church reveal that great numbers of the people have been moved to ask themselves "Am I a worthy disciple of Christ?" and to ddicate themselves to a more whole hearted service of Christ. While seeking to develop other methods of reinvigorating the Church's life, the Commission has decided to issue a new series of Bible Reading Suggestions and Comments to cover the entire year beginning with Advent, upon a subscription basis. The October-November number which closes the effort for the Church year 1935, will be ready early in September. The Forward Movement Commission urges the clergy to be on the lookout for a circular describing the October-November pamphlet and the subscription plan for the next Church year.

A Plan of Action.

Below are quoted the words a rector writes to his congregation in his parish paper. His plea will strike a responsive, sympathetic note in the hearts of many of the clergy.

"We have talked a great deal. There has been much general exhortation. Now we need a plan of action for 1935-36. It should embrace the whole parish and every part of the parish. It should cover the material (our buildings and furnishings are in a bad state), the financial (for we are not yet in a sound financial condition), the educational and the spiritual. Every group in the Church should decide during the month of June what its own Forward Movement is going to be. These separate plans should be part of a larger plan for the parish."

The Rev. Oliver C. Cox, of New Smyrna, Fla., tells of the method he has tried in distributing the pamphlets of the Forward Movement Commission.

"I find the Forward Movement pamphlets have been of great value in the work of St. Paul's Church here in New Smyrna. The Lenten pamphlets came just a few days before Ash Wednesday. I distributed them in person to every family in the church and to every individual not connected with a family, even to some people who were not churchmen, yet who had shown some interest.

"When the Easter pamphlets arrived, I simply announced that whoever wished one might have it by calling at the rectory. I was not unduly surprised when every pamphlet was called for and some people returned for aditional copies for interested friends.

"During the ten day period between Ascension Day and Whitsunday, I held a daily meditation and prayer service based upon the Whitsunday pamphlet itself, no music, no choir,—just prayer, meditation and affirmation. These services were so well sustained that we had more people receive Holy Communion at Whitsunday than we had at the Easter service."

It Pays to Advertise.

Trinity Church, Hamilton, Ohio, placed an advertisement, size four columns wide by ten inches deep, in the local press, directing the attention of a great many readers to the Forward Movement and the call to a more Christian Discipleship. The advertisement was artistically layed out in heavy type and with pen and ink illustrative borders. We can't think of anything else that succeeds without advertising, so why not the Forward Movement?

Another splendid idea comes from the Rev. Maxwell B. Long, D. D., of the Church of the Redeemer, Hyde Park.

He suggests that the members of the parish read and study Acts this summer with a view to round table conferences this fall on ways we may embody the spirit which worked in the first century disciples into the life and problems of today.

CHURCH COUNCIL APPEALS TO CLERGY TO SAFEGUARD MARRIAGES.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America today issued the results of a study made by its Committee on Marriage and the Home on methods of safeguarding the marriage relationship against careless and ill-suited marriages and hasty divorces. The statement, as issued by Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert, General Secretary of the Federal Council, after official approval by the Executive Committee, declares that the standards of procedure on the part of many of the clergy in dealing with marriages are too lax, and that it is the duty of the minister who unites people in marriage to give instruction on the subject. The fact that a couple can go to a clergyman who has never seen them before and can be married and gone in a few minutes, never to be seen by him again, is cited as an indication of a lack of deep regard for the sacredness of marriage.

The Chairman of the Committee on Marriage and the Home, by which the study was made, is Dr. Howard Chandler Robbins, Professor of Pastoral Theology in the General Theological Seminary, New York. The Executive Secretary is Dr. L. Foster Wood.

The results of a questionnaire sent out by the Committee to clergymen who have taken a special interest in problems of family life, reveals that relatively few are giving serious attention to pre-marital counseling. One minister replied: "Of two hundred eighty-five couples whom I have married, I know the whereabouts of only eleven, and I am in touch with one." Another minister said: "One doesn't know of the weddings usually until they arrive at the door." While these are held to be extreme cases, they are regarded as evidence of need for more exacting standards of marriage procedure on the part of a large number of the clergy.

A movement among ministers for holding pre-marital interviews with couples who come to them for marriage is reported as making rapid headway. An inquiry into the instruction given on this subject in theological seminaries discloses that in at least thirty-three of the leading theological institutions students are definitely advised to conduct premarital interviews in connection with the marriages which they perform.

The study of the Committee gives detailed attention to the technique, aims and content of such pre-marital instruction. The danger of hasty and unwise marriages is illustrated by reference to the record of Los Angeles County, California, where an interval of three days is required between the application and the final granting of the marriage license. Of twenty thousand couples applying for marriage licenses in this county in a single year, twelve hundred, or six per cent. of the total, changed their minds during the three-day interval. The Committee concludes from this evidence that a considerable percentage of couples who appear before ministers for marriage could be discovered, in the course of a serious interview, to be acting hastily and unwisely and should be advised to wait for further light before taking an ill-considered step.

Among the subjects on which the Committee insists that the minister should be informed are the degree of acquaintance and compatibility of temperament of the persons in question, their religious backgrounds and the attitudes of their families toward the marriage. Ministers are further urged to ascertain whether prospective mates understand the nature of permanent love, whether they are in sympathy with the distinctive aims of Christian marriage, whether they have adequate knowledge of the sexual relationship in marriage, the responsibility of parenthood, and the spacing of children for the protection of the health of mothers and the welfare of the whole family.

Well-planned courses of training for marriage and homemaking, from childhood up, are urged as an integral part of the program of religious education in the home and the church.

Important sections of the report dealing with the minister's responsibility are as follows:

"The preventative emphasis which is characteristic of our time may be as usefully applied to marital failure and unhappiness as to other problems. While great progress has been made in preventing epidemics, accidents, fires and floods, little public or professional attention has been devoted to the prevention of a most serious evil, namely, the disintegration of families. Ministers have been more given to approaching the question of marriage with generalizations and with sermons against divorce than to the preparation of young people for successful adjustment.

"While the chief responsibility for the ultimate success of marriages must rest mainly with those who enter into them, the pastor is bound by the nature of his position as a man of God to treat each marriage as a matter of the utmost importance. He can hardly claim to have done this unless he interviews his couples carefully and wisely. As a civil official, temporarily, acting with the power of the state, the minister brings the couple into a union which is legally binding, but it is much more in accord with the genius of his function as a religious leader that he should help them enter into a marriage that is spiritually vital.

"There is little value in blaming the individual pastor who is merely following an unfortunate tradition and is often a victim of unfavorable circumstances for which he is not entirely responsible. But when we think of the ministry as a group, the conclusion is inescapable that most Protestant ministers in America are lending themselves to a careless type of marriage procedure. It is encouraging to note that the ministers, both in city and country parishes, who are attempting to make marriage really sacred are increasing in numbers. Judging from results already achieved in limited areas there would seem to be a fair chance of stemming the tide of divorce, of raising the standards of marriage and of enhancing the prestige of the church."

The report advises ministers to encourage prospective husbands and wives to have a medical examination. The Committee says:

"Even in the great majority of cases in which a medical examination would reveal no obstacle to marriage, a competent medical adviser can give the couple such valuable help that it is to be desired that physicians should give more attention to pre-marital counselling and that a medical examination should become a regular part of the preparation of young people for marriage."

On the remarriage of divorced people the report says:

"We are not here raising the question as to whether ministers should marry people who are divorced. Some refuse to marry all such persons. In any case, the minister is concerned both to help the people who come to him and to maintain Christian standards of marriage. If he feels justified in performing the ceremony, he will have a special concern for helping the person who has made one failure in marriage to understand the destructive factors which wrecked his or her first marriage, and to avoid these things in the second. Some divorced persons will already have developed insight into the causes of their first failure, but others will be under the illusion that all they needed was a change of partners, when, in fact, the reason for the failure was partly in themselves."

The significance of religious training in preventing divorce is summarized as follows:

"It is of no slight importance that families in which the members are faithful to their religious duties show a much smaller, in fact, almost negligible percentage of divorce. Homes whose domestic ties are bound together in God are more secure than are homes established on secular motives. Young people respond to the highest thoughts of the home which they are to establish, or may be led so to respond. Their love for each other stirs up the best in them and makes them sensitive to the spiritual appeal. If the minister presents the help of religion to their venture with the earnest wish to build up the life of the two whom he is to unite he will not only help to safeguard the marriage but will also be building the true household of God on earth."

15,000 YOUTHS LAUNCH NEW PROGRAM.

"We Choose Christ" Will Be Two-Year Theme of International Christian Endeavor.

In more than a dozen great mass meetings and more than two hundred and fifty conference sessions, Christian Endeavorers in international convention at Philadelphia, Pa., July 2 to 7, launched a new two-year program. "We Choose Christ" is the slogan and challenge for the forward movement, selected not alone for its national significance but because the phrase repeats the recent courageous resolution of German Christian Endeavorers.

Campaigns in evangelism, social reconstruction, alcohol education, good literature and world peace are included in the new emphases, as outlined by Dr. Daniel A. Poling, president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union and the International Society of Christian Endeavor, and adopted with enthusiasm by the fifteen thousand youth delegates at the Philadelphia meetings.

"We Choose Christ" supplements and extends for young people's Christian Endeavor societies and kindred leadership-training groups the united youth theme of "Christian Youth Building a New World." Throughout the conference sessions or school of the convention, conducted under the chairmanship of Dr. Harry Thomas Stock, the themes were used interchangeably. In number of sessions and attendance these conferences set new records for even an International Christian Endeavor youth congress. All available rooms and smaller halls in the spacious auditorium building were used, and the convention overflowed into two buildings of the nearby University of Pennsylvania. Intermediates went to college—for their conferences and forums were held in halls on the campus!

Leading speakers included Dr. Robert E. Speer, Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, Dr. Norman E. Richardson, Dr. Oscar W. Blackwelder, Dr. Norman V. Peale (who conducted the well-attended daily Quiet Hour meetings), Dr. William Hiram Foulkes (in charge of the union communion service, a high point in the devotional emphases of the convention), Miss Margaret Slattery, Dr. Samuel W. Hughes of London, Dr. Edwin T. Dahlberg, Dr. Lester H. Clee, Dr. Louis H. Evans, and Rev. Vere W. Abbey, who returns to India this fall as general secretary of the Christian Endeavor Union of India and Burma. A number of Negro speakers and conference chairmen participated and the Negro registration was particularly heavy. Of this race, Martin L. Harvey, president of the Christian Youth Council of North America, was one of a score of young people who summarized the conference sessions in a main session of the convention.

Philadelphia churches joined enthusiastically in the biennial Christian Endeavor parade, which was credited by newspaper reporters with fifty thousand marchers, forty bands, and several hundred floats, and unsurpassed save by two processions in Philadelphia in this century. A single church, Messiah Lutheran, had nearly two thousand marchers in line, as a witness to the Christian principles for which the convention stood and a mark of friendship and respect to the visiting Endeavorers.

Into its new campaign, Christian Endeavor carries a World Peace Fellowship, of which twenty-eight-year-old Ernest R. Bryan, educator, traveler and radio speaker, who was a county Christian Endeavor union president at fifteen, will be superintendent. By its enrollment, its educational literature, and its facilities for mobilizing youth for specific goals in world peace, the fellowship appears to have unusual promise as a means for common action, without committing youth for or against a personal position of complete pacifism. The enrollment becomes world-wide through the means of the World's Christian Endeavor Convention, meeting in Budapest in August, and the eight months' around-the-world tour of President Poling, in which he will meet and speak to Endeavorers of thirty-four countries.

The convention has been hailed by Philadelphia church leaders in general as aiding the progress of Christian work throughout that area as well as giving definite direction and practical objectives to Christian social aims, to which the Quaker City is increasingly sensitive. The program here launched bids fair to be historic, particularly when to the impetus of the American convention is added that of Budapest and the various European and Asiatic meetings with similar emphases.

MISS MEACHAM RETURNING TO LIBERIA TO REOPEN THE JULIA EMERY HALL.

Miss Olive Meacham, returning to Liberia, sailed from New York on the Berengaria July 26 after a farewell service in the chapel at Church Missions House. She goes back to reopen the Julia Emery Hall at Bromley which was closed for lack of funds but is now reopened as contributions have been given or made available for that purpose. The past six months have been a crowded and industrious period for Miss Meacham as she has been much in demand as a speaker and has also taken advantage of being in New York to shop in wholesale houses for necessary supplies and materials for her school. She sails from Liverpool on the S. S. Accra, Elder Dempster Line, August 14.

RAILROAD STATION TO BE CONVERTED INTO A CHURCH.

The former Union Pacific railroad station at Paxton, Oregon, has been bought and is to be moved to Cross Keys, Oregon, where it wil be placed on a lot (already donated by a Churchman) and turned into a church and parish hall for St. Peter's Mission. This mission has been functioning for some years past in the local schoolhouse, looked after by the priest from Trinity Church, Bend. The former railroad station will make a useful center for the Church's work in this rural district.

SCOTLAND'S BISHOPS.

The Episcopal Church in Scotland has only seven bishops in all and two of these are Kenneth Mackenzie,—the Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, who has been bishop nearly thirty years,—and the Bishop of Brechin, consecrated this year.

Scotland has the only Church in the world which calls its presiding bishop a Primus. He is Arthur John MacLean, Bishop of Moray, Ross and Caithness. The term Primus has been in use in the Scottish Church off and on since the ninth century.

BISHOP OF LONDON WARNS AGAINST SPIRITUALISM AS DANGEROUS, WASTE OF TIME

The Bishop of London solemnly warns Church people against the dangers of Spiritualism in the current number of his Diocesan Leaflet.

"Most wilingly," writes Dr. Win-

"Most willingly," writes Dr. Winanything, as some of my best friends believe in it, and also one or two of my leading clergy, to say nothing of men like Sir Oliver Lodge, whom the world honors and respects, and yet I feel that this attempt to comunicate through mediums with those in the other world is all wrong, is very dangerous, is dishonoring to the dead, and is a waste of time for the living. Even those who practice it admit its dangers, and further admit that you may get into contact with most unpleasant spirits who can do you nothing but harm. . . .

"The Church of this diocese," he adds, "so far from encouraging this revival of Spiritualism, discourages it in every possible way; I have already forbidden any church or any church building to be used for seances, and I do most earnestly exhort those whom I personally know and love to give up this unauthorized attempt to communicate with the other world and to come back to the guidance of the Holy Spirit of God who can alone be trusted to guide us into all truth."

PROCEEDINGS ON BISHOP BURLESON'S WILL.

The executors of the will of the late Bishop Hugh L. Burleson, assistant to the Presiding Bishop, have asked the surrogate of New York County, where he lived, to give them specific instructions as to provisions in the will. Bishop Burleson did not make his will with legal advice, with the result that many of the provisions and expressions are vague, leaving the executors a great deal of discretion. The executors, Bishop William Blair Roberts and the Rev. Wilbert D. Swain, want a judicial opinion of the legality and binding force of phrases like "I should wish," "if the estate warrants it," "I wish all necessary help to be given." Under three papers admitted by the court as the will, the remainder left, after certain bequests are made, goes to the bishop's son, John E. Burleson. However, in the third paper the bishop makes instructions given in the first two discretionary, depending upon what may seem best at the time of his death. In a fourth paper, which has not yet been admitted as part of the will, the bishop requested that $2,000 be given to the National Council, and $1,500 to the endowment fund of Calvary Cathedral, Sioux City, South Dakota, the remainder to be shared by the son and the cathedral. The son contends however that this was merely a memorandum, and is not binding as a will. To make all this clear and definite the executors want to have the judgment of the court before proceeding further.

BOY SCOUT JAMBOREE PLANS NEAR COMPLETION.

From August 21 to August 30, 1935, the Nation's Capital promises to be the scene of the greatest assemblage of boys in the history of the United States. Plans are going forward for the encampment of 30,000 or more Boy Scouts during their ten-day National Jamboree, Mr. Harvey A. Gordon, director of the camp engineering, asserts.

A plot of 300 acres is now laid off in typical Army camp fashion on Columbia Island, adjacent to the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, near Four Mile Run. On this plot, 8,500 sleeping tents, supplied by the Army, will be set up. These tents will be supplied with Army cots, on which boys from all over the United States and many parts of the world will rest after each day's full and strenuous events.

Another camp site is in process of completion on the lower portion of Hains Point across from the War College. General Scout headquarters, located near the Fourteenth Street Bridge on Columbia Island, are in the course of construction.

Facilities for supplying over 1,000,000 gallons of fresh water a day for all its various purposes in camp are being provided. Shower baths are being set up to accomodate 2,200 boys at a time. Means for proper disposal of used water from the baths, kitchens and lavatories are in the course of construction.

Then there are the lighting, telephone, and other modern facilities, such as transportation, being provided.

Some idea of the food required to sustain 30,000 hungry boys, seated at 5,250 tables, may be had from the following requirements for one day: 90,000 units of fruit, such as bananas, oranges, apples, etc.; 70,000 eggs; 17,000 pounds of fresh meat; 17,000 loaves of bread; 30,000 quarts of milk; and 900 bushels of potatoes.

Imagine 5,000 Scouts visiting Mt. Vernon each day for six consecutive days; but this is the plan, and it will be conducted by trained Scout leaders.

A newspaper will be published by the Scouts themselves. It will probably be called the Jamboree Journal, and the Scouts will act as reporters. The Scouts to the number of 1,260 will do their own policing; they will be divided into three groups of camp patrols, traffic guards and night guards, it was stated.

Dr. James E. West, Chief Scout Executive of the Boy Scouts, Mr. E. S. Martin, Acting Director of Publicity, and other active national executives are in Washington, D. C., carrying forward the preliminaries.

When asked how many Boy Scouts were actually expected to come to Washington, Mr. Martin said that "there was little doubt that the number will have reached or passed 35,000." "In adition to Scouts themselves," Mr. Martin said, "it is expected that many parents and brothers and sisters of the boys will come to visit the Capital."

On July 29, Dr. William J. Morton, D. D., preached a farewell sermon to his congregation at Christ Church, Alexandria, taking his text from St. Paul's last address to the church at Ephesus, "Now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of His grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." The sermon was one of sincerity and simplicity that was eloquence itself. The large congregation filled the church to do honor to the occasion of his retirement after a rectorate of 33 years.

The retiring rector urged his listeners to take time for Sunday worship and to remember the words, "Take Time to Be Holy." I commend to you, he said, the old prayer book service—may it continue to be the form of worship in this old Virginia church. We can never worship God in our homes, as we can when we come here to the House of God, Dr. Morton said, referring to the great need of the spiritual in the material life. The Word of Grace is able to build you up; to give you an inheritance among the sanctified!

In concluding his excellent discourse, Dr. Morton asked the loyal suport of all parishoners for his sucessor and said he was glad that a younger man was coming to the pulpit. The world has a call for young men of consecration who can be a pattern and a guide.

Dr. Morton graduated from the Virginia Seminary in 1891. His first charge was at Tappahannock, from there he went to Danville, later he had churches in Richmond, Knoxville, Tenn., Harrisonburg and then he came to Christ Church, Alexandria.

Dr. and Mrs. Morton will make their future home in Charlottesville, Va.

Peace Pageant.

A Peace Pagent was staged by several hundred children representing the Metropolitan Federation of Daily Vacation Bible schools in New York City, Friday, July 26, in the music grove of Prospect Park, Brooklyn. The Pageant marked the conclusion of the annual summer courses in which more than 30,000 youngsters had been enrolled. The children that took part in the Pageant were between six and fifteen years old. The Pageant consisted of four dramatic episodes depicting the necessity of international co-operation and stressing the futility of war. The script of the Pageant was written by the children. Mrs. Imogene McPherson, acting educational director of the Daily Vacation Bible Schools, was in charge of the festival. She was assisted by Edith Lovell Thomas, music director; Miss Elizabeth Edland, dramatic coach; Mrs. Ruth Humble, costumes; Mrs. Dorothy Collins Hart and Miss Helen Lockwood. The children were from the Flatbush Congregational Church, Twelfth Street Reformed Church of Brooklyn, St. John's African Methodist Church of Broklyn, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Brooklyn, the Warren Street Methodist Church of Brooklyn, the Edgewood Reformed Disciples Church, the Plymouth Church of the Pilgrims of Brooklyn, and God's Providence House, one of the City Mission Settlement Houses in the Diocese of New York.

Trinity Year Book Published.

That the Church today is not fulfilling its responsibilities as in the past and that a critical self-examination is called for; that Christian leadership in politics abroad and in this country is the only hope of sound government; and that liberty is being crucified and denied to men today, are some of the thoughts expressed by the Rev. Dr. Frederic S. Fleming, rector, in his twenty-six page annual statement, serving as a preface to the three hundred page "Year Book and Register of the Parish of Trinity Church of New York," published today.

Dr. Fleming is twelfth rector of Trinity Parish of which the "Mother Church" is Old Trinity at the head of Wall Street, standing on a spot which has been consecrated to religion since 1687, eighty years before the signing of the Declaration of Independence. The present building is the third on this site and this church was consecrated in 1846, eighty-nine years ago. The Parish extends from Governors Island to Washington Heights. There are seven Chapels in the Parish, including St. Paul's at Broadway and Fulton Street and the beautiful Gothic Chapel of the Intercession located at Broadway and 155th Street.

Affairs of the Parish.

The rector called attention to the opening of "The Parish Hall of Trinity Church," placed by him in the basement of the Trinity Office building at 74 Trinity Place, for downtown business men and women seeking rest and recreation. He entertains the hope of establishing courses of lectures, to be given in the late afternoon at the normal hours of the closing of business, on subjects pertaining to religion and reaching into all fields related to the Church.

He further told of the reinforcing work being done on the foundations of the tower of Trinity Church as a precautionary measure and announced that the famous churchyards of Trinity and St. Paul's have been beautified by gifts of trees through the interest of Electus D. Litchfield, President of The Municipal Art Society.

He also described the acquisition of a model of the first Trinity Church erected in 1697 and mentioned for the first time a hope for the establishment of a permanent historical exhibit in Trinity Church itself. The model will be a part of that permanent exhibit when established.

Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Bishop.

Rev. Henry Bedinger Dies.

Philadelphia, July 21.—Word was received here yesterday of the death in San Deigo, California, on July 20, of the Rev. Henry Bedinger, formerly of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, whose entire ministry covered a period of 60 years. If Mr. Bedinger had lived until today he would have reached the 82nd year of his age, having been born in Flushing, N. Y., on that date in 1853.

Mr. Bedinger was educated at the Shenandoah Valley Academy, Winchester, Va.; the University of Virginia, General Theological Seminary and Berkeley Divinity School. Ordained to the diaconate in 1875 he first served at Greenport, Long Island, going from there to St. Paul's Church, Kittanning, Pa. Subsequently he served as Chaplain to the late Bishop Niles of New Hampshire and then as rector of St. Luke's, Fishkill on Hudson, now Beacon, N. Y. For several years he served as special preacher at Calvary Church, N. Y., when the late Rt. Rev. Henry Y. Satterlee, Bishop of Washington, was rector prior to his being called to the Episcopate. Mr. Bedinger's longest rectorship was at St. Peter's, Salem, Mass., covering a period of 26 years. In 1918 at the request of Bishop Rhinelander, then serving the Diocese of Pennsylvania, Mr. Bedinger came to Philadelphia, serving as a Diocesan Missionary under the Diocesan. About six or seven years ago he went to San Deigo, and during his residence there preached in many places throughout the Diocese of Los Angeles. At the time of his death Mr. Bedinger was Virginia State Chaplain of the Society of Cincinnati. His death on July 20 was due to embolism. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Ada Doughty Bedinger, two daughters and a son. One of his daughters, Miss Grace Bedinger, resigned as a member of the faculty of the famous Baldwin School Bryn Mawr, Pa., about a year ago to join her parents in California. The other daughter, Miss Margery Bedinger, is librarian of the School of Mines, Butte, Montana. The son, George R. Bedinger, is a widely known layman of the Church in the Diocese of Pensylvania and is Executive Director of the Public Charities Association of the State of Pennsylvania.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, D. D. Bishop.

An Inclusive Sunday.

Among the fifty or more parishes and missions in the diocese, a group of twelve are ministered to by one man, the Rev. Ralph Markey of St. Andrew's, Carbondale. The ordinary Sunday for Mr. Markey includes at least five services and 175 miles of travel. Some of his missions have week-day services. Bishop White recently confirmed thirty-seven persons from the missions at Marion, Zeigler and West Frankfort. The diocese of Springfield includes two-thirds the area of Illinois but only two-sevenths of the population.

LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. H. P. A. Abbott, D. D., Bishop.

Redecoration of Christ Church, Lexington, has begun, and services are being held in the Parish House. The Easter offering has made the work possible. Meetings of the Synod of the Province of Sewanee will be held in this church in October. The Rev. C. P. Sparling, D. D., is rector.

The Rev. Francis F. Lynch, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, preached in the Church of St. Mary of the Angels, Hollywood, Cal., in June and July.

At Margaret Hall School, Versailles, on St. Anne's Day, Sister Rachel made her life profession in the Order of St. Anne. She is the principal of the school. The chaplain, the Rev. George Ralph Madson, conducted the service.

Annual Alumni Meeting of Dubose School.

The Rev. Peter M. Dennis, President of the Dubose Alumni Association, announces that plans have been made for the annual Alumni meeting of the Dubose School. Following the regular yearly custom it will be held at the School on August 6. A special feature of the meeting will be the election of officers to succeed those retiring. All graduates of the School are being urged to attend.

WESTERN NEBRASKA.

Rt. Rev. George A. Beecher, D. D., Bishop.

The Right Rev. Bishop E. V. Shayler has returned from a vacation trip to Ohio.

An anouncement of the reorganization of the Associated Missions of the Diocese with headquarters at York, Nebraska, informs the churches and membership scattered over a wide area of Central Nebraska that the Rev. J. T. Knight has left for another field. The entire work, after new plans for travel and service time have been completed, will be under the direction of Rev. Robert Mason.

A considerable number of churches in this diocese have changed their hour for the summer months to 9 and 9:30 A. M., there being nothing sacred about the 11 o'clock hour, and many preferring the earlier time during the period of Nebraska heat.

Church Repairs.

Portions of the cement floor in the basement of St. John's Church, Savannah, the Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, rector, had to be torn up recently in an effort to exterminate termites that were found to be doing considerable damage to the Church. Repairs have now been completed and it is believed that the posts have been eradicated and that there will be no return of the trouble. This is the second time in the past three or four years that this work has had to be done.

* * *

Grace Church, Waycross, has recently had exterior and interior repairs made on the Church and parish house and the Church property is now in first class condition.

The Rev. S. B. McGlohon, former rector of St. Paul's Church, Savannah, comes to Waycross once a month for a celebration of the Holy Communion since the resignation of the rector, the Rev. John B. Walthour, last spring.

Teaching a Needed Lesson About Transferring.

The act of transferring a communicant from one parish to another has been "dramatized" for the Church schools at San Benito and Harligen, Texas, by the Rev. W. E. Johnson. It is commonly known that thousands of communicants are lost to the Church because the formal transfer is omitted and ignored. Mr. Johnson is pressing home the lesson in a memorable way. Blank forms for transfer are secured.

COLLECT FOR THE SEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY.

Lord of all power and might, who art the author and giver of all good things; Graft in our hearts the love of Thy Name, increase in us true religion, nourish us with all goodness, and of Thy great mercy keep us in the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

* * *

LORD, MAKE ME STRONG.

Lord, make me strong; my strength is only weakness;
Let Thy great power possess my inmost soul,
Give me the grace to show the strength of meekness,
The might of gentleness and self control.

Lord, make me strong against the fret and worry;
Strong in patience that can wait and wait;
Seeing no need for anxious, breathless hurry.
For Thy good plan for me is never late.

And make me strong in calmness of assurance,
That Thou art shaping human destiny;
And, knowing this, my faith shall find endurance,
In calm that knows Thy will is best for me.

O make me strong enough to be forgiving—
Like Him who hung upon the cruel tree,
For all the failures in my daily living,
O Lord, I pray that Thou wilt pardon me.

The Transfiguration.

As the consciousness of His mission and the requisite means for its accomplishment were borne in upon Jesus, when the crisis passed and He faced the immediate future, the need for silent communing with His Father apart from the pressure of the world must have become more than ever insistent. But He desired human companionship now, just as later, when, for the last time, He faced the issue in the Garden of Gethsemane; so He sets out with the three, Peter, James and John, for the whole day's climb, about six or eight hours, to the top of Hermon, where He intends to spend the night in prayer. No doubt, as in the Garden later, He withdrew a little from His companions, and they, having said their night prayers, wrapped themselves in their cloaks and slept, leaving Him to watch and pray alone. It was then, as He was praying, that the fashion of His countenance was altered and His raiment became white and dazzling and those two heavenly visitants stood with Him, speak of His decease. Some breath from heaven stirred those three slumbering figures, a stone's throw away, and "when they were fully awake, they saw His glory".

If we are right in supposing that, as very Man, with the limitations set upon His human knowledge, which were inevitable if He was indeed to be perfectly and completely Man, He came by degrees to recognize the nature of His mission, and so of the necessity of His death, are we wrong in supposing that the Transfiguration was an assurance of the Father's good pleasure, an assurance of which at that moment He stood greatly in need? On the eve of His Passion He prayed, "Glorify Thou Me with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was". Was there in that prayer a calling to mind of that moment of glory vouchsafed to Him at the Transfiguration, when the voice came out of the cloud, assuring Him, as it declared to the apostles, "This is My Son, My Chosen"? Moses and Elijah, by their presence and their words, established Him in the conviction that by His death He must glorify the Father, and the voice from heaven sealed the Father's acceptance of the sacrifice of His eternal Son.

I think that we are right in so regarding it; and if it be objected that by daring to suggest that the Lord Christ stood in need of the assurance which the experience gave we are forgetting His eternal Godhead, surely the very manner of that event is sufficient answer to our critic. To Jesus, no less than to the apostles who witnessed it, it was a revelation of the eternal glory which was His, as very God, before the world was; the transfigured face, the dazzling whiteness which surrounded His Person, declared unmistakably the majesty and the glory which are His by right from all eternity. No one of the sons of men could have been invested with glory so ineffable; no one of His saints in later ages was ever called, or could be named as Son and Chosen. If the Transfiguration is indeed to us a declaration of the true humanity of Jesus Christ because it was an experience vouchsafed to Him in His humanity at a moment when He greatly needed it for the strengthening of His purpose, it is no less, thank God, the assurance to us also of His very Deity. And this was the enduring effect of the vision upon Peter and James and John. It was upon the remembrance of His glory that they dwelt in later years as they referred to it in their writings.

Out of a spirit of reverence we dare not do more than suggest, and that with careful restraint upon our imagination, what might be the significance of this mystery to the blessed Lord; but we are on easier ground when we try to regard it from the point of view of the apostles. Startling as indeed it was, and utterly otherworldly, in its character, it has a twofold purpose.

They had been greatly troubled in mind at the prophecy of His death about a week earlier. How could the Messiah suffer a death of shame? Their loyalty to Him must have been strained almost to breaking point, for never had the prophets of old suggested, so they believed, that the Messiah should suffer You remember how on the road to Emmaus He spoke of those two who walked with Him as being "fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets had spoken". Clearly, they had never applied Isaiah's prophecy of the Suffering Servant to the Christ, and they must have spent a most unhappy week wondering what it all could mean, and whether they could continue to be disciples of this Man Who spake such strange and contradictory things concerning the hope of Israel. For them without doubt the Transfiguration was a revelation given in order to establish their faith in Jesus and to enlighten their understanding as to the nature and purpose of His mission. That dazzling glory, the declaration of His Godhead, reaffirmed in their minds Peter's profession of faith, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God", and they could not help but notice how the revelation of Godhead was now linked with discussion of His death, as it had been when Peter first declared it. Of course, they lost sight of this in the overwhelming grief of the crucifixion, but afterwards, when He had ascended, and in quiet confidence they were able to go back over the events of His earthly life, they remembered what Moses and Elijah had said when they were with Him on the holy mount. For them the first great purpose of the Transfiguration was to establish their conviction that this Jesus is both Lord and Christ. And the second purpose follows naturally from it—that the Son of Man must come to that glory which is His from all eternity through suffering, death and resurrection.—From a sermon by Canon Armitage in the Guardian (English).

Begin With Faith.

"Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge." (2 Pet. 1:5.)

Peter was old enough to be granted the privilege of reminiscing and good enough to be allowed to advise. Writing to those who would build Christian character so as to be richly furnished with the opportunity to enter the everlasting Kingdom of Christ, he advises thus: "You have been allotted a faith equal to and as precious as ours. Begin with that faith and add these virtues to it."

Did you know Peter when he was young? Did he show knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness and love for the brethren? In knowledge he so far missed the meaning of the life of Christ that Jesus called him "Satan". Instead of self-control, he sliced off a servant's ear. When He might have been patient, Jesus was praying that his faith fail not. When he should have been giving forth a taste of the things of God, he was savoring of the things of the world. When he ought to have been loving the brethren, he was showing discord in Paul's young church at Antioch. When he ought to have been loving Jesus, he was denying him.

It would seem that he had none of these virtues when he began. But do you know him and his strength in Christ now? Now he looks at his own path of development and advises others. To change his words a bit: "In the beginning I was allotted faith alone, just as faith is given of God to you—faith in the goodness of God and the saving power of Jesus. Because you have that which to begin, grace and peace can be multiplied in you. Begin your spiritual growth by adding to these virtues to the faith you have.—C. P. Hardin, in Christian Advocate.

Our Lord's Teaching of Nature.

Did you ever notice how much of our Lord's teaching is about nature? How observant He was! How keen was His eye for what went on around Him and the sights presented!

Because of this we are almost as familiar with Palestine and its sights as with the land in which we live. All of us have seen in our mind's eye that Syrian field with its four kinds of soil, and we have watched with interest the fate of the seed on each. We have stood by and seen those two houses built, one on the rock and the other on the sandy bed of the dried-up river. We have stood by also when the rains descended and reduced one house to a heap of ruins while the other stood the test of the storm. The vineyard with its tower, its hedge, its winepress and its labourers, the flock of sheep called by the familiar voice of the shepherd—these are familiar to us and we owe them to Jesus and His power as a painter of pictures. He was most observant and able to relate what He saw.

How many of the plants of Palestine are familiar to us through our Lord's allusions to them. The tiny mustard seed and the large mustard shrub that could sustain birds, fig trees and thistles, the grape vines and the thorns, the wheat and the tares, the marsh reed swaying in the breeze and the wild flower adorning the meadow with a beauty which surpassed the glory of Solomon—all these are familiar names and sights to us because our Lord noticed them and wove them into His teaching.

How many of the dumb creatures of that day and land enter into His message. Foxes and wolves, oxen, sheep and goats, swine, the camel, the ass, the fatted calf for the festive occasion, the scavenger dogs that got only a kick as well as the little pet dogs under the table—these are all familiar to us for they interested our Lord. He took notice of them and mentioned them.

It is the same regarding the birds. The sparrows, doves and ravens, the cock crowing at break of day, the hen gathering her brood under her protecting wing, the eagles collecting over a carcase, birds hovering over a sower to pick up the stray seed, birds quietly going to sleep at eventide in the branches of a tree—they were all dear to Jesus, all noticed by Him. They formed part of His message.

Jesus mentions animals in His most personal sayings and uses them to express His deepest feeling. His own homelessness He shows by contrasting His condition with the fox creeping to his den and with the birds on their nests or their roosts at evening. His eager yearning for an unresponsive people He pictured by the hen endeavoring to gather her chickens under her wings.

He was always considerate of the animals. In the temple He overturned the tables of the money changers and sent the coins rolling over the floor, but the cages with the doves He did not upset. He bade the owners "take these things hence".—Canadian Churchman.

Not for Sale.

As my dear father did not believe in selling his medical knowledge, so it nauseates me to have to sell my musical ability. I was born with music in my system. It was a gift of Providence. I did not acquire it. So I do not even deserve thanks for the music. Do you thank birds for flying in the sky, or do the birds charge you fees for singing in the woods? Music is too sacred to be sold. The outrageous prices the musical celebrities charge today truly is a crime against society.

To keep my conscience free from contamination, I never look upon the money I earn as my own. It belongs to the public. It is only a fund entrusted to my care for proper disbursement. If I spend the money for my personal pleasure I should feel guilty of a heinous crime. How can I squander money on myself while there is so much misery, so much hunger in the world? To be perfectly healthy, the human body does not need much. We artificially create and increase our needs; develop costly habits; then feel miserable when we cannot have things.

I constantly endeavor to reduce my needs to the minimum. I feel morally guilty in ordering a costly meal, for it deprives some one else of a slice of bread—some child, perhaps, of a bottle of milk. So many people go hungry in the world every day! My beloved wife feels about these things as I do. In all these years of my so-called success in music, we have not built a home for ourselves. Between it and us stand all the homeless in the world!

For the welfare of the human race—for the preservation of civilization itself, a revaluation of individual and of national success is essential.—Fritz Kreisler, in Success Magazine.

HERITAGE.

Mabel Brindley.

Have you seen a captive rabbit, just a common cotton-tail
That was born to live in freedom, born to choose a woodland trail,
Burrowing beneath a thicket, sleeping amid the leaves and dirt,
Sniffing hungrily for lettuce, hopping around with ears alert?

Have you seen that woodland rabbit caught by men, no longer free,
Seen the limpid eyes turn glassy if deprived of liberty,
Seen the mobile ears quite rigid, flattened back against his head;
Understood his helpless feeling, known the constant shrinking dread?

Then you understand, my boy, and his hungry, pleading eyes
Craving use of fettered body, skill to do that satisfies,
And you'll share my exultation when we master Nature's code,
And give our sons a heritage of strength to walk their chosen road.

Christ as King.

The mark of what a kingdom is, is to be seen in the King. Christ now reigns as God and man on the throne of the Father. On earth there is no embodiment or external manifestation of the Kingdom; its power is seen in the lives of those in whom it rules. It is only in the Church, the members of Christ, that the united Body can be seen and known. Christ lives and dwells and rules in their hearts. Our Lord Himself taught how close the relationship would be. "In that day ye shall know that I am in My Father, and ye in Me, and I in you." Next to the faith of His oneness with God, and His omnipotent power, would be the knowledge that they lived in Him and He in them.

This must be our first lesson if we are to follow in the steps of the disciples and to share their blessing, that we must know that Christ actually as King dwells and rules in our hearts. We must know that we live in Him, and in His power are able to accomplish all that He would have us do. Our whole life is to be devoted to our King and the service of His Kingdom.

This blessed relationship to Christ will mean above all a daily fellowship with Him in prayer. The prayer life is to be a continuous and unbroken exercise. It is thus that His people can rejoice in their King, and in Him can be more than conquerors.—Andrew Murray.

FOR THE CHILDREN

A MORNING PRAYER IN THE HEART OF A CHILD.

By Lawrence Hawthorne.

I want to be happy and cheerful today;
I want to be helpful and true;
I want to be kind in the things that I say,
And good in whatever I do.

The flowers give beauty, the birds gaily sing
To make the day brighter, I know;
So, I want to do all I can that will bring
More gladness wherever I go.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Journey of the Brook to the Ocean.

Ada M. Trotter.

A tiny spring welled up through the mosses and trickled forth to wander through a pine wood down the mountain side.

"Welcome!" said the forest birds taking a morning dip in the stream.

"Welcome!" said the stately bracken ferns, stretching out their rootlets to touch the ripples.

The brook wondered. She went on more slowly, winding through some meadow lands, her clear waters sparkling with the rainbow hues.

"Welcome!" cried a laborer, stooping to drink.

"You too!" cried the brook, and she went on, singing. She sang of forests, of pines, the fragrant home of the mosses, of woodland dells, where the mayflower grew and spring flowers raised their delicate heads. She sang the same song over and over again.

"Where are you going?" asked the long, lithe rushes as she splashed them in pssing.

"Oh, I don't know! I must hurry—somewhere."

"Where did you come from?" asked the swallows.

The brook had forgotten. "It does not matter," she said dreamily. "The Eternal made me." She ran along merrily again—laughing in the sunbeams, singing even in the night-time here gay, rippling song.

The somber crows would have stopped her babbling. "Tell us, what is your work in the world?" they asked severely.

"Mine? Oh, I have none."

"Then, as you are of no use to any one, you'd better cease to be," replied the gloomy crows.

The brook mused sadly for a moment; she could not think of anything to say. "The Eternal made me," she whispered presently. "Hush!"

Everything was very still; the crows looked around; they saw nothing. "What is it?" they cried hoarsely.

"Only the evening angels passing by; they go to visit the sick, you know."

The crows stared. "Did you see them?" they asked.

"Oh, yes! They always come at this hour; see, it is twilight! There are others coming, and they always smile at me."

The crows felt a stirring in the still air near them; they tremble with a strange feeling of awe.

"They are gone," said the brook; "and now I, too, must go. Something bids me rush along, and I dare not linger." So she left them.

"She chooses the fairest meadows to play in," croaked the stupid crows.

The brook rushed on with the swift current; soon she dashed right into a sluggish stream.

"Welcome!" it cried; "I was just thinking I was too tired to go any farther and I'd begun to make a pool here. But I don't mind going along with you—wait a moment. Why are you in such a hurry?"

The brook ran away, laughing. "Catch me if you can," she said, and the sluggish stream started onward, just keeping the swift current of the brook in sight.

All at once a deep, solemn sound filled the evening air. The brook ceased her babble and listened. "What is that?" she cried.

Some sea birds hovered near. "It is the voice of the ocean," they cried, flapping their wings; "it calls us; we must go."

The sluggish stream clung to the banks and hugged the roots of the trees in passing. "I am afraid," it said. "Are you going any nearer to that awful voice?"

Somehow the little brook knew now where she was going. "But I shall not know the song," she thought sadly as she rushed along.

The great ocean lay very near; the brook laughed for joy. "Shall I help make one of those grand waves?" she wondered. A huge wave rolled up the beach and drew her far, far back into the ocean depths. For a moment she knew nothing as she was whirled along in the tide. The sun had set. All the waves from the horizon to the shore were dyed in the crimson of the afterglow. The little brook rippled on as one of the surface waves resting on the swell that arose from the heart throb of the ocean. "Here, too, are life and joy!" she cried.

"Whence did you come?" asked a wave, glowing red.

"Oh, I was only a little brook; I came from far away."

"What was your work?"

"I did no work," sighed the brook. "I only ran along the meadows, laughing in the sunshine."

Several of the waves near by laughed merrily. "We heard of you," they cried; "the angels saw you; they say you worked hard, never ceasing day and night. The valleys and meadows grew green as you splashed along. Before you came they were barren."

"Was that my work?" asked the bewildered little brook.

The other wavelets laughed again.

"How did you come here; did you, too, laugh and play?" asked she of a happy little wave that caught the glow at her side.

"No, I have nothing pleasant to look upon. I ran along underground, till one day I awoke in the depths of this grand ocean. It does not matter now, you know."

The afterglow had died away, the surface waves were driven along by a sudden breeze; the little brook clung to a huge rolling billow.

"Ah, you are a new-comer—never mind! Listen now, and you can learn the song that we are singing."

"I do not understand what it means?" she cried wistfully.

We have been learning it through the countless ages," replied the wave; "you have it—then it comes clear to you."

* * * * *

Years passed by. The little brook had learned to join in now and then; her voice was growing rich and deep. Every hour the song was changed as the heartbeat of the ocean changed its rhythm. After a while she knew she was not meant to understand its meaning; she was content then if she might join in the great "Amen".

Grandmother's Story.

"Please tell me a story, Grandma," said little Sallie Dean; and pulling her little stool to grandmother's feet, she sat down upon it and looked up into her grandmother's face.

Grandmother's eyes took on the distant look they always did when Sallie asked for a story, because a story, to Sallie, always meant something about when Grandma was a girl.

"Dear child, I've told them to you over and over, but did I ever tell you about the time Father and Mother left me home with brother John to watch the turkeys?

"It was on a Sunday morning in July, and Father, Mother, sister Clarissa, Ruth, Calista and Mehitabel, with Adam, Samuel and Daniel, were ready to start for church—Father and Mother with the girls in the big wagon, and the boys on foot.

"Father drove a team of horses, but many of the farmers drove oxen.

"Just before Father picked up the lines, Mother called out to me, 'Be a good girl, Melissa, and help John watch the turkeys; your lunch is in the cupboard—brown bread and beans, and the milk is down cellar.'

"Church, in those days, meant a long sermon, then a recess, then another long sermon with 'firstly' and 'secondly' and so on, before they would be ready to come home again.

"I sat down on the flat stone in front of the door of the log cabin that was our home; it was so quiet I could hear the rustling of the leaves in the trees and the twitter of the birds in the branches. John lay on his back under the trees in the shade.

"I felt very proud because Mother had allowed me to stay home and help John with the turkeys. Foxes and other small animals often came into our clearing and caught our chickens and turkeys, but a stick or a stone soon drove them away.

"John was thirteen and a big boy for his age, while I was ten.

"The road that ran by our home was called 'the Mohawk Trail', and years before had been used by the Indians in traveling from one tribe to another.

"Sitting there in the warm sunshine, I was startled by a sudden sound, and glancing down the road, I saw five men coming up the slope in single file. In a horrified whisper I called, 'John! Indians!' John started to his feet, for frontier children are trained to be alert.

"He whispered to me softly, 'Don't be afraid, Melissa, I'll take care of you; and don't you dare let the Indians know you are scared.'

"By this time they were in front of the house and turning into the yard; my heart seemed to leap into my throat, and as for running, my feet were glued to the ground.

"The Indians, for such they were, walked up to the doorstep, and with a single word, 'How', threw themselves on the grass.

"John had taken his seat by my side and was holding my hand tight in his own.

Suddenly uttering some gutteral sounds, one of the Indians rose to his feet, made motions of eating and drinking, and coming toward us he said in English, 'No hurt, hunger.'

"'Get them something to eat,' whispered John to me.

"How my trembling limbs carried me into the house I do not know. I lifted the big beanpot and carried it to the door. John took it from me and placed it in front of them. I followed with two big loaves of Mother's brown bread and a pail of milk.

"They broke the bread in big pieces, and dipping it in the milk, ate it; the beans they dipped up with their fingers. In fascinated silence I watched them.

Would they tomahawk John and me, or would they, their hunger appeased, go on? My heart beat rapidly and I quivered from head to foot.

"They soon finished their meal, then rising, the largest and—if possible—cleanest Indian came toward us. I rose to my feet; if I were to be tomahawked I would take it standing.

"Putting his hands under my arm, he lifted me until my face was level with his. I closed my eyes. But he sofely rubbed his cheek on mine and said in English, 'Little Sparrow', and put me down on the ground again. Then taking from some place on his person a beautiful beaded belt, he put it in my hands. Then, silently without another word, they took their way down the road.

"John and I watched until they were out of sight, then John turned and, grabbing my hair, made an imaginary circle around it and shouted, 'Heap big Injun', but my strained nerves giving way, I burst into tears, and he put his arm around me and comforted me.

"Not long after that Father and Mother returned, and were greatly troubled with our tale of the Indians' visit, although all Indians were considered peaceful then. But after I had gone to bed that night Mother came and knelt by my bed, and I knew she was thanking the dear Lord her children were safe.

"The other children quite envied me my beautiful beaded belt, and I kept it carefully for years."

Sallie sighed as her grandmother ended the tale and said, wistfully, "I wish we had such exciting times now." But Grandmother only smiled.—Sarah H. Roberts, in The Congregationalist.

For the Southern Churchman.

IT ISN'T GOOD BUSINESS TO WORRY.

Monica Williams.

It isn't good business to worry
For worry makes things seem wrong
It isn't good business to worry
For worry helps trouble along.

No matter what seems to beset you
Of matters that cause you to doubt
Of fears that seem to oppress you
Just try and leave worry out.

But the way to do this is not easy
For you might as well know at the start
That worry springs up as the breezes
And holds right on to the heart.

The breezes chill in the Springtime
Or the gale in the Winter that blows
Can be shut from our hearth, if aforetime
Our windows and doors, we will close.

But when worry creeps up o'er the mountain
Just pull up the shades of regret
And do a good turn, and you're certain—
Just certain—to worry——forget.

Fish in the Bible.

While animals and birds, insects and reptiles, are freely mentioned in the Bible, it may seem strange that no species of fish, save only the whale, is mentioned by name in either the Old or New Testament. Perhaps that is easily explainable by the fact that the Holy Land is an inland area of mountains, plains and valleys. With the exception of Joppa, the Israelites held no possessions along the coast, part of which belonged to the Phoenicians and the rest to the Philistines.

The one river in the Holy Land is the Jordan, and that is too rapid, too muddy and too deep in its rocky bed to make fishing either profitable or enjoyable. The smaller streams were either dry or rushing torrents. Of its three lakes, the Dead Sea was probably entirely devoid of all life, animal and vegetable, so that the only fishing preserves were the Lake of Gennesaret and the pools of Heshbon.

Beyond mention of the actual creation of fish, their incidental mention in our Lord's history as an article of food, and the occupation of fishing by coastal tribes, the word "fish" is only infrequently used in Biblical phraseology. Not a single species is named if we expect the whale, and even the whale probably refers to man-eating sharks—"sea monsters" as they were called in the ancient Greek Hebrew tongues.

Mention is made of Tobit's fish, but as this denizen of the water leaped out of the Tigris to attack a man, contrary to the habits of any known fish, we may safely assume it to have been a crocodile. Further mention is made of the "purple fish", but Biblical students have affirmed that this reference applies to a variety of shell-fish. A valuable dye was said to have been extracted from the throat of a shell-fish in those far-off days. The art of procuring this dye was known only to the Phoenicians, and has long since perished together with the records of this race. It was so costly as to be one of the peculiar insignia of royalty or official distinction. Beyond these fragmentary records, there is not a single mention in the Bible of the hundreds of varieties of fish known today.—Our Dumb Animals.

THE LORD SHALL GUIDE THEE.

Isaiah 58:11.

Martha Yuong.

Lord, keep me near Thee all this day,
Direct all I think and do and say;
Ah. Let me not a moment stray
From Thy good will, Thy perfect way:

And like the carrier pigeon's surge,
Quick ever to its homing urge,
My spirit of its wandering purge,
Back to its Source my soul's flight merge.

The Picture That Changed.

"Oh, look, Mumsy!" exclaimed Paul, hurrying into the house. "Here is the picture that Aunt Mary took of me. Don't you think that it is just fine?"

Paul's mother took the picture. It was a snapshot of a little boy and he was smiling.

Paul waited anxiously, but he was not smiling, for he was a cross-looking boy.

His mother studied the picture. "There is something about it that does not look quite natural," she said, puzzled, "but it is a very pretty picture."

The frown on Paul's face grew deeper and he took it to his father. "Isn't it good, Daddy?" he asked eagerly.

His father looked closely at the picture. "It is good," he said, "but, still—there is something about it that is not quite natural."

The frown grew deeper and deeper and he ran up to his brother Jud's room with it, but even Jud seemed to think that there was something odd about it.

"It looks pleasanter than you usually do. How did you come to smile like that?"

Paul was in no mood to answer questions, and there certainly was no smile on his face. He took the picture to his room.

"I don't see why they should think that it is not a good picture just because it is smiling," he said.

He really did know, only he did not like to admit it even to himself. He knew that he was a cross-looking little boy because he had been told so very often, and he knew that the picture was nicer than he was. That was really why he liked it so well.

"I wish I did not look like that," he said to himself longingly.

Then he kept looking at the picture, and thinking about it, and wishing that he looked like it. Perhaps it was because he looked at it so much, and wished that he looked like it, that he began to lose some of his cross look. He just had to smile back when he looked at it, and he looked at it a great deal.

Then, one day, he brought it down and showed it to Uncle Mat.

"Why!" exclaimed Uncle Mat. "it certainly does look like you."

His daddy looked at it again. "Why, I do believe that it does look like him," he said. "I thought at first that it didn't."

"Why," said his mother, as she looked over Daddy's shoulder, "it does look like him. I guess I did not get a good look at it the first time."

Now it was the smile on Paul's face that was growing deeper and he knew why it looked more like him now. The real reason was that it was he who had changed until he looked like the picture, and he meant to keep on changing until they would say the picture looked just like him, only it did not smile quite enough.—Florence Isaacson, in The Mayflower.

A Goose That Drives the Cows.

Some time ago a farmer of Ballston, Ore., while out hunting, shot and wounded a wild Canadian goose by breaking the tip of one of her wings. Feeling sorry for the injured bird, the farmer took the goose home and placed her in the barnyard with the rest of his fowls.

At first the goose was very shy at the approach of any human being, but being entirely dependent for her living upon the hand that was feeding her, in time she became quite tame, and eventually a great help on her master's farm.

Every evening the goose goes out into the pasture and drives the cows home. When they loiter by the wayside she urges them on by pecking at their legs until they obey her. After they reach the barn this clever honker drives each cow into her own stall. Occasionally, when some cow becomes unruly and refuses to go into her stall, the goose has to work very hard, but she never gives up until she has succeeded in driving each animal into its proper place.—Juliette Frazier, in Our Dumb Animals.

THE LITTLE SHIPS.

Oh, see the ships come sailing home
With strange and lovely cargo!

They sailed today for a distant port
At the hour the sun sinks low,

And now they sail back home again
With armfuls of wood flowers!

Oh, the childrens' hands are the little ships,
With loveliness as cargo!

HIS HAND.

You've stumbled? Yes, I know, my child,
But let Him take your hand;
The way is very stony, wild,

And Who will show you the way;
Although you stumble, take His Hand,
And you'll not go astray!

TEXAS CHURCHES PLAN OBSERVANCE OF CENTENNIAL

An interdenominational committee representing six communions is making plans for special religious activities in connection with the Centennial of Texas' independence to be observed in 1936. Their first recommendation to the churches of Texas follows:

To the Christian Patriots of Texas.

Your state committee on co-operation in the Texas Centennial Revival has adopted the following recommendation to be presented to the various Christian denominations of the state as to their participation in the Texas Centennial:

FIRST: that a united effort on the part of all the Christian people of Texas be made to observe all Texas holidays such as San Jacinto Day, Independence Day, etc., in great Christian patriotic rallies to be held in all communities in the state.

SECOND: that a major effort be made to add 25 per cent. to the attendance in Sunday School and Church during the month of January, thus taking advantage of the resolutions period to make it a church and Bible study year.

THIRD: that plans be made to participate in one of ten inspirational inter-denominational, evangelistic rallies to be held in the month of February in strategic cities of the state.

FOURTH: that a revival be conducted in every local church in the state during the Centennial year.

FIFTH: that a continuous revival of religion be in progress in the city of Dallas during the period of the Centennial.

It was suggested that in the latter movement a centrally-located place suitable for a great gathering be secured and be occupied at intervals by the different denominations, calling our people to repentance and God.

The following committee was appointed to have charge of the continuous revival in Dallas during the Centennial:

Dr. S. H. C. Bergin, Chairman.
Dr. Wallace Bassett.
Dr. Thomas F. Gallaher.
Dr. Graham F. Frank.
Dr. J. T. Upchurch.

The names of the committee issuing this statement are as follows:

Hon. Harry Hines, of the State Highway Department, and Dr. Leo Johnson of the Oak Cliff Christian Church, representing the Christian churches;

Dr. Wallace Bassett of the Cliff Temple Baptist Church, Dalas, and the Rev. C. E. Matthews, pastor of the Travis Avenue Baptist Church, Fort Worth;

Dr. B. A. Hodges, Waxahachie, and Dr. Floyd H. Poe, City Temple, Dallas, representing the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.; ;

Bishop E. Cecil Seaman of Amarillo, the Rev. Willis P. Gorhart of Abilene, representing the Protestant Episcopal Church;

Dr. J. T. Upchurch of the Beracah Home, Arlington, and Mr. R. R. Kirby, Dallas, representing the Nazarenes;

Mr. Sam Braswell, Clarendon, and Bishop A. Frank Smith, Houston, representing the Methodists;

Dr. Thomas R. Gallaher, president of Dallas Pastors' Association, and Dr. W. R. Hall, representing the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.;

DEATHS.

Col. Wm. S. Cogswell.

Colonel William S. Cogswell, for many years a vestryman and churchwarden of Grace Church, Jamaica, N. Y., and in many ways a prominent laymon of this diocese, died at his home in Jamaica in the early morning of July 18 in his 96th year. He was for many years a member of the diocesan convention, a lay-member of the Cathedral chapter and a member of its committee on St. Paul's and St. Mary's Schools. He had frequently acted as counsel to the diocese and to its bishops. The diocesan convention at its meeting last May sent him affectionate greetings, hearing that the infirmities of age were increasing upon him.

Colonel Cogswell was born in Jamaica. He was an undergraduate in Trinity College, Hartford, when the Civil War began, and was made second lieutenant of a Connecticut infantry regiment. He served throughout the war, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. After the war he returned to Trinity, took his degree there, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1868. In 1872 he married Henrietta Spader, and they moved into the house in which he has ever since resided, and where he died. He was active in the G. A. R. and in the Loyal Legion. He was only once in public office—as Tax Commissioner under Mayor Seth Low. He was given the degree of LL. D. by Trinity College, of which college he was also a trustee.

The funeral was in Grace Church, Jamaica, and the burial in the churchyard. Bishop Stires officiated, assisted by the Rev. Remsen B. Ogilby, President of Trinity College, and by the Rev. Charles W. McLean and the Rev. Robert D. Smith, respectively, the former and the present curate of Grace Church. The rector, the Rev. Joseph H. Titus, was ill.

HATH NOT THE ANGELICAN CHURCH ERRED ALSO?

Mr. Editor:

Especially with so much on reunion with Rome in our American and the Church of England's press, why still poke Art. XIX at her having "erred, not only in . . . living and . . . Ceremonies, but also in matters of Faith?"

I, for one, say: let's repeal this last paragraph of England's 1562 and our 1801 Article, entitled "Of the Church."

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

"He gives all and wastes nothing."

"Civilization makes the world a neighborhood. Christianity makes it a brotherhood."

Christ's cause has everything to hope for from Christian homes.

The circumstances amid which you live determine your reputation; the truth you believe determines your character.—W. H. Davis.

We are to win the lost. But the Church of Christ is also to build those who have been brought in—build them in spiritual things. That also is salvation.—Western Recorder.

"True, is He? Then He is infinitely true. Good, is He? Then He is infinitely good. Faithful? Yes, but infinitely faithful, as God Himself. Mighty? Then infinitely mighty."

We do not need more development. We do not need more intellectual power; we need more spiritual power. We do not need more knowledge; we need more religion. We do not need more of the things that are seen; we need more of the things that are unseen.
—Calvin Coolidge.

The truth of Idea is more and mightier than the truth of fact. The truth of Life, the truth embodied in a life, is more and mightier than the truth of idea.

We cannot call anything true religion unless through it God may be found at the counter, in the kitchen, or in the shop. The Christian religion includes not only the teachings and ideals of Jesus Christ, but also His daily life.
—Kagawa.

Sometimes we think of the Lord Jesus Christ in terms of His various offices. He is the Mediator between God and man; He is the Advocate Who intercedes in our behalf; our Sacrifice, our High Priest, our Example, our Leader, Our Commander, our King. He is all that; but as we think of Him in these various characters, let us remember that behind it all, there is His real matchless, divine, Person; One Who may be loved, really loved, for what He is.—Dr. T. T. Shields.

God of our weary years, God of our silent tears,
Thou who hast brought us thus far on the way,
Thou who hast by Thy might led us into the light,
Keep us forever in the path we pray—
Lest our feet stray from the places, our God, where we met Thee,
Lest our hearts drunk with the wine of the world we forget Thee.

God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. Let us stand in the light, and be searched, cleansed and purified by it! Let us absorb and reflect that light as Moses did! Bathing in its fellowship will impart to us something of God's beauty. So shall we be transfigured into His likeness!—F. B. Meyer.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Lay Administration of the Chalice.

Mr. Editor:

Since some of the Synods will be meeting early this fall, there is a matter which ought to be called to the attention of the deputies who attend the provincial gatherings.

Memorials from the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia and the Diocese of Michigan were presented to the General Convention on the subject of the Lay Administration of the Chalice in Holy Communion. And the General Convention referred this question back to the provinces for discussion and further report to the next General Convention. Perhaps the matter can best be presented by quoting from the Journal of the General Convention:

The Bishop of Michigan presented the report of the Special Committee of the House of Bishops on the licensing of lay readers to pass the chalice, together with the following resolution, which was adopted:

The House of Bishops informs the House of Deputies that it has adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, the House of Deputies concurring, that—

Whereas, in accordance with action taken at the meeting of the House of Bishops held in Davenport, the Chair appointed a committee to consider and report on the subject of licensing lay readers to pass the chalice in the administration of Holy Communion. The committee appointed consisted of the Bishops of Michigan, Alabama and Los Angeles. The subject was considered by your committee in the form of an amendment to Canon 26 entitled "Of Lay Readers" offered at the last General Convention and read as follows:

"At the request of a parish priest, acting with advice of his vestry, the Bishop may license a lay reader to pass the chalice in the administration of Holy Comunion."

In the opinion of your committee, this subject should receive much more general consideration before action is taken by the General Convention, and therefore offers the following resolution:

Resolved, that the proposed amendment aforesaid be referred to the Synods of the various provinces, with the request that they give this whole subject careful study and consideration and report their findings to the next General Convention.

Attest:

Charles L. Pardee, Secretary.

The House of Deputies concurred in the foregoing message on the twelfth day.

It is interesting to note that the Church in China ("Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui"), at the last General Synod, adopted a resolution approving the request of the Bishop of Hongkong to license lay readers to assist with the administration of the chalice.

It is to be hoped that this matter will have full discussion in our Synod meetings.

The Other Side.

Mr. Editor:

Of course this writer recognizes the "sense of justice" you have shown in your willingness to print, in extenso, Louis Nizer's lengthy communication in defense of the verdict against The Churchman, in its unfortunate suit—but several remarks would seem to be pertinent in this connection. Justice might also be pleaded on the other side!

While you have given your readers this fulsome defense of Mr. Hess and his position in the matter, covering two full columns, you have given only the vaguest concept of the case in its entirety, from The Churchman's standpoint—and that in an editorial position where it is made secondary.

Mr. Nizer, whose letter shows very evidently that his client and the motion picture authorities are much concerned over the nationwide indignation which this case has aroused, tries to show that the $10,200 damage suit has no connection with The Churchman's magnificent crusade of six years in behalf of decent films. This is to quibble. He even says that this action "would have been instituted" and the result "would have been the same" had Dr. Shipler, the editor of The Churchman, "never written one word concerning motion pictures". How in the name of reason does he know that?

This writer, for one, denies that Mr. Nizer has sufficient omniscience to know what would or would not have transpired, had not The Churchman waged unrelenting warfare against the movies as they were before the Roman Legions took the field which the Protestant Episcopal Church might have occupied with honor had it followed the lead of this Episcopal journal. It is impossible, I contend, to estimate the psychological animus and the dissidence aroused among certain motion picture authorities by The Churchman's persistent attack against unworthy movies, waged since 1929. That this case was or was not the result of this general crusade is anybody's guess! To any one who knows human nature and who knows his psychology, the guess would seem to be in the affirmative. Do not let your readers be misled and "at the last moment go off on a tangent"! The Churchman has undoubtedly been "put on the spot" because of its fight for better movies.

Let me add that The Southern Churchman might now come strongly to the defense of its contemporary and join the ranks of the denominational, the non-denominational and the Roman Catholic periodicals all over the country that are raising funds for the Churchman Defense Committee, 19 East Forty-seventh Street, New York City. The entire religious press has been aroused as seldom if ever before by this turn in the fight for a higher grade of motion pirtures. The Churchman's fight is the fight of every decent man, woman and child in America who is outraged at the low grade of daily diet that the movies have been wont to serve out to the fifty or sixty millions who frequent motion picture theatres—your esteemed correspondent to the contrary notwithstanding.

ON TAKING A STAND.

It is always of interests to hear from our readers. For one thing it is nice to know you are read. For another it often implies that they believe we have influence of one kind or another. And so we like to get letters urging us to "take a stand" for some project that is especially dear to them.

Recently a group of our readers have been upset by the doings of the "Church League for Industrial Democracy" and evidently do not approve of the activities of that organization. "Why do you not denounce them?" writes one reader. Another, who is firm in the belief that this particular organization is financed from Russia, accuses us also of receiving subsidy from the same source.

Church people can often be zealous and yet have their zeal wasted. Are we wrong if we feel that primarily such writers as we have quoted are in this class? Is there not displayed a lack of humor and do we not need a little more ability to be able to laugh at some things? In all fairness to every position, we feel that there is a decided lack of humor in America today anyway, and humanity, struggling with many problems, instead of trying to help one another and work out of the problems, evidences suspicion and distrust and the good intentions and hopes go scattered into thin air, because we are too apt to believe all we read in the papers.

The Church League for Industrial Democracy includes some of the finest men and women in our church membership both clerical and lay. They are earnestly trying to bring Christian principles to bear in industrial relations, and they are loud in their protests against anything that smacks of exploitation. If they at times make mistakes, it is because we are all human, and if they have been named in such a book as "The Red Network" as dangerous "reds" let us remember that even the wife of the President of the United States has also received this distinction.

In the sixteenth century, the politicians who ran the church appointed a Dr. Eck to prosecute a young upstart monk who said things that they didn't like. Dr. Eck was a smart man. He won his case against young Martin Luther by showing that in certain statements Luther was in entire agreement with well known heretics who had been burnt at the stake for their heresy. It didn't make any difference if these particular statements were true or not, the evidence was that they were heretics and therefore because Luther said some of the same things he too must be a heretic.

To day many people including "reds" denounce the lack of social security and certain industrial situations. It is not logical to say that because others besides "reds" denounce these situations, the others also are "reds". If church people allow themselves to say so, they are adopting the tactics of Dr. Eck. And those are not Christian tactics.

All of which leads us to say again what we seem to have to say once a year in regard to the policy of The Southern Churchman. We feel that in our Church there is room for a weekly that is devotional in tone and can deal with the practical side of Christianity without indulging in controversy. Of course we are human and human beings at times will have convictions that will be expressed in a form that will be controversial. But we are endeavoring to place our Christianity first and our methodical position second in our attitude. We want to be "a National Church paper for all the family."

Of course we have an Evangelical background—one hundred years of background and we are proud of it. But we feel that if we as Christians could find the Christian method of tolerance towards positions other than our traditional ones, many of the petty quarrels which have held back the progress of real Christianity would be eliminated and as a Church we could assume our position of rightful spiritual leadership.

Christ, as far as we know, never gave us any political faith as the one under which He alone could work. Your editor thinks that too many of us have a political faith rather than a faith in Our Savior. It we can make Him known, we don't care very much what the political system adopted by the people becomes. But He is far from known, and whenever we hear of one group pointing the finger of accusation at another, rather than going to them and trying to understand their position, we feel that Jesus Christ is indeed very little known. So we refuse to "take a stand" or "denounce" any group that earnestly is trying to interpret Jesus Christ, and we wish to remain a paper for the family.

Another Word About the Libel Suit.

Since we published in full Mr. Nizer's letter stating the side of Mr. Gabriel Hess in the suit for libel recently won against "The Churchman", we feel we can leave each reader to his own conclusions.

There are many who feel that since this paper has done noble work in cleaning up the entertainment field, the Sunday school children and church members who have benefited should help pay the judgment against Church Unity.

Bishop Johnson in The Witness August 1, 1935.

In my judgment the Church has a unique mission to this nation. If we are going to have church unity we must have some principle upon which it can be effected. There are several applicants for this honor. The Pope offers one solution. Individualism in the person of many religious reformers offers others. We can accept neither the claims of Rome nor of Geneva. We hold much in common with both without going over to either. It is true that we have those who are looking Romeward and we have those who are looking in the other direction, and the impulsive acts of individual ministers, away from our own center of gravity is disturbing but not disastrous unless the Church herself abandons her position that an historic priesthood is the true basis of unity. * * *

The only inter-communion that is worth working for is one in which the need of altar and priesthood precedes the participation therein. To give people something that they do not really desire because in doing so one is making a gesture of fraternity can have very little value of a spiritual character, whereas the deliberate ignoring of the convictions of those of one's own household can be the source of tremendous damage.

Disunity is a terrible thing but before we do things let us think them through to their ultimate conclusion.

Move to Legalize Lotteries.

The Presbyterian Banner August 1, 1935.

Old evils that society has succeeded in shuffling off have a way of coming back and must be fought again. The lottery is making strenuous efforts to come back through legislation in some of the States and even through national legislation. Some people in high society are lending themselves to such movements. It is even proposed to meet the tremendous expenditures of the federal government by a national lottery. "There's millions in it". So there is for some and an equal loss for others. The lottery is an effort to get something for nothing, and this is dishonest in principle and introduces unrest and dissatisfaction in our whole system of life. It is unsocial in principle for it makes one person's gain another's loss, or one person's pleasure another's pain. It is no answer to this to say that it is accepted by both persons, for the loser would not agree to it or enter into it if he knew that he would lose. It is demoralizing and unsettles the foundations of moral living. At times it becomes a social mania that disorganizes the whole structure of society. We should watch these efforts and keep the nose of this beast out of our tent before it crowds in.

History Essential to Christianity.

The Guardian—London, Eng., July 19, 1935.

What is the essential thing in Christianity? The question is not new; it has been asked for nearly two thousand years. But today, owing to the wide expansion of human knowledge about the physical universe and about human history, the question has acquired a new importance, and is asked with a wistful perplexity unknown in former ages. The demand has lately been put afresh with great earnestness by the eminent zoologist, Professor MacBride. When the Dean of Exeter pointed to the long-range books that modern scholars have devoted to the presentation of the old faith in modern terms, the professor answered that he had read them, and many of them with interest. But they left him disssatisfied. He still desired that authority should disentangle the "core of timeless truth" from the traditions in which it was enmeshed. As his friendly appeal was specially directed to the Archbishop of York, Dr. Temple felt that courtesy demanded a reply. The archbishop pointed out that the request might mean one of two things. If what was required was a prediction of the parts of the traditional faith which the Church might be upholding at some future date the answer could only be given by one endowed with infallibility. For himself, Dr. Temple was content to affirm a confident expectation that the Nicene Creed would be found to be the formulation of the "core of timeless truth" that would stand the test of time. On the other hand, it was possible that what the professor wanted was the extrication of a distinguishable body of truth which, though it may have been apprehended at a given moment in time, is itself independent of all historical events. If so, he is asking for the impossible, because the historical character of Christianity is of its essence.

"In the Commencement".

Church of England Newspaper July 19, 1935.

"May I go back to the commencement?" asked counsel in an action in the Chancery Division last week.

"To the beginning," corrected Mr. Justice Bennett, adding: "I have always got the strongest objection to the word 'commencement.' I don't believe it appears in the Book of Common Prayer."

Another counsel ended the discussion by reminding the court that the Bible does not begin "in the commencement."

Tidiness or Mind.

Christian Observer July 31, 1935.

In commenting on the popular idea that most scientists are antagonistic to religion, the famous astronomer, Eddington, says that it is not irreligion but a certain "tidiness of mind" which leads scientific students to avoid approaching their studies from the religious point of view. In other words, their attitude is due to the recognition of the fact that religion and science each has its own particular province. The scientist may be, and should be, religious, but in his work he must deal with the facts of science and not with the fact of religion. The religious man should be scientific, but he should not be disturbed in his spiritual experience by the theories and hypotheses of science. All of us need to recognize that science is but one department of human study whereas religion is man's whole relationship with God and with his fellowmen.

What Does Signor Mussolini Mean?

The Guardian (English) July 12.

An ingenious friend of mine, who has a reputation for shrewd political speculation, has interested me with his reasons for thinking that Signor Mussolini is not planning a serious war in Abyssinia. He says that Signor Mussolini appreciates as well as any of us the difficulties and dangers of an Abyssinian campaign, whether in the unhealthy lower levels or in the almost impenetrable mountains. He believes, therefore, that Signor Mussolini will call a halt after he has given his army a much-needed training under the real conditions of war —that he will in fine blood his men but not too much. At that point some incident will probably turn up which will give Signor Mussolini a pretext for calling off the war. When I pointed out that this was a circuitous and expensive method of training an army my friend was quite ready with an answer. The army, he thinks, is to be used seriously not against Abyssinia (where Italy may in the meantime, however, have picked up some useful concessions) but against Asia Minor. What, he asks, is going to happen to Asia Minor when Kemal Pasha's regime is over? Does anybody really believe that there is in Turkey an administrative machine which will survive the removal of Kemal Pasha's personality?

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

Pygmies or Giants?

Christ said, in His Sermon on the Mount,—"What man by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" This was an appeal to universal experience. Moreover, to be much above the normal height, is not generally desired as it places a man at a disadvantage in many ways. On the other hand, growth in spiritual stature is something which every Christian should desire. We cannot grow skyward, but we can grow heavenward, and it is our Christian duty to seek to do so. Thus, St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, (4:13) says.—"Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." We may not measure up to this ideal in this present life, but we should be growing towards it from day to day. It is unfortunately the case, however, that there is, as a rule, but little ambition in this direction among professing Christians. Most of us are content to be pygmies, when we might be, and ought to be, giants, so far as spiritual stature is concerned.

No Clear Distinction Between Christians and Others.

One of the principal reasons why Christianity is looked upon with indifference by so many of the present day, is that those who profess to be followers of Christ do not stand head and shoulders, in a moral and spiritual sense, above their fellowmen. They do not, except in individual instances, exert a commanding influence upon the world around them. This is due, in a great measure, to the fact that we have settled down to a level where we find that we can get along easily and comfortably without being conscious of any particular wrong doing, but at the same time without being eagerly desirous of making any special effort towards the higher life. We do not see any reason why we should try to live on a higher level than those around us. We are quite content to stay where we are and we imagine that this is the best we can do under the circumstances and in accordance with our own experience of what we can do and what we cannot. But Christian people have got to do something more than this if the general level of human life in this world of ours is to be raised more nearly to the standard set by Christ Himself for us to follow.

Rising Above the World's Level.

The question is not what we can do by the help of our own natural resourses and thus keep abreast of the general level and even take credit to ourselves for so doing. This did not satisfy St. Paul. He tried to see what he could do by himself, and this is what he had to say about it:—"I can of mine own self do nothing." He had, however, gone further than this; he was not content to remain at the zero mark; he tried to live up to the new level which Christ had set for him, and as a result he could say, from his own experience:—"I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." From that time on he became a spiritual giant, and the shadow which his life has cast, has spread throughout the whole world, and will continue to do so to the end of time. It is not what we can make of ourselves which gives the measure of our spiritual stature, it is what God can make of us, if we are willing to allow Him to use us for the fulfillment of His divine purpose.

St. Paul's Striving to Reach the Divine Ideal.

To go back to St. Paul, we realize the secret of his continuous growth to the heroic proportions which he finally reached, when we read the folowing:—"Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are "behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." We may say that St. Paul was a saint, and so he was; but he reminds his fellow Christians in his Epistles that they too were called to be saints. That is to say, that they must, as followers of Christ, seek to be like Him, more and more all the days of their life.

What It Means to "Follow On."

To "follow on" should mean, rising step by step, day by day, to higher ground. We cannot, as our Lord said, add one cubit to our stature, but we can, if we will, add continually to our spiritual stature and Christianity will never be the power in the world which it ought to be until Christians cease to be satisfied with being mere pygmies and are inspired by the ambition to be worthy of Him who hath called them to be "the salt of the earth," and "the light of the world." When the pygmy or midget era of Christianity shall have given place to one where its greatness and glory are clearly manifested in our lives, the world will no longer treat the Christian religion with indifference and unbelief but will recognize in its members the true leaders of humanity, who can reveal to men a way of life which rises far above any thing that they have known or attained to before.

The Vast Resourses of Christianity.

As has been often said on this page, Christianity has vastly more in it than we are getting out of it at present, and it is high time that we Christians, as trustees of the heavenly treasure, should seek to be the benefactors through whom its blessings may be distributed to mankind. The treasures of Nature are being eagerly sought for by those who realize how much new knowledge may still reward their search, but what are the blessings and treasures of Nature compared to those which God has in store for His children, not only in the future life, but in this. The greatest benefactors of the future will be those who can bring these treasures to light, and be the means, distributing them among their fellowmen. Why not proclaim a Spiritual Marathon, in which all our young people shall be called upon to show what they can do in winning the laurels which will rightfully belong to those who can win, not for themselves, but for their fellows, the mighty blessings which heaven still holds in store for us? The world's level can never be raised to any appreciable extent, unless Christians are one and all, striving to raise the level of their own lives more and more towards the ideals which Christ has given us.

We can be Titans! for He came to share
With us His power divine, when He was born
A child at Bethlehem; and we may dare
Go forth and save from death a world forlorn.

Let us be Titans! then the world shall know
Winter hath passed into perpetual Spring;
That evil hath been dealt a deadly blow;
That Christ no longer shall be, but is, King.

Frederick W. Neve.

Spiritual Preparation for the Ministry

By Condit N. Eddy,

Rector of St. Paul's Church, Watertown, New York.

HOLINESS is looked upon as the priest's trade, and it is expected that he should conduct that trade honestly, as any layman conducts the affairs be which he earns his livelihood." Raphael Sabatini, "Torquemada".

Holiness is the trade of every Christian. To that end are we born, to know God, to cooperate with Him, to grow to love Him, and to come to be like Him. Every Christian is meant to be a "man of God". The clergyman has no excuse if he forgets.

Holiness is not acquired all at once. Human beings do not divide into two classes: "those alienated from God" and "perfected saints". We all start as pretty raw recruits. In the early stages we do not "love God with all our heart and soul and strngth and mind" any more than we are already "perfect as our Father in Heaven is perfect". That is the goal towards which we grow. Many honest Christians suffer from missing that point. Temptations continue, doubts trouble, all is not "sunshine in the soul." They sing certain hymns, they read devotional articles, and their experience does not match that of the veterans. They know "they do not feel that way". Discouraged they wonder if they ever were Christians, or if anyone else has real religion. The New Testament could have taught them better. Common sense should. Deep friendship is not grabbed out of the air. Love may start at first sight; it matures slowly. Even a bride and groom, though they may love tremendously, mean more to each other later on. It is not expected of a Christian that he be perfect, yet. He is called upon to plant his feet on the Highway, to keep his face towards the goal, and to push on. He may not be responsible for the distance he has covered. Some have better starts than others. Some meet more obstacles, or find more helps. The effort, that we can control.

This applies to the clergyman too. It is silly to suppose him perfect. The Lord did not detail archangels to shepherd His flock. He trusted His ministry to sinners. But the priest's trade is holiness. Above billiancy, or an attractive personality, his people really require that he be a man of God. He cannot be expected to be the holiest person in the parish. Happy are we who have in our cures those who have a beauty of character we envy, who have served and loved God better and longer than we. But it is our shame if we fall behind anyone in taking pains. The best of us are pretty weak representatives of the Good Shepherd. But if we keep trying, we grow to be like Him. He is pledged to that.

NOTICE how the kindness of the Master impressed His contemporaries. His first miracle was to relieve a social predicament. At the start of the great work for which He had been preparing, came the call to help supply refreshments! Imagine a great musician asked to oblige with "Mary had a little lamb" on a mouth organ! But He could not let neighbors be humiliated. It was one of the loveliest things He ever did. How many of us would be inclined to leave a large congregation at a moment of popularity because word came that a little girl was ill? Of course her father was a prominent man. On the way for this emergency call He stoped deliberately to be gracious to a bankrupt woman who had needed Him terribly. He had healed her, but He paused to be kind. Another time He could have stepped back and told a certain leper, "All right, all right, I'll heal you". He reached and touched the man. The poor fellow never had expected anyone again to touch him voluntarily. You can make a huge list of such incidents. We only follow Him afar off at best. But remember, kindness is not an elective, and extra, to the Christian life. It is an integral part of being like Christ. The parson may be brilliant. Unless he is increasingly kind, he is not the Lord Christ's kind of a shepherd. Every time we answer the telephone pleasantly, when we want to smash the pesky instrument, every time we are agreeable to the parshioner who has much to say, and is not very exciting, we do His work.

It is easy to crowd out study, easier to crowd out prayer. Quiet is out before you realize it. You do not need to go to fiction to meet the bustling, harassed parson who is always dreadfully busy, who never has either the nervious or spiritual reserve to be of use to those in trouble. Honestly it is not easy to find time to quiet, to be alone with God. Unless you are a terrible failure, calls crowd in, calls you ought to heed. The Master did not find it easy. He rose long before it was day. He spent all night alone in prayer. He believed in quiet, and thought it worth the price. When any friendship grows cold, it may be that some wrong done has erected a barrier. More often we have simply not troubled to spend time with the friend. Our friendship with God is not different. Also, is it not true that much of our ineffectiveness with God and man is due to our being more talkers than listeners? We clergy feel the need of supporting the conversation on many of our calls. Frequently we are mistaken. Our victims would have enjoyed the visit more if we had been better listeners. That is a hideous mistake to make in our conversation with God.

OUR teachers do not exaggerate the importance of systemmatic planning in the devotional life. Good habits are what steady you when you are not at your best. Good breeding grows out of acts of courtesy repeated over and over until courtesy becomes quite instinctive. Many of those acts seem very trivial, such as remembering to say, "Please" and "Thank you". Yet the tone of a gentleman rests on such habits as these. All devotional acts are practice in courtesy to God. Our services of public worship, our individual prayers and meditation, the tasks we perform for Him, are all drills in gratitude, in esteem, until He comes to ocupy the most important place in our lives. He will not get there automatically. It is natural for us selfish men to place Him far down the line in the order of our interests. If we keep putting Him first, He will be first some day. Only, the one who wishes to care for God above all things dares not let himself treat the best Friend with scant consideration. If we are punctilious about attending vestry meetings, or those of the Men's Club, and lightly cancel a weekday service designed in honor of one of the Saviour's companions; if we dress quite carefully for a dinner at the home of a prominent parshioner, and are content to rush in all out of breath at the last moment, and up to the altar, we have no right to have power with God or man.

Great masters in the devotional life have written. The wise man reads, ponders, and uses what they have learned. This article was asked from an ordinary pas-

Reflections on Religious Education

By Leland B. Henry,

Rector of St. Luke's Church, Brockport, N. Y.

I AM come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."

"Thou hast formed us for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find rest in thee. . . . Oh! how shall a find rest in thee? Who will send thee into my heart to inebriate it, so that I may forget my woes, and embrace thee, my only good? . . . Is it then a light sorrow not to love thee? . . . cramped is the dwelling of my soul; do thou expand it, that thou mayest enter in. It is in ruins, restore thou it. There is that about it which must offend thine eyes; I confess and know it, but who will cleanse it? . . . O thou Good Omnipotent, who so carest for every one of us as if thou carest for him alone, and so for all as if they were but one!"

Here, in the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the words of St. Augustine of Hippo, is stated the aim and the soul's need for religious education. If I were to sum up the modern tendency in religious education in a single word, it would be the word which Jesus himself uses, LIFE. Modern religious education draws its purposes from a study of human needs. It adjusts its methods to human capabilities. It chooses its materials with reference to human interests. It is conservative,--alive to the values of the past, for we realize that human nature changes very slowly, that the basic needs and capacities of mankind, have not changed since the days when Abraham was called the friend of God. It is progressive—alive to the sicial changes that have come with the passing of the old agricultural economy, for these changes have greatly altered the form in which the problems of life appear. It is scientific-alive to all that research can teach us concerning the laws of learning. For while the laws are the same today as they were when the Child Jesus learned the Sheme at Mary's knee, our understanding of them certainly ought to have advanced far beyond that of the scribes the rabbis and the doctors of the law.

One of the fundamental assumptions of modern education is that children are people. They are not simply preparing to live, they are already living. They are not merely learning how to meet the problems of adult life; they are facing their own problems, which are just as real to them, and just as important to them, as the problems they will face in later life.

THEY have the same basic religious needs that men have felt since the dawn of the race.

Is the need for some assurance that the universe is a friendly universe? The little child, crying in the drak, is just as much in need of the assurance of religious faith, as is the desperate man facing the problem of unemployment, or the heart-broken woman standing beside an open grave. The very first essential of religious education is to give the little child the firm conviction that there is a God, and that God, is good. The child needs here and now, to meet his fears and griefs and disappointments, a knowledge of the Heavenly Father's love and care.

Is the need for guidance? It is probably true that a child from six to sixteen years of age makes more moral decisions every day than does the average adult. The reason for this ought to be clear to everyone who gives it a moment's thought. With adults, nine-tenths of our conduct is controlled by habit. Our mind sets are so firmly fixed that we do not need to go through the labor of deciding again and again the details of daily living. With a little child, this is not true. Day after day, hour after hour,—in the home, at school, at play,—problems are presented that, to the child, are fresh problems. The difficult problem of the adjujstment of the freedom of the individual to the constituted authorities, the still more difficult problem of the adjustment of differences between equals on a basic of fairness and kindness; the problem of faithfulness in doing one's appointed task, come up again and again, in varied forms. The child needs the help of all the wise, kindly guidance which parents and teachers can give, and the best help which they can give him is the concept of life guided by religious sanctions and by religious loyalties. Above all, the child needs a knowledge, at the earliest possible moment, of the life and teachings of Jesus which will make his knowledge fruitful in conduct.

Is the need for forgiveness? The little child at an early age comes again and again to a sharp realization of wrong-doing and the need for forgiveness. The prayer of confession and a realization of God's forgiving love meet a very real need in the life of the child.

Is the neeed for fellowship? The little child is made for friendship and for love. The atmosphere of love in the home, the friendly spirit of the school are as needed a welcome as the sunshine. And even the little child has the possibility of a fellowship with The Heavenly Father.

Children are incurably metaphysical and theological. What one of us has not heard the child's question which the philosopher or the saint would find it difficult to answer? "Who made the world? Who made God? Where did baby brother come from? Why did the kitten die? Why did it rain on the day of the picnic, when I prayed for sunshine?" Sometimes we smile over these questions, which is all very well, if the smile is infinitely tender. But these questions, on the lips of five and six and seven year old children probe the depths of the mystery of life. They hint at a need and a capacity which many of us have never dreamed of finding in a little child. They are at once the opportunity and the challenge of religious education.

ASSURANCE, GUIDANCE, FORGIVENESS FELLOWSHIP.—Our aims must be as grand, as august, as aweful as those needs. Religious education that is worthy of the name cannot be a mere formal instruction in the dogma and customs of the Church. It cannot be a mere mechanical teaching of the Bible. It cannot be, primarily, informational, but life-giving. It will concern itself with that which affects the conduct of life, with the development of the attitudes and values and loyalties which will make for life at the Christian level. We will ask ourselves of every sermon which we preach,—what difference will it make? The teacher will ask herself of every lesson she prepares,—what difference will it make? For if it doesn't make a difference, it is a waste of time. It is worse than a waste of time, it is a positive evil,—for it tends inevitably to set up in the mind of the child the conviction that Church and Church School are concerned with things that don't matter.

And we have so much material at our disposal which does matter! As Canon Streeter has said, "A man's reactior to the universe will be very different according to whether he thinks an iceberg or a crucifix the most fitting symbol of the quality of reality."

WHAT of the situation within which we must work? Frankly, it is a situation which is appalling to any but the most robust faith.

The dominant factor is the complete secularization of state-controlled education. Ninety-two per cent of all the children in our American Schools are in state schools, and the state schools are, by law, non-religious. That is, we have here, for the first time in history, a conscious, deliberate divorce between education, considered as a function of the state, and the development of the moral and spiritual life, without which education, in any true sense of the term, can not exist. I am not here to make a general indictment of the public schools. The limits within which our teachers work are limits which they did not establish, but which were established for them. As a matter of fact, the limits were not originally established by free thinkers or atheists, but by sectarian Christians, more fearful of heterodoxy than of irreligion. Those of us who heard Doctor Zornow speak on moral education in the public schools will very gladly bear witness to the desire on the part of the leaders of our school system, to give moral training and to the skill with which they give it. All education that is given by religious teachers is, in a general sense, religious education. We have every reason to rejoice that so many of our teachers in the public schools are religious men and women, whose influence is on the side of a spiritual interpretation of the universe.

But this must not blind us to the fact that the division of education into secular and religious is artifical and mischievous. It almost inevitably gives the child the impression that the really important things in life are the things that the tax-payers pay to have taught; that religion is a frill, an elective, which one can take or leave alone.

A second factor in our situation is the commercialization of our children's leisure by the movies. If one compared the number of hours spent in the movies by the children of America with the number of hours that they spend in church or church school, I imagine the result would be disheartening. We must face the fact that the movie, second only to the public school, is the great educational influence in America. Where we have the problem not only of positive indecency, but of the calm aassumption of a pagan rather than a Christian standard of values,—a glorification of success, expressed in terms of money and power; and of pleasure expressed in terms of luxury and self-indulgence. These are things which no censorship can reach. It is not a problem primarily for legislation, but for parent-education.

A third factor in the situation is the state of the church itself. Outwardly we are prosperous, despite the depression. The total property holdings of the Churches of the United States in 1930 were seven and one half billion dollars,—a sum once and a half the total investment in public education. The amount spent for the support of religion that same year was one billion dollars. Some 55 per cent of the population was listed as connected with the Church,—a higher proportion than at any other period in the history of the country.

But the inward condition of the Church is far from encouraging. There is a fundamental lack of conviction on the part of great masses of nominally Christian people. This lack of conviction of the worthwhileness of the Church, the lack of conviction of the essential truth of the great Christian doctrines, is our basic difficulty. It is responsible for our pathetic lack of attendance. I doubt if there is a church in this diocese where the average attendance, week in and week out, for fifty-two Sundays of the year equals one-third of the communicant list. We are fortunate if much more than half the communicant list actually make their communion even at Christmas and Easter. What is true of our own Communion is equally true of the Protestant bodies. The secularization of life and thought has proceeded so far that the idea of public worship being one of the major duties and privileges of life has well-nigh disappeared. When parents do not take religion more seriously than this, it is idle to expect deep sense of religious obligation on the part of their children.

This is the atmosphere in which our children are reared,—a secular school system, a Hollywood-dominated leisure, a home where religion is a wholly secondary consideration, when it is compared with the lure of the golf club or the motor car, or the lake.

And this general situation results in an amount of time appropriated to religious education which is pathetically inadequate. One of the recognized laws of learning is that of frequency of impression. It is especially important in the case of young children. It is recognized how even by college authorities, to the extent that as much as possible even our universities are avoiding courses that meet only once a week. Ask any public school teacher, or ask your own common sense,—what would be the result of attempting to teach arithmetic or geography or history with a week between each session of the class. Then remember that the best figures available suggest that the average church school has an attendance of only a little better than 50 per cent of its enrollment, so that we have not only the problem of inadequate hours but of great irregularity of attendance. Add to this the fact that we are working very largely with untrained or partially trained teachers, many of whom are careless in their preparation and irregular in attendance themselves, and the wonder is that we do accomplish anything at all. It is no wonder that it seems to be almost by accident that the Church occasionally produces saints! I say to you in all seriousness that judged by any human standards the case is desperate. It is only as we ourselves have a transcendental, supernatural faith in an omnipotent God and a Risen and Glorified Christ that we can have the courage to carry on.

THE skill of a great commander is tested and proved not by winning the victory when the odds are in his favor, but by making the best of the available resources when the odds are against him. Washington's military reputation depends less on Yorktown than on the retreat across New Jersey. Our task is something like his,—by skill and courage and a certain dogged tenacity to carry on in these days when the battle goes hardest, trusting that some day, perhaps long after we are gone, the tide will turn.

Rather diffidently I offer a few practical suggestions for the conduct of the campaign. I do it diffidently because I recognize how much easier it is to make suggestions than to carry them out,—how much easier it is to be a professor of religious education in a seminary than to teach a class of ten-year old boys in a church school! Nevertheless, here the suggestions are!

Since our basic difficulty is the increasing secularization of adult life, our fundamental problem is that of adult religious education. Let us think of the whole enterprize of the Church as primarily educational. Let us definitely apply educational methods in our sermons. Let us each Sunday after Sunday, the great truths of the Christian faith. Let us forget, for the time being, the things that lie on the periphery of our message, and concentrate on that which lies at its heart,—the life and teachings of Jesus Christ.

"I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

The compelling power of the life and death and resurrection of Christ is the very heart of the Gospel. People will listen to that simple story and be drawn by it whom we can win in no other way. St. Hilary once said, "In simplicity is faith."

To use a military figure, we can strengthen our position by shortening our line. One of the reasons for the lack of conviction is the fact that the Church has in times past too often chosen to defend positions which were inherently indefensible,—for example, the defense of the Ptolomaic conception of the universe against Galileo, and the defense of literal interpretation of the opening chapters of Genesis against the universal testimony of the sciences. Our case has been weakened in the mind of the man on the street by our defeat on fields where we ought never to have fought.

To re-establish a sense of conviction among our people let us concentrate on our invincible strong-hold, the Gospel of the all-loving Son of God. Every other suggestion I may make is mere detail, compared with this.

Let us be more thoughtful in our choice of teaching material. If a course is not working, change it. Do not let the fact that you have bought a few leaflets lead you to waste the time of a class for a whole year.

In all of our teaching, both in the pulpit and in the Church School, let us aim to win rather than to compel. As Tertullian said so many centuries ago, "It is contrary to religion to compel religion." We do not produce intellectual conviction, still less do we produce a passionate loyalty and devotion to the cause of Christ by a mechanical, legalistic, dogmatic type of instruction. St. Clement of Alexandria recognized clearly enough that religious education does not have for its aim the passing of an examination in doctrine. Its aim is rather the commitment of life to a cause. He wrote, "By the side of knowledge there is always love. Love is the organ by which knowledge is grasped. It is love that supports the Christians in suffering. It is love that steels his courage. It is for love that he submits to torture and martyrdom. And it is love that raises him above earthly passions.—Holding festival in our whole life, persudaed that God is everywhere present, we cultivate our fields praising, we sail the sea singing."

Love can be taught only by one who loves, and by one who loves the learner as well as God. A winsome, joyous, radiant Christian personality is the first essential of effective teaching.

In our church school, let us give larger place to pupil activity. In the older classes pupils will do definite assignments, if each pupil is given an assignment not oftener than once a month, and if he knows that he is the only member of the class that has been given that particular assignment. Tell pupils "to study the lesson" and they will not crack a book. Give them occasional definite responsibility for bringing in a report on some special subject, and the majority of them will respond. In all the classes, give the pupils a sense of participation in the social service and missionary program of the school. And give to the older pupils a part in the planning of the services of worship.

I think that one of the finest things done at St. Paul's is the work of the committee on worship. The committee is composed of one representative from each class from the fourth grade through the seniors in high school. They meet once a month, and plan the services of worship for the church school for the ensuing month. They read the Epistle, Gospel and first and second lesson for the day, and select, often after a spirited discussion, the passage which seems most helpful to them. They select a Psalm from the special Psalms for the day. They select the three hymns, giving attention both to words and music. Once in a while they go so far as to suggest a subject to the Rector when there is some particular problem in the school or in the life of the group which they think he could deal with helpfully. Need I point out that there is a group that really knows the Prayer Book, and to whom the service of worship has a vital, personal appeal?

My last suggestion is that we realize and utilize the tremendous educational value of worship. When we think of religious education as the development of Christian character, we will see that worship, which brings the pupil into a consciousness of the Presence of the Living God is the most vital thing we can do. More important than any amount of dogma or history or liturgics is the experience of the soul with God. If we succeed at this point we have done for the child the one thing needful. If we fail here, no amount of knowledge about religion can make up the lack.

Here our own Communion stands in an especially favored position. We have the beauty and mysticism of Gothic architecture, the gleam of candle-light, the rich symbolism of Altar and of Cross, the awful drama of the Eucharist. Let us not be too anxious to explain and to expound. Here we teach best by indirection, by suggestion, by the subtle influence of our own attitude. The mystical appeal of beauty, the stillness and peace of the House of Prayer is a deeper influence than all the jargon of the theologians, or all the projects of the educators.

Here is the goal of all our teaching,—that we and all those committed to our charge, "being delivered from the disquietude of this world, may be permitted to behold the King in his beauty, who with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth, one God, world without end."

THE COVER.

The picture on the Cover of this week's Churchman is one of the Saints of the Episcopal Church, Mrs E. L. Neale of Christ Church, Point Pleasant, W. Va., who has been a subscriber and constant reader of the Southern Churchman for over sixty years. Mrs. Neale is now in her nintieth year and has all her faculties, being a splendid conversationalist and familiar with the history of the State and Church for nearly a century of time.

Mrs. Neale is a native of Mason county and city of Point Pleasant, but after her marriage moved to Ben Lomond, about eleven miles from town where there is Bruce Chapel, built in 1842. While there she was a constant attendant at the Chapel services and did much to foster the Church in that community among the farmers. In the early part of the Century she moved back to town and has since made her home with her daughter Mrs. C. K. Blackwood. Mrs. Neale and the Blackwoods are in Church whenever there is a service and are interested in the Guilds, Sunday School and other activities of the Parish. The Church record shows that Mrs. Neale was baptized Nov. 20, 1867, by the Rev. Mr. Horace Edwin Hayden and confirmed on Nov. 22, 1867 by the Rt. Rev. John Johns, D. D., her maiden name being Attarah Beall Waggener.

The present Church was built in 1922, a beautiful stone edifice with a convenient parish house. The rectory is a large brick house next to the Church buildings. The Rev. F. L. Cady is the rector.

tor. Let him record his conviction that all suggestions of the great ones, and all the experience of the average Christian are summed up in this: "Keep putting God first, especially in apparently little things, and He will be first". This future of Christendom, under God, lies with those clergy who do this, and who help their people in that high calling.

Hindrances

By James E. Freeman,
Bishop of Washington.

WRITING a letter to a people who at times had shown stability and staying-power, a writer of old penned the words: "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" Something had happened; their course, begun with promise, had suddenly been slowed down and halted. It was natural inquiry and a searching one. There is no answer given to the query, but it comes to us repeatedly as we survey our own record and the record of those in whom we reposed confidence and high expectations. There is an old maxim that, valedictorians rarely fulfill the promises of their early distinction. They made an enviable record in the closing days of their academic life, but too satisfied with their honors, they subsequently failed to follow up their position of gained advantage.

Again, we have noted in those whose early careers in the professions and other occupations were begun with acclaim and promise of real distinction that, the later tests found them unready to meet crises and emergencies that tested their stability and powers of endurance. They were surpassed in the race by other and less promising competitors. The old adage comes to memory and it is one that we need to heed throughout the whole race of life: "Beware when all men speak well of thee." In too many cases applause and undue expectations prove disastrous to the one to whom they are given. Many a promising genius has suffered defeat and tragic disappointment through too much adulation. We do not have to cultivate an inferiority complex to keep ourselves within bounds, but the grace of humility is a valuable asset under any and all conditions. Possibly what we all need in the early days, yes, and all along the way, is measurable self-restraint and constant self-discipline to fit us to meet each emergency as it comes. Training does not belong to any specific period, it belongs to all periods. To abandon study and the replenishing of spent energies means to be defeated when the time of testing is at hand. What is true of our physical and intellectual capacities and reserves is true of our moral and spiritual resources. The early years find us most impressionable and receptive. It is then that we acquire our habits and adopt our ideals. Someone said that, "Sixteen decides sixty," by which he meant to imply that what we fix in the way of ideals or standards of conduct in our youth, largely determines our attitude when we are mature. We believe this to be largely true. On the other hand how often do we discover in ourselves lapses from early ideals and professions when the hard and sometimes bitter experiences of life have disillusioned us. In our religious convictions and practices we show great variability. Indeed in our acceptance and practice of certain definite and what we once regarded as fundamental principles, we show indecision and apathy. This may be and frequently is due to a lack of early training and a careless acceptance of definite moral and religious obligations.

I constantly meet reflective and high-minded men and women who frankly speak of the loss of their religious faith and trust, tracing it wholly to a lack of proper understanding of its meaning through the neglect of those who in their youth trained them. Such men and women are to be pitied and treated with Christian charity. Under later and better tutelage many such recover. The large and insistent question for those of us who have lost religious feeling and the zest and refreshment that come from unbroken religious practices is: "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" All too frequently the hindering has resulted from our own selfish wills and moral instability. We gave up, perhaps gradually, our devotional habits and our deep religious convictions, because they cut across our convenience and interfered with our ease and indulgences. To live by what in earlier years we had professed, laid too costly a toll upon what we had come to believe was our personal liberty. The right kind of moral and religious profession is costly, and it ought to be. It nevertheless has its compensations and satisfactions. Hindered lives, how many there are. Disappointed men and women, disillusioned and often embittered, who might, if they would, by consistent self-diagnosis, find the hindrance not outside and beyond, but within and of themselves. "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?"

THE CALL OF THE WOODS.

Stephen F. Reade,
East Point, Georgia.

The woodland calls to the mellowed life with a rich and compelling voice.

There is melody in the rustle of the leaves as the breeze floats by and beauty as the moon spreads its silvery spray over the green trees.

There is peace in the woodland in the lengthening shadows of the day and fragrance from every leaf and flower.

There is companionship among the trees, when one has learned their language and their moods.

And above all, when one moves in the timbered depths, there comes from the Altar of the Cathedral of the forest the voice of the LORD, as He speaks to the children of men—for even now, the LORD GOD walks among the trees of the garden in the cool of the day.

"THE KNEELING CAMEL."

Anna Temple.

The camel at the close of day
  Kneels down upon the sandy plain
To have his burden lifted off,
  And rest to gain.

My soul, thou too shouldst to thy knees
  When daylight draweth to a close
And let thy Master lift thy load,
  And grant repose.

Else how canst thou tomorrow meet,
  With all tomorrow's work to do,
If thou thy burden all the night
  Dost carry through?

The camel kneels at break of day
  To have his guide replace his load;
Then rises up anew to take
  The desert road.

So thou shouldst kneel at morning dawn,
  That God may give thee daily care;
Assured that He no load too great
  Will make thee bear.

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

Rural Reconstruction.

Nanchang, Kiangsi, China, May 15, 1935.

Dear friends.—I suppose one reason I have waited so long before starting this letter is because of a feeling that there is just too much to tell. Nanchang seems to be the center of so many of the various movements which are sweeping over China,—we touch "Reconstruction" at so many points,—that we feel almost bewildered at times.

I suppose the "Rural Reconstruction Movement" is the most significant of all. The last few years have seen a concentration of effort on the whole problem of village life, realizing that China's difficulties are even more economic than political, and that the fundamental change must be made in the village as the basis of the whole structure. You have probably heard of the Lichuan Project, undertaken by a group of Christian young people, who are giving devoted and loyal service in that very needy ex-Communist territory. I was interested in seeing what the government is doing along somewhat the same lines in one of the seven rural centers it has opened in Kiangsi. An auto ride of two hours brought us to the one nearest us, a little town named Shiao Kan Ko. I'd heard a lot about what was being done but there is nothing so satisfactory as seeing for oneself. I hadn't realized that no buildings at all had been put up to house the workers until I saw with my own eyes how the village school and three or four ancestral halls, where the clan records are kept, had been adapted for use as hospital, dispensary, social center, adult and primary schools. Coats of white wash, additional windows and partitions had transformed these musty dusty old places to centers which could give an adequate impression of cleanliness and hygiene. All the equipment was of the simplest, but well adapted to the needs. There were about ten workers there under the direction of the Rural Department of the National Economic Council, of which our fine Christian friend, Mr. Chang Fu Liang, is the head. They have won the friendly co-operation of every villager in the place, as we could see most evidently from the warm greeting we received everywhere. Women are being taught to be better home makers; the farmers are having instruction along agricultural lines; the children learning to read and play; for the first time in their lives the sick are having a chance for proper treatment. It is all wonderfully heartening, even though we realize its the merest patch on what needs to be done.

Health Measures.

The National Economic Council is promoting health measures in Nanchang as well as doing this rural work. I've been interested in the establishment of a Midwifery Hospital here, where girls are being sent from al over the province to be trained in maternity care, and then sent back to work it out in their own village. The hospital had its opening this spring, and I was impressed by an exhibit of two rooms side by side,—the one prepared for child birth according to the prevailing custom, and the other along hygienic lines. The one typifying the old method, with its bed hung with dark curtains; its many precautions to frighten away evil spirits by means of a spear and a sword and even fish nets, which are somehow supposed to be very effective; its bowls full of horrid-looking messes of medicine, all gave an idea of what the poor mother had to go through with before her baby arrives, and made a striking contrast to the order of cleanliness of the other room.

Social Welfare Association.

But I seem to be specializing on the women's department, as usual. Next door to us the emphasis is all for the men. Rev. Quentin Huang of our mission, who has worked among the government school students for nearly seven years, has at last achieved the building of his dreams to house his work. Our Social Welfare Building is right next door to us, and aren't we proud of it. It has a real lobby with a "mo den" (Modern) clock without numbers, and two billiard tables; a library filled with books and magazines; game rooms; a lovely bright kindergarten room in green and cream; and upstairs a social room with easy chairs and a radio, as a touch of home life for the young men, mostly of government employ, who occupy the twenty bedrooms of the hostel. There has been a real need for just such a place in Nanchang, where young men could have comfortable living quarters under Christian influences, and we rejoice that it has come to pass.

Pure in Heart Church.

Just behind the hostel is the Pure in Heart Church, an antegral part of Mr. Huang's whole effort to reach the young people for Christ. The membership of the church is largely made up from government school students, who are club members. It was encouraging to us to see the group of twenty young men who were confirmed last week when the Bishop was here. I have taught a Bible Class there at various times, and have been impressed by the way these young men are reaching out for exactly what Christianity can offer them. The church building itself is simple and dignified. As soon as plans are ready it will be beautified by an altar which the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Long Island are giving in memory of Mrs. Ellen W. Fanning. The design is being drawn by Rev. Fletcher Howe formerly of our China Mission. We have reason to know it will be beautiful from the many designs he has made for other churches here, including our own St. Matthews.

Home Affairs.

Just a word more to sum up the busy winter which has passed. I spent the major part of my time teaching the children and keeping house for the many guests who came and went, including Sherwood Eddy and F. S. Harmon, the general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in America. It has brought the world to our doors, in truth. I was glad I hadn't undertaken many outside responsibilites when our oldest boy, Lloyd Jr., came down with scarlet fever, followed by nephritis, and spent three long months in bed. But, that is over at last and he is up and out, enjoying the marvel of May, which is a time almost as much loved here as in America.

New Life Movement.

The New Life Movement, which under the leadership of Generalissimo Chiang Kai Shek had its beginnings in Nanchang, is undertaking no lesser task than the reshaping of the lives of China's millions. I saw it at work on a group of 350 men in a Citizenship Training Class a few days ago. This was one of 44 groups with an attendance of 11,000 meeting that morning in this one city alone. A representative of every family in the area was required to attend. Understand what was going on in that class and you will understand the basic social development in China today. The twelve weekly lessons which gave the material for instruction for that class would seem utterly platitudinous to you.

"Be honest: Live simply: Be self-respecting: Cleanliness is the basic of Health: Be neat in appearance: Keep to the left: Be prompt: Respect older people: Obey majority rule."

See what is happening outside the class room and place it against its historical background and you will realize an ancient civilization is being modernized. Not until you have fought through a mob of pushing and scrambling humanity to buy a railway ticket can you realize the change brought about when we find an orderly line taking turns at the ticket window. Not until you have sickened at the sight of fly covered slices of watermellon being sold to children in a cholera infested city can you understand what it means to have all food kept in fly proof containers throughout the whole city. Nanchang's new hundred and twenty-foot boulevard with turf and shrubs down the center is no news to you unless you have travelled the dirty, ten-foot, crowded streets of the old city.

The last lesson of the series speaks a message which may not be news, and yet it is arresting in its deadly significance. In the simplest phrases it tells the people, "The other nations are arming. In case of war the weak nations suffer. Arise and save your country." Along with this training in citizenship there is going forward an intensified military trainng of school boys as well. All high school students of certain grades are required each year to go into military training camps for three months. A nation reformed, united, and able to defend itself against foreign aggression is the objective of this whole movement.

That the "Christian Nations" have set China so poor an example in the matter of armaments makes it difficult for Christian missionaries to point out the folly of this wasteful and destructive competition, and yet in some measure the voice of Christian protest is being raised. So much of the New Life Movement is so entirely in harmony with some of the Church's aims in China that one can only be thankful that the government is now aiming at the same mark and is able to extend the movement so widely.

Travel.

A motor trip to Changsha, the capital of our adjoining province to the west, gave me not long ago a new experience of the rapid development of good roads in China. By the old round about way of railroad and river steamer this trip would have taken three days at least. We made it in 8½ hours over well engineered roads through lovely mountain scenery. On the way we met the first car that had come all the way through from Shanghai. Coast to the heart of China by motor car! What must the ancestral shades of innumerable generations of wheel barrow pushers and sedan chair bearers have thought of this amazing feat?

Christianity's Contribution.

In many lines of human betterment Christianity is making an indirect contribution today far beyond the bounds of the church organization. In rural reconstruction, in public health, in education, in engineering, in government administration, young men and young women who have been brought up in Christian schools and in the Church are coming more and more to make a contribution to public welfare in China. Their influence for good is far beyond their numbers, or the proportionate number of Chinese Christians.

Tenth Anniversary.

St. Matthew's Church celebrated on the first Sunday after Easter the tenth anniversary of the consecration of the church. The attractive hand book which had been prepared for the occasion shows the following interesting facts:

	Communicants	Offerings
1925	85	$ 560.67
1934	170	2,267.99

Far more important than these encouraging statistics is the growth under the leadership of the Rev Kimber Den in the substantial character and in the extension of influence of the congregation.

The contributions for the building of this church, many of you will remember, were part of the Centennial Offering commemorating the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. It also happens that the Church in China is celebrating this year the hundredth anniversary of the coming of Hanson and Lockwood, the first missionaries of our Church to China. I am sure that those who saw then so little result of their labor, and those founders of our Missionary Society who walked then by faith, are glad to see that the Church of Christ does bring forth fruit by patience. And you who have helped build St. Matthews's Church, and have followed it with your prayers and interest during the past decade will, I am sure, rejoice with us that the Church has come through these years of war and turmoil and has not only survived but has grown in its witness to the life giving spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ.

BOOK REVIEWS

ANGLICANISM, Compiled by Paul Elmer More, and Frank Leslie Cross. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis., pages LXXVI X 811 price $5.00.

The reviewer finds in this book a real encyclopedia of "The Thought and Practice of The Church of England," as illustrated from the outstanding writers and thinkers of the Seventeenth Century. The book has the highest recommendations of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. It is really a singular contribution to our American Church that this book is available in this country. We may also say that the book is the best source book of English Church history we have seen in recent years.

The first chapter on "The Spirit of Anglicanism" by Paul Elmer More is a fine picture of the Church's spirit. He concludes with "The image of the Anglican branch of the brotherhood, rising before the mind imbued in the literature from which the following documents are compiled, is of one that rejoiceth as a giant to run his course." (P. XL). A fine historical sketch follows by Felix R. Arnott on "Anglicanism in The Seventeenth Century". The chapter on "The Anglican Faith," begins with the famous confession of King James I, which begins with "I will never be ashamed to render an account of my profession and of the hope that is in me, as the Apostle prescribeth." "I am such a CATHOLIC CHRISTIAN as believeth the three Creeds, that of the Apostles, that of the Council of Nice, and that of Athanasius, the two latter being paraphrases to the former." This is a very interesting picture of the adherence of the Church to the historical Christianity. The King spoke for the Nation as a whole.

The Church's doctrine concerning the Bible as the Rule of Faith, Antiquity and Tradition, Councils, The Book of Common Prayer, Natural Theology, Revealed Theology, and the entire Christian teaching and practice are parts of the book with literary quotations from many outstanding men of the age that make the book a real source of information and inspiration for the reader. This book ought to be in the hands of every clergyman and layman who teaches in church schools and colleges. The real catholic and christian spirit of the Church is revealed in the literature of those who wrote and spoke with regard to other branches of the Christian Faith. We love the words of William Laud to Mr. Fisher, the Jesuit, with regard to the Church's attitude toward the Greek and Eastern Churches. He said—"It ought to be no easy thing to condemn a man of heresy in foundations of faith, much less a Church, least of all so ample and large a Church as the Greek, especially so, as to make them no Church. Heaven's gates were not so easily shut against multitudes, when St. Peter wore the keys at his own girdle. And it is a good counsel which Alphonsus a Castro, one of your own, gives: 'Let them consider, that pronounce easily of heresy, how easily it is for themselves to err.'"

THE BIBLE, BOOK BY BOOK, By J. B. Tidwell, 233 pages, price $1.50. Published by Wm. B. Eerdmans Pub. Co., Grand Rapids, Michigan.

We welcome this fine text book for Bible classes and class room use by professor Tidwell of Baylor University, Waco, Texas. It is not what we may term a commentary on the Bible, but a systematic arrangement of studies perhaps uses Dr. Tidwell in his class room now. The book contains helpful historical information as to the origin and canon of each of the books of the Bible. He makes this fine statement with regard to science as taught in Genesis, "Genesis is not a book of science and makes no attempt to explain many things that are the subject of investigation in the fields of geology, zoology, biology, astronomy, botany, archeology, and anthropology. Science does not come by revelation, but by observation." (P. 44). A helpful book for Bible students.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

Loafing

A Y. P. S. L. Program.

(Time: Evening towards the close of vacation. Place: Home of Mr. Arnold. Characters: Mr. and Mrs. Arnold, Charles and Annie Arnold. Mr. A. is reading the paper, Mrs. A. is sewing, Charles is playing solitaire, Annie is reading a magazine.)

Charles: Ye gods and little fishes, but I get tired of loafing.

Mrs. A.: I expect you do. Why don't you get interested in something? The time would pass twice as quickly.

Mr. A.: Charles, it is just what you are complaining of that is behind all this crime wave. Did you see about this new kidnapping this afternoon?

Charles: There you go again. Just because I am bored stiff with nothing to do, you go to talking about the crime wave.

Mr. A.: It does not seem as if you saw any connection!

Charles: I certainly do not.

Mr. A.: You see, crimes are usually committed in people's spare time. Most criminals, in my opinion, start on their career of crime because they are bored and want to get some excitement. You see, they have not learned how to use the time in which they are not gainfully employed.

Annie: Funny ,but that is just what this article in this magazine is about. It says here, also, that the Bureau of Fingerprints has kept records of the ages of criminals that it has fingerprinted, and that more of them are nineteen years old than of any other age.

Mrs. A.: Then it looks as if you two children have one or two more years to go before you really become dangerous.

Mr. A.: This thing is no joke. The people of this country, and of the whole world, have got to face this problem of leisure time. Crime is but one of the results of people not having been trained to use it properly. Other results are dissipation, broken homes and even suicides from boredom.

Charles: I wish I could not only quit vacation, but school itself, and get a job. Then I would not have so much time to be bored in.

Mrs. A.: Jobs are few and far between, and this army of the unemployed is another serious proposition with their enforced leisure time. I hope you and Annie will stay in school as long as possible.

Mr. A.: Even if you got a job it would not solve your problem. For people with jobs have more time on their hands now than ever before in the world's history, and it looks as if we are going to have still more of it as time goes on. Do you know that the first forty codes of the N. R. A. had only forty hours of work a week as an average. So we can take that as our present time scale. There are 168 hours in a week. Forty out of it leaves 128. Ten hours is a liberal allowance to get to and from work. That leaves us 118. We will allow eleven hours a day for such things as sleep, meals and dressing, which gives us seventy-seven for the week. So we have forty-one hours of spare time a week for the average person. That is more than the hours they are at work. So we must pay attention to it.

Annie: It does begin to look as if we had better be preparing for so much spare time, doesn't it, Mother?

Mrs. A.: It is the old saying, "The Devil finds work for idle hands to do." But what can we do about it?

Charles: It does seem as if people, when they are grown, ought to be able to find enough to do.

Mr. A.: That is what people have always said in the past, and all this crime is the result of just that attitude.

Annie: But surely it looks as if people, when they were bored, would go swimming or to some kind of a ball game, or something like that.

Mrs. A.: You must remember, Annie, that not everybody likes sports as much as you children do.

Annie: But what can be done about it?

Mr. A.: What you are talking about, Annie, is a big class that I like to call the purely recreational pursuits. It also includes all indoor games, parties, dances, etcetera, where people get together for social reasons, and it also includes some, like solitaire, where they can get off by themselves in a game. Thus we have had the cross word puzzles and the jig saw puzzles. It is but a small phase of the problem, but it is all that most people ever think of the subject. But it is probably the way that is most easily tired of, that people have of all the five fields of recreation.

Charles: "Five fields" sounds like Sunday school with its five fields of service. Do you think that the Church is going to get mixed up in this?

Mr. A.: I sincerely hope that it is. Already many of our National Church leaders are much concerned over it, and that applies to all denominations.

Mrs. A.: What are the other four fields? Is reading one of them?

Mr. A.: That is a part of one that I call Educational Recreation. In that connection it is not on record that any educated Negro has ever been lynched, and several of our American Church Institute for Negro schools have a record that none of their graduates have ever seen the inside of a police court. For people should read not only to help them in their gainful occupations, but for the pure pleasure of it. Nothing can be more delightful for a person that knows how to read than an evening with one of the masters of literature, like Shakespeare.

Charles: Oh, Shakespeare bores me stiff.

Mr. A.: If it did I would not confess it. For that simply means that you do not know how to read, which is quite a disgrace to a boy who has had the advantages you have had. It is something to be learned.

Annie: In the Girl Scouts we have a good deal of basket weaving. I suppose that that fits in with one of your fields. I am weaving a small basket that Miss Scott, who teaches the kindergarten class in Sunday school, says she wants to use for taking up the offering each Sunday.

Mr. A.: That is a most important field. I call it Expressional Recreation. It also includes all the art classes and the work of a number of such organizations like the Boy Scouts, where people get a chance to learn to do such things as will express themselves. This comes also very close to the next great field in the laws like the Scout laws, by which it is governed. Especially so in the first Scout law. What is it, Charles, or have you forgotten it?

Charles: Of course I have not forgotten it. It is "A Scout is Trustworthy".

Mr. A.: You see, the big trouble with people today is a lack of a sense of responsibility. It is so easy to "pass the buck", and to shift, or at least avoid responsibility that it is a terribly hard thing to find a person who will simply agree to do something that you know will absolutely do it. They are so apt to make some excuse as to how they could not possibly do it because some one else failed to do a part of the work, or that they forgot it, or something like that.

Annie: Yes. Charles, do you remember how you gave that message to Louise I asked you to give her yesterday.

Charles: For Pete sake, you did not expect me to chase her all over town? She was not at home, I told you.

Annie: Oh, that is all right; I just want to show how even a Scout can forget sometimes.

Mrs. A.: I heard recently of a transient out at the camp backing into Mrs. Davis' car, and getting pretty ugly about it. But when the head of the camp said it was going to be investigated, he simply left the camp. He could not take responsibility.

Annie: What field of recreation do you call that, Father?

Mr. A.: That is what I call the Inspirational Recreation Field. In it come the many organizations among men like the Rotary and the Kiwanis, the Legion and the Lodges. Then for women there are clubs like the Women's Clubs, the Parent Teachers' Associations, and all sorts of clubs are formed for the Young People. You see, these organizations are not able to use any of a man's business time so that they fall into the field of spare time, or recreational activities. They are of two types, the open are the closed. The open are those like the Lodges into which any person of good character may come. Such are the Lodges. The others are the closed. The civic clubs are of this type because no one can come into them but a very few men who have proven their power to take responsibility by being the leading men in the town of their business. But both types do a great deal to inspire people to become better citizens by speeches and all kinds of work for the upbuilding of the community. Thus some of them are interested in the blind, others in underprivileged children, and so on.

Annie: You know I never quite realized what people did in the lodges and clubs so much before. I thought that all they did was just to meet and talk about how they might have another feed. But it looks like they do a tremendous lots for the community.

Mr. A.: They do, indeed.

Charles: You said that there were five of these fields, and you have mentioned only four. But it looks to me as if you had covered the territory. What other fields of recreation could there be?

Mr. A.: The fifth field is the Devotional Field. You know a man needs to be closely tied to God. For that is what religion really means, binding the heart of man to the feet of God, so that he will go where God wishes him to go, willingly and gladly. And religion for the layman is usually a leisure time activity.

Mrs. A.: I see. But it really has a good deal of all the other elements in it, don't you think? The church organizations help people to express themselves in these days. Then we have a lot of pure fun under church auspices. We also learn a lot in church meetings, and I, for one, never go to church without getting a lot of inspiration from it. Also I never did see any one so pepped up over anything as Annie was when she came back from the Y. P. S. L. Camp this summer.

Charles: I wonder where you would put some of the sermons we hear; would you call them fun, or self-expression?

Mr. A.: All joking aside, Devotional Recreation does have elements of all the others. But it also has the element of drawing people closer to God. And the authorities tell us that unless we have that, we can never be sure that a man will live up to the moral code.

Annie: That sounds kind of narrow-minded to me. Why should a person have to go to church a lot to be a moral man.

Mr. A.: He can be a good man for a while without the Church and God, but it is mighty apt not to last, especially if there is not a church of some kind in the community to remind him of God at all times.

Charles: That reminds me of what one of our teachers said of where she once lived where there was no church of any kind. She said it was an awful place to live, with no respect for law and order.

Mr. A.: Yes, that is it. If a man does not look up to God and feel his responsibility to his Maker, he is apt to either not look up to any one, or else to look to some one who will fail him. So that he will be like a man following a light and the light goes out. But a Christian who does his duty to God is like a man walking always in the light of the Sun. For it shines even through the heaviest clouds and will never fail us.

Annie: It really looks as if the Devotional Recreation is about the most important of them all, as far as keeping people good citizens is concerned.

Mrs. A.: That is what I hoped you would realize, for it is the conclusion that your Father and I reached many years ago. I hope that it is something that you will never forget.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

Vermont Elects Bishop.

The New York papers on Wednesday, July 31, carried the news from Vermont that the Rev. Joseph Wilson Sutton, D. D., vicar of Trinity Chapel, New York City, was elected on Tuesday, July 30, as Bishop of Vermont. A special diocesan convention had been called to elect the successor of the late Rt. Rev. Samuel H. Booth, D. D., who died on June 17. It is understood that Dr. Sutton's election came on the fourth ballot.

Dr. Sutton is at present on a vacation in Mexico. He left New York the first of July and is not expected back until the middle of October. So far as could be learned, Dr. Sutton had no intimation of his possible election as Bishop of Vermont.

Dr. Sutton was born in Baltimore, June 6, 1881. He attended Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland, receiving degrees of A. B., M. A. and D. D. from the college. He attended the General Theological Seminary, graduating in 1905.

An International Army on the March.

By the Rev. C. Beverley Davies, M. B. E., M. A., Chaplain of Christ Church, Oxford.

The most wonderful of all Oxford Group house parties has come to an end with an unforgettable Sunday.

In the early morning the whole gathering attended Holy Communion services and then at 11:30 streamed into Christ Church Cathedral for a united service. It was a pageant that was deeply moving. The crowding in of fifteen hundred happy and released personalities from many countries was in itself something for which to thank God; it was a miracle of grace; but the greatest moment was when, in slow step, two by two, there entered a stately procession of representatives from thirty-two nations, with their flags.

Germany came side by side with France, a symbol of the miracles that God can effect in the lives of nations, when we so will; and in that array came U. S. A., Scotland, England, China, Japan, Belgium, Burma, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, Northern Ireland, Latvia, India, Papua, Holland, Italy, Czecho-slovakia, Egypt, Switzerland, Bulgaria, Barbados, Kenya, Hong Kong, Palestine and Syria.

It was noticeable that the flag of the Latvian Republic was carried by the Baroness Dina Hahn, formerly Princess Lieven, from Riga.

Dividing at the west door, they moved through the north and south aisles, uniting again at the altar, and taking their places in the choir stalls.

Behind them came the clergy, including the Metropolitan of India, the Archbishop of Melbourne, Bishop Roots of Hankow, Bishop Hind of Fuchien, Bishop Shaw (assistant Bishop of Oxford), the Dean of Christ Church, and Canon Goudge (Regius Professor of Divinity).

"Like a Mighty Army."

Meanwhile the congregation sang the words that have come to mean so much to them—"Like a mighty army moves the Church of God."

All were assembled when the clear voice of the Rev. Cuthbert Bardsley rang out, calling us to thanksgiving, to thought, and to work for God, recalling the fact that the wisdom of men had failed, that we had efficient organizations and governments, but people were realizing at last that God's plan for the solving of the world's problems was the only way. Men in Denmark had said this was the greatest religious movement since the Reformation.

Later in the service Canon Streeter (Provost of Queen's College) spoke of the way in which God's guidance came into every detail of life, and the Metropolitan of India (Dr. Foss Westcott) told of the cost to be paid for the true Leadership of Christ—the cost of the Cross in our own lives, in honesty and unselfishness of living.

The Archbishop of Melbourne gave the blessing, and then the pageant of confident faith moved out again into action throughout the world, in Church life, diplomacy, business, education, home life and every other area of human need.

Triumph of God.

During the week it had been a wonderful sight to see the Debating Hall of the Oxford Union filled with Christian revolutionaries—bronzed men from the Dominions, teachers, business men, mechanics, students, social workers, clergy, artists, missionaries, civil servants, villagers—recording the steady triumph of God throughout their countries; to hear new decisions staked; to witness the humble sincerity of those who, finding an experience of Christ, had surrendered to Him; to learn of families reunited, resentments ended, new honesty in business, new vision for national or racial problems.

Here was no longer idealism but reality; not controversy but solution. The same scenes were to be found in the other house parties at St. Hugh's College and Lady Margaret Hall.

Four Years Ago.

My thoughts went back to that international gathering, four years ago, at St. Hugh's College, to a room filled with the Holy Spirit, where men and women of all ages of various nationalities and denominations spoke simply of their experiences and thanked God for the new life they had found through this Fellowship.

I saw that orthodoxy and soundness of judgment, the reunion of Christendom, would come from the ever-growing experience of the Holy Spirit in our personal lives, and sanity and self-control from the surrender of our emotional areas. New hope was born in me.

Here were men and women who had paid a greater price and who were changing lives. They were emotionally released, problem free, surrendered in will, living together under guidance, on a basis where they shared, not only their experiences, but also their daily defeats and victories, their innermost convictions and their guidance.

I realized it was the end of my pilgrimage; what I had longed for all my life. These people, often so young, were nearer to Jesus, to whom I had given myself at my conversion and at my ordination, and it broke me up, at my first meeting, to realize how much and why and where I had so failed Him. I accepted God's new call, shared my problems with them, reconsecrated my life to God in the presence of one another, made a decision to trust God with a full solution and to correct my ways, made guided restitution, and gave my heart to those who had helped me to this vital experience of Christ, and to this new loyalty to Him. It has been my unwavering conviction that the Holy Spirit has guided us all to work in fellowship because, imperfect as we are, Christ has had His way in our hearts; for it is only a quality of life which holds the Oxford Group together.

A New Determination.

It is neither a new organization nor a new sect, but a new determination. Never during these four years have I felt a clash of loyalties, but, on the contrary, one inclusive loyalty to Christ for each. All our primary loyalties are enhanced by this deeper experience. The team-work of the Group is carried out in free association under guidance. We learn to trust God and to lay our guidance side by side, until His will is made known and then to act upon it in unhesitating obedience.

During these years I have realized that whenever possible we all need the first-hand experience of a house party and not only of isolated meetings in order that we should not miss the fullness of Christian life. So often the challenge to full surrender rouses in us every repressed as well as conscious conflict and one has to be long enough in the aseptic atmosphere of love, challenge, fellowship, laughter, discipline and action, before God can have His full way into our hearts and break down the defense mechanisms which seem to be drawn round our loyalty to truth, but which are really the defenses of self-will and pride with which we protect our unsurrendered ego from a painful self-realization.

There was one period when loyalty to these men and women, through whom God was performing such miracles of life-changing, led me to trace out some of the more surprising forms of opposition to the movement, but I soon found that the positive answer was in oneself and in the work of life-changing.

"Mistakes and Failures in My Own Life."

It is also true to say that there were numerous mistakes and failures in my own life, as well as in the lives of all who are willing to be judged by the highest standard of all time, but the test of loyalty has been that we share directly with the one in whom we detect error, and never criticize behind his back.

It is in this way that the Oxford Group in the University has developed, and year by year, in a steady stream, have gone out into the work of world-changing.

The publication this week of The March of Events, at the modest charge of sixpence, is a matter of world importance, and the contents, the editing and the set-out, all done voluntarily, are well up to present-day standards.

Rich Reward for Patient Work.

This week has been a rich reward for the patient work, faith, hope and love of Frank Buchman and all others in the Fellowship; for the Churches are awakening to the richness of their inheritance, and the "united Christian front across the world" is slowly being forged by the power of the Holy Spirit.

Today (Friday) four other simultaneous national house parties begin in Oxford, at which several thousands are expected, lasting for ten days.

What if revival is at our doors and we are not ready because we are bound up in our possessions, our points of view, our personal problems and our unwillingness to surrender all? Are we ready only for routine and not for enterprise? That is the challenge to us today.—Church of England Newspaper.

Recommended Legislation.

A strong stand was taken by the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America in favor of the revision of our neutrality laws to place an embargo on arms and loans to nations resorting to armed conflict, according to an announcement made today by Dr. Ivan Lee Holt, President of the Federal Council. The Church Council declared that "the United States should withhold aid from all belligerents in any conflict that might arise" and recommended that legislation be enacted providing that an embargo be placed on the shipment of war materials, loans and credits to nations resorting to armed conflict, and that nationals of the United States doing business with or traveling in nations at war do so at their own risk. The full statement adopted by the Federal Council follows:

"The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches invites the people of our churches to give serious study to the steps which might be taken by our government to render war less likely and to prevent the involvement of the United States in war.

"We believe that the peace of the United States and of the world can best be secured through policies of international cooperation. It is for this reason that we rejoice in the knowledge that the United States has become a member of the International Labor Office. It is for this reason that we have long urged the United States to join the World Court and to state the terms under which our government might officially relate itself to the League of Nations. It is entirely unlikely that war will be permanently abolished until there is established a world organization in the functioning of which national currency, trade and defense policies are conditioned by the fact of world interdependence.

"Pending the creation of a world system of security, we recommend that our government undertake to render less likely American participation in war by modifying its traditional policies of neutrality. We believe that the United States should withhold aid from all belligerents in any conflict that might arise in the future. To this end, we recommend that legislation be enacted providing (1) that an embargo be placed on the shipment of war materials to nations resorting to armed conflict, (2) that an embargo be placed on loans and credits to all nations resorting to war, and (3) that nationals of the United States doing business with or traveling in nations at war do so at their own risk."

Lutherans and Episcopalians.

A commission of the Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod is to meet with Episcopal Church representatives in an effort to gain a better understanding between Lutherans and Episcopalians in the United States. The Augustana Synod, in its session recently at Augustana College, Rock Island, Ill., accepted an invitation for such action extended by Bishop Wilson, Episcopal, of Eau Claire, on behalf of the Episcopal Church Joint Commission of the General Convention for conference with Methodist, Presbyterian and Lutheran Churches. Bishop Wilson, in proposing the move, wrote that the Lutherans and Episcopalians in America should follow the lead taken in Europe by their mother Churches, the Church of Sweden and the Church of England. The proposed conference is hailed as a constructive move toward church unity.—Boston Evening Transcript.

Karl Barth Called to Switzerland.

The governing council of Basel University, at their session on June 25, issued an invitation to Dr. Karl Barth to take his place as professor to lecture on Systematic Theology and Homiletics. Events have moved swiftly after the first six months of quiescence since Dr. Barth was rusticated from the professor's chair at Bonn. On June 14 the legal decision of the Supreme Court in Berlin decided in Barth's favor that he should not have been deposed from the chair in Bonn. But Dr. Rust, who had removed Barth in December last, exercised his veto over the judiciary in Berlin, and finally dismissed him on June 22, notwithstanding that verdict in Barth's favor. Dr. Rust appealed to Section 6 of the regulations governing appointments to office on the pay sheet of the Reich. Professors drawing salary from the Reich are required to give an oath of absolute loyalty to the Fuhrer and Reichs-chancellor, Adolf Hitler. Dr. Rust, in dismissing Barth, laid it down that "the National Socialist government cannot use further any official who is not prepared to tender the oath without reserve. No considerations of a religious, philosophical or any other character can be allowed to modify the absolute requirement this oath demands". The Basel "Nachrichten" of June 24 points out the wrong then done to Barth and to the course of justice when the Minister for Education, Dr. Rust, can act in such an arbitrary manner. It asks how will German judges take such a rebuff? How will Christian pastors act, now that Hitler demands an oath that may require disobedience to God? "Dr. Barth," the paper says, "has not fought in vain, a serious situation now confronts the German churches." In the same issue, speaking of Dr. Barth's future, it asked Swiss scholars, and particularly authorities in Basel, quickly to end pourparlers about appointing Barth to a chair. As reported above, Basel University authorities have swiftly acted, for the day after this appeal was made in the press the call was issued.—British Weekly.

L'Affaire.

Forty years ago "L'Affaire" meant only one thing—L'Affaire Dreyfus. Le Capitaine Alfred Dreyfus, a competent artillery officer but a Jew, had been arrested on a charge of treachery. There was some slight circumstantial evidence that it was he who had sold secrets of the Ministry of War to the German Military Attache. That was when M. Felix Faure was President. Evidence against the real culprit, Major Easterhazy, who was to drag an honored name through the mud, was not then forthcoming, and he held his peace at first, as, with more excuse, did Colonel von Schwarzkoppen; nor could the British Military Attache, who knew the truth, speak officially. Dreyfus was found guilty, degraded and transported to the Ile du Diable. Then the real excitement began. There was in the Ministry of War a man of ability and high honor, Colonel Picquart, who said that he believed that Dreyfus was innocent, and he suffered for his courage in saying so. France became divided into two parties. The guilt or innocence of Dreyfus seemed to matter little.

If there was a new inquiry, the revelations might condemn nearly every prominent man in the Ministry of War, the political and other anti-Semites and the political Roman Catholics, who had gradually involved themselves more and more deeply in upholding the sentence. Zola, Maitre Labori and others led the half of France that wanted to vindicate French justice publicly rather than cover up injustice. At last Dreyfus was brought back for a fresh court-martial to be held away from Paris, where the excitement was much too intense. At Rennes there was a travesty of a trial which horrified Europe. Then Dreyfus was "pardoned", and inconsistency was still further exalted until, twelve years after his arrest, he was freshly tried and acquitted by the Cour de Cassation, which quashed all previous proceedings. Dreyfus was rather theatrically reinstated as an officer; he and his son fought in the war, and he died last week. It was a terrible story of the result of official departure from justice. We may be thankful that L'Affaire Stavisky and the murder of M. Prince have led to no such crisis.—The Guardian, July 19, 1935.

Decision Regarding Fate of Philadelphia Divinity Postponed.

Decision by the joint boards of the Philadelphia Divinity School as to whether this seventy-year-old Seminary of the Church founded by the late Rt. Rev. Alonzo Potter will reopen its doors in the fall or suspend operations, dismiss its faculty and compel its student body to go elsewhere to complete their theological training, has been postponed until October 10.

This action was taken at a special meeting of the joint boards in Philadelphia on July 25, which had been called to receive reports as to the progress of the campaign to raise $70,000 to assure the reopening of the school under the reorganization plans approved last February, and to guarantee continuance of the school during the 1935-36 school year. At this meeting it was reported that approximately $47,000 has been received in subscriptions or pledges. Under the circumstances it was deemed advisable to continue the campaign in the hope that the needed balance would be forthcoming.

Clergy Meet at Camp Overall.

It is announced that a conference of the clergy of the diocese will be held from September seventeenth to twentieth at Camp Overall, Va., on the famed Shenandoah River. This conference will undertake to arouse special interest in the Church's Forward Movement campaign and to stimulate parochial and diocesan activities in general in the fall. The Rev. Arthur Sherman, D. D., will conduct the Forward Movement Conference. Special rates have been made for the clergy for the conference period and most of the ministers are expecting to attend.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. Wyatt Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Richard M. H. Wharton.

Mr. Richard M. H. Wharton, Treasurer of the Diocese of Harrisburg and member of General Convention, died suddenly of a heart attack in New York City Sunday morning, August 4, aged sixty-one. He had gone to New York to meet his daughter, Mrs. Michael L. Eggar, who was coming home for a visit from her home in Egypt.

Mr. Wharton had been Treasurer of the Diocese of Harrisburg since 1920. He was intimately associated with the late General Charles M. Clement, Chancellor, in the affairs of the Diocese. He reorganized the financial system of the Diocese, and managed its business efficiently. His heart was in the Church, and he gave himself without stint to its work. He was intensely interested in missions, and did all he could to bring the churches of the Diocese to pay their quotas, and he saw to it that the Diocese paid what it promised to the budget of the National Council.

He was senior warden of St. Stephen's Cathedral, Harrisburg, Pa.

He was also Treasurer of the Incorporated Trustees of the Diocese, a member of the Executive Council, Chairman of the Budget Department, and a member of the Department of Missions. He was a member of the Finance Committee of the Diocese and of the Committee on Canons. He was the sole member of the Committee on the Church Pension Fund and of the Committee on the Bishop Brown Fund for Missions.

He was one of the founders of the Evening News of Harrisburg, which has the largest circulation of any daily newspaper in the United States in a city of 100,000 population or less. He was Vice-President and General Manager of the Patriot Company, publishing the Patriot (morning paper) and the Evening News.

Mr. Wharton was born in Harrisburg October 29, 1873. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Mary Virginia Coleman Wharton, and two daughters, Mrs. Michael L. Eggar and Mrs. George S. Smail, of Cairo, Egypt.

Rt. Rev. Joseph M. Francis, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Kemper.

September 25 will be the one hundredth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper as the first Missionary Bishop of our Church in the United States. That event marked a turning point and a forward movement in the life of the Church in this land. A century ago the Episcopal Church was a weak and struggling body. Nevertheless, in the days of its weakness it recognized and acted upon its duty to preach the Gospel to all peoples and to extend the boundaries of the Kingdom. Therefore, the House of Bishops elected and sent Jackson Kemper to plant the Church in Indiana and Missouri. Because he was sent, he was a missionary, which is the meaning of the word. To the Church which sent him, and to him who was sent, Indiana and the Middle West owe a debt which can never be repaid except by a cultivation of the faith and the spirit which animated Bishop Kemper and other pioneers. In 1835, Indiana had one Episcopal church and one clergyman; in 1935, it has sixty clergy and sixty-one congregations. It is not a record to justify self-satisfaction or pride; rather, it is a challenge to undertake another forward movement to enable the Church to bear its witness courageously and effectively. Missouri, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin were within the extended jurisdiction of our first Domestic Missionary Bishop. Today in that same territory there are three hundred and eighty-four clergy and four hundred and eighty-one churches. Strange, is it not, that there are still people who profess not to believe in missions? Everything that we are and all that we have condemn such unbelief (or is it selfishness?). Because, from the day of Pentecost down, the disciples of Christ have believed in missions, we are possessors by inheritance of the blessings bestowed by Christ through His Church.

I hope that every congregation in the diocese will keep this anniversary with thankfulness and appreciation.

Joseph M. Francis.

The Church's Resurrection.

The rebirth, or the resurrection, of St. John's Church, Mount Vernon, is not only an interesting and hopeful event, but a remarkable achievement. It has had a checkered career from the beginning, and for the past few years the church has been closed. With the organization of the Evansville Associate Mission, in which Mount Vernon was included, the church was reopened and met with a cordial response. On one occasion of the Bishop's visitation, the church was crowded, four candidates were confirmed, and a vested choir of fifteen boys sang the service. Mr. R. S. Ottensmeyer, a Candidate for Orders and a Lay Reader, services St. John's Church under the direction of the Director of the Association Mission and is largely responsible for the revival of the mission. Incidentally, this furnishes a good illustration of what can be accomplished through united effort.

MINNESOTA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. S. E. Keeler, D. D. Coadjutor

St. Thomas', Minneapolis.

We are happy to report the first news from our colored mission in many months. Mrs. P. Rosser Chavis submits the following: Despite the hot weather, the Auxiliary has kept up its work and have made some very useful articles to send to a mission in Arkansas.

Church School attendance has also been gratifying. Although without regular material, the superintendent and teachers have held the interest of the pupils with Bible stories and lessons in Churchmanship.

Regular services of Morning Prayer are held at 11 o'clock each Sunday.

Choir Camp.

The choir boys of St. John's have just completed their annual summer camp on the shores of Deer Lake, Wisconsin. The camp director was Mr. Arthur Zache, who has supervised our choir camps for twenty-three successive years. He reports an unusually fine camp this year and judging from the praises the boys sang of camp and of "Art", as he is affectionately known to them, as well as by the sighs of regret when the camp closed, they wish nothing better than that the camp could continue all summer.

Women Meet.

The women of the Guild of the Calvary Church, St. James, were hostesses to representatives from the Guilds of the six churches in the western half of the Mankato Deanery when the Guilds from St. James, New Ulm, Sleepy Eye, Windom, Jackson and Fairmont met for a lawn picnic at the home of Mrs. Charles T. Crowley on July 24. Miss Margaret Densmore, Educational Secretary for the Diocesan Auxiliary, was the speaker, and Mrs. B. F. Pay, of Mankato, was in general charge of the meeting.

A similar gathering for the eastern part of the deanery was held at Minneopa Park, Mankato, on July 25.—The Minnesota Missionary.

ROCHESTER.

Rt. Rev. David L. Farris, D. D., Bishop.

The most comprehensive spiritual recovery program ever attempted in the Rochester area will be launched on September 19, when 400 ministers of sixteen denominations will meet to discuss plans for a United Church Loyalty Crusade to be conducted during the fall months.

The movement, sponsored by the Rochester and Monroe County Federation of Churches, will center its activity in the individual churches. Three major objectives will be sought for. The first objective is a general spiritual quickening of the present church membership, especially those who are habitually absent from church services and who carry little or no responsibility for the support of church work. The second objective is to launch a comprehensive plan of evangelism adaptable to every communion, church and community for reaching the largest possible number of "new adherents for Christ" in the fall of 1935. The third objective is to undertake a careful analysis of church finance problems such as problems of budget, deficits, debts. A practical method of relating these problems to the spiritual program will be outlined.

Five thousand Rochester women will cooperate in the crusade. Pastors have received details of the movement and are studying them prior to the fall meeting.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

Our New Educational Secretary.

Mrs. Louis P. Jervey has been appointed Educational Secretary to succeed Mrs. Conrad Goodwin, who has recently left the diocese. Mrs. Jervey comes to the office well prepared for its duties, having served as Educational Secretary both of her branch and of the Charleston District. She has also attended several Summer Conferences at Kanuga. She is at present at the Summer Training School at Sewanee and will take up her duties on September 1. After that date all correspondence in connection with the Department of Religious Education should be addressed to her at 9-B Rudledge Avenue, Charleston.

South Carolina's Latest Missionary.

A very impressive ceremonial was witnessed at the Church of Our Saviour, Rock Hill, Sunday morning, the twenty-sixth of May, when the beautiful processional cross, the gift of the Winthrop Episcopal Class in 1916, was reconsecrated at the altar with the added name of Agnes E. Hickson engraved upon the standard, the ninth volunteer from the class for the mission fields, accepted by the National Council.

Miss Hickson is from Cheraw and has just completed her studies at St. Faith's, N. Y., following her graduation at Winthrop. She immediately accepted work among the Indians of North Dakota, and is already on the field under Bishop Bartlett, at South Fargo. Miss Hickson has served most acceptably under the Woman's Auxiliary as summer volunteer for mountain missions.

Personal Notes

Rev. G. W. Butterworth, of London, will be the visiting lecturer at the Berkeley Divinity School, New Haven, during the fall term. Mr. Butterworth is a Mirfield man, having been trained under the late Dr. Neville Figgis. He is a fine classical scholar and is the translator of the Clement of Alexandria volume in the Loeb Library. The Bishop of Chichester, the Rev. G. K. A. Bell, speaks of him as "a quite remarkable man". He is vicar of the Church of the Ascension, Balham Hill. At Berkeley Mr. Butterworth will give a course on Early English Church History, and will assist in the Departments of Homiletics and Apologetics. He will do a certain amount of outside lecturing and preaching. Those desiring to secure his services should write as soon as possible to Dean Ladd.

The Rev. John G. Sadtler, of McLean, Va., has resigned the rectorship of Langley Parish in Fairfax and Arlington counties, to take effect September 15.

During Mr. Sadtler's rectorship of eleven years, St. John's, McLean, has been freed from an indebtedness of $9,000 and a beautiful new church, St. Mary's, Rixey Station, erected at a cost of $45,000, to serve the rapidly growing portion of the parish situated in Arlington county.

For nine years Mr. Sadtler has held Sunday morning services at both churches, one following immediately after the other.

After his resignation takes effect in September he will be available for supply work.

By appointment of the Bishop of Washington, the Rev. F. Bland Tucker has been named chairman of the Forward Movement Committee for the Diocese of Washington. He is rector of old St. John's Church, Georgetown, and is one of the most active clergymen in the diocese.

The Rev. A. A. McCallum, rector of St. Paul's Church, Washington, has been re-elected president of the Chaplains' Association of the United States Army, made up of army chaplains in various parts of the country.

The Rev. W. T. Capers, Jr., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Terre Haute, has been a patient in Dr. Mayo's sanitarium at Rochester, Minn., and has undergone a serious operation. The reports from the hospital are favorable and there is every expectation of a complete recovery.

The Rev. John C. Black, rector of Christ Church, Madison, and the Rev. A. E. Cole, vicar of Trinity Church, Bloomington, have been patients in Indianapolis hospitals, but are home again much benefited by the surgical treatment received.

DAVID, THE GREATHEARTED.

Mrs. G. C. Giles.

O Thou, who sensed a golden symphony
Of glory, God, a shepherd served by stars,
Who felt in fields with flocks of sheep His beauty
Inspire thy harp to healing, Aeolian bars,
Stir us with ecstacy for righteousness
That we, enamoured with holiness, from sin
May shrink. In passionate prayer we acquiesce
In compensations gained! To Thee, akin:
To conquer enemies through kindness rare,
And wait our God's fulfilment of our dreams;
To choose to cherish noble thoughts, forbear
To take revenge; in friendship feel the streams
Of Heaven's generosity unfold—
Shape us, as thou, greathearted, gentle, bold.

Wordsworth, the Friend of Animals.

Every lover of God's dumb creation who delights to see both animals and birds enjoying their full freedom in their natural surroundings, will find in William Woodsworth, the famous English poet of the nineteenth century, a kindred mind and spirit. He loved to study nature in its native simplicity, and to watch the behavior of animals when unconscious of any human observer. He could not bear to see dumb creatures living in captivity; they were meant to be free, and to imprison them in a cage was to rob them of their birthright.

In the home of the Wordsworths, birds were encouraged to come within the house to enjoy the friendship and hospitality of the household. Robin redbreasts would hop the dinner table, partaking of the crumbs. When Dorothy, the devoted sister of the poet, was confined to her room during a long illness, she had a favorite robin that took up its abode in her room. At night it perched upon a nail from which a picture hung.

In an exquisite poem that poet reveals the beautiful understanding and sympathy which existed between the robin and the invalid. We see the bird coming in and out of the room at pleasure, and when the windows and doors are made fast:

"To keep at bay the howling blast,
He needs not fear the season's rage,
For the whole house is Robin's cage."

Wordsworth found great pleasure in walking amid pastoral scenes to see the cattle quietly grazing or to watch the

"Lamb's that through the mountain went Frisking, bleating merriment."

In the following letter to a friend he reveals his inner emotions when watching animals wandering at will in their natural surroundings: "At the end of Gowbarrow Park a large troop of deer were moving slowly or standing still among the fern. I was grieved when our companions startled them with a whistle, disturbing a beautiful image of grave simplicity and thoughtful enjoyment, for I could have fancied that even they with me were partaking a sensation of the solemnity of the closing day. I think I have more pleasure in looking at deer than any other animals, perhaps chiefly from their living in a more natural state."

How simply and beautifully he describes the playfulness of dumb animals! When his daughter Dorothy was an infant, she was much amused at a little kitten which would leap up to catch the falling leaves from an elder bush which hung over the wall of their cottage at Grasmere. In an inspired moment the poet wrote a pretty poem describing this scene. He pictures not only the delight of the child, but also the skill and joy of the kitten:

"That way look, my infant lo!
What a pretty baby show.
See the kitten on the wall,
Sporting with the leaves that fall.
Withered leaves—one—two—three
From the lofty elder tree!

"Now she works with three or four
Like an Indian conjurer;
Quick as he at feats of art
Far beyond in joys of heart
Were her antics played in the eye
Of a thousand standing by,
Clapping hands with shout and stare
What would little Tabby care
For the plaudits of the crowd?
Over happy to be proud
Over wealthy in the treasure
Of her own exceeding pleasure."

No man had a more tender sympathy for animals, especially for those that suffered. It hurt his sensitive spirit to see horses straining, stretching, struggling with burdens beyond their strength. His sister Dorothy, his inseparable companion, expressed in her diary their oneness of thought and sympathy for suffering animals. Seeing some horses struggling under the weight of a great load of timber, she wrote:

"We felt compassion for the poor horses that were under the governage of oppression and ill-judging drivers."

Wordsworth experienced that deep sorrow of heart, which so many have known, when death robs the home of a favorite domestic pet.

He was deeply attached to a dog which belonged to Mr. Hutchinson, his brother-in-law, and at its death he penned one of the most beautiful memorial poems in the English language. In touching language he expresses the thoughts and feelings of the bereaved household. We see the faithful dog in its declining days, feeble and deaf, too weak to stand against the slightest breeze and "ready for the gentlest stroke of death". When death comes, all are moved to tears as they realize the greatness of their loss. God had endowed their pet with a love and sympathy "that was most intense".

"A chain of heart, a feeling of the mind,
A tender sympathy, which did thee bind
Not only to us men, but to thy kind.

"Hence, if we wept, it was not done in shame!
Our tears from passion and from reason came
And therefore, shalt thou be an honored name."

William Wordsworth, like his famous literary contemporary and intimate friend, Sir Walter Scott, did much by his life and works to win for dumb animals that same affection and freedom which man himself enjoys.—Arthur Hedley, in Our Dumb Animals."

A High Aim.

Some one has said that humanity may be divided into the following three groups: Those who have failed and do not know that they have failed; those who allow their consciousness of failure to discourage them from further effort; and those who find in their failure a spur to more earnest endeavor. The Apostle Paul belonged to the third group. "I count not myself to have apprehended," he says, "but I press toward the mark." All those who have high spiritual ideals are conscious of having come short of the goals they have set before them. Often, like the apostle, they feel that they shall never attain them in this life. But they take comfort in the fact that they have a shining goal and continue to struggle towards it. Failure in the Christian life does not consist in falling short of a high aim, but in not having a high aim, or in not striving to attain it.—Ex.

The Ballot.

One of the things to be cultivated and maintained is a respect for the ballot. One of our boasts is that we, as a people, are free, and that the government is in our own hands. The only way in which the government is in our hands is as we express our views and claim our rights through our votes in civic elections. In the old Roman Empire the government was a pure democracy, and the citizens of the city of Rome, which governed the whole empire, met together to express publicly their wishes in regard to governmental affairs. On the other hand, in the case of a pure autocracy, the people have no part in the government, which is entirely in the hands of the monarch, who reigns over the country, and who usually comes into his high position only by inheritance, the people having no say in the matter.

Ours is a representative form of government, which may be considered a modification of the democratic form of government. In a large community or nation, it would be practically impossible to conduct a democratic government. The people could not all be gotten together into one place, or, even if they could, it would be impossible for such a multitude to transact any business. In the representative government the people select certain persons who are to represent them in the government. The only satisfactory way of selecting these representatives that has been discovered is by a secret ballot. Each voter is allowed to vote for any one whom he desires to have in the office to be filled, and by voting secretly he is not subject to the influence that others might exert upon him.

This free and unrestricted ballot is one of the great privileges that this government confers upon its citizens. But a privilege is of no value, unless it is used. To be a true, loyal and faithful citizen, one must use this privilege, and take part in selecting those who are to make its laws and govern the country. If he does not use his franchise, he can claim no share in anything that is done for the good of the country; but, if he fails to vote, and vote for the right persons to hold office, he is responsible for the wrong that is done by those in office, for his vote might have changed the result of the election.

Some voters are so indifferent and careless that they will not take a little trouble to go to the polls and vote. They say that it does not make any difference whether they vote or not, that their vote will not count for anything, where so many are voting. One can never tell what effect a single vote may have. One vote elected Oliver Cromwell to the Long Parliament in England, sent Charles the First to the scaffold, and revolutionized England. One vote gave Texas to the United States, and one vote in the electoral college of 1876 decided who was to be the President of the United States. Many other similar cases might be mentioned. Your vote in some election may decide some important question.

One great trouble with this country today is that so many people fail to vote. The vote for President is usually the largest vote cast, and yet in almost every community not half of those entitled to vote use their privilege and meet their responsibility.—From an article in Presbyterian of the South.

ENCHANTED SPRING.

Who has found the way along the edge of the wood
To the little hollow with the alders,
To a gleaming strip of brook,
Where a spring slips whispering in?

There is magic in that water:
Drink deep, and wait for a miracle.
You will suffer a forest-change—
Seeing al things new—

New light on birch and willow;
Eden all at once,
Where you have stolen in,
And found unchanging peace.

The Vital Thing.

What is the one vital thing in Christianity? Contact between the Lord Jesus Christ and the soul of man. To establish and maintain this personal touch is the one purpose of all our religious activity, ceremonial and teaching. The soul in living touch with the living Christ will be led and taught by His Spirit, and so will be brought into the true way of life, mode of worship, truth of doctrine.

Some have tried to find Christ by seeking to follow His example in trying to serve and help mankind. As they ried to love and help the brother beside them, they met with the Good Shepherd who was seeking His lost sheep, and they came to know Him. But there were some who were so taken up with themselves and humanity that they never lifted their eyes to see the Saviour of mankind. They stopped short of reaching Him.

Others sought to find Christ in lofty ritual and elaborate ceremonial, in sacraments and services. As they worshipped God in the sanctuary they felt the divine presence, they met the living Lord. But there were some who were so impressed by beautiful services and moving ceremonies that they failed to press through to personal touch with Him to Whom these things all led the way, and without Whom they are valueless. These, too, stopped short of reaching Him.

Others again sought to find Christ by seeking to know the truth about Him, and about His work. They read in the Bible that He is the Son of God, who gave His life a ransom for all, and believing this they thankfully accepted the truth revealed, and thanked the living Lord for what He had done, thus coming into touch with Him. But there were some of these who simply believed the facts set before them in Scripture. It all seemed quite logical. They believed they were sinners; that Christ died for sinners; that there is now, therefore, no condemnation to those who believe, yet though they believed all these things, they never raised their eyes to the face of the living Saviour to acknowledge His love. They, too, stopped short of reaching Him.

Long centuries ago the Master walked by the sea, and seeing certain men, said to them, "Follow Me". These had not yet served mankind; they knew little of ceremonial and nothing of doctrine, but they met a Person that day, and a link was forged which nothing could sever.—Selected.

The Efficacy of Prayer.

The young man who had been examining the row of shining instruments that lined the operating room turned abruptly to the great surgeon.

"Of course you do not believe in the foolishness called prayer," he said.

"And why not?" the surgeon asked, as he held a delicate instrument critically to the light.

"What! A man with your scientific training!" the younger man exclaimed in surprise.

"And why not?" the keen-faced elderly man repeated.

"Oh, come now, doctor," the young man said smiling. "Surely you cannot believe that God would upset all the laws of nature to grant the request of some one of His creatures. You know how inexorable are the laws of nature."

"That's exactly why I believe so strongly in the efficacy of prayer." The words were spoken quietly but with evident seriousness.

"Explain the riddle, please," the other demanded, and his manner was grave now.

"Why, that's easy enough to do," the surgeon said. "Prayer—or rather faith which is the motive of prayer—is just as much a force of nature as gravity. The skeptics seem to think that if a prayer were answered all the laws of nature would be smashed to pieces. That is not necessarily the case. Let me illustrate: Why does this instrument that I hold in my hand not fall to the floor?"

"Why, because you are sustaining it."

"Exactly. And yet the law of gravity is not wrecked nor denied. It is merely superseded for the moment by a higher law—the law of life.

"Now, as we ascend in nature, we find this—the basic laws of a higher plane have just this power of overruling some of the laws of a lower plane.

"Gravity is the great law of the inorganic world. It is still a law in the organic world, but the great law of the organic world—the law of life—is superior to it. The plant thrusts its stem upward in the face of gravity; man walks about in defiance of it.

"Then why may there not be a law in the next plane of nature—the spiritual—that just as naturally supersedes some of the laws of the organic world? The plant reaches down into the inorganic world, and grasping the dead atoms there, endows them with life and the ability to rise superior to the force of gravity. May not the spiritual world do as much for the natural world without outraging a single law of nature?"

"Why—why, I guess it could," the young man stammered.

"It not only could—it does!" the surgeon declared emphatically.

"Then there is something in prayer after all?"

" 'The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much'," the doctor quoted. "I tell you, my friend, prayer changes things." And the young man knew from the light on the older man's face that here was one man at least for whom prayer had changed things—many things.—"Youth's Companion."

A Great Nation's Great Faith.

This faith which, in spite of all her faults, has done so much to make England great, found full and rich expression in the words of England's Primate at the recent Jubilee services in St. Paul's, when, speaking of the King and his people, he said:

We lift up our eyes unto the hills whence has come the help by which both he and they have been sustained, to that high region where, above the mists and clouds surrounding us, the will of God, silent, patient, sure, is reigning.—Ex.

MY PRAYER.

Blossom Bennett.

Give me an understanding heart
That I may know Thy will,
That I may hear and comprehend
Thy voice though small and still.

May I be willing to be led
As Thou shalt choose the way,
Content to trust Thee as my guide
And follow Thee each day.

May I have courage to endure
The trials I must bear;
Increase my strength to meet the needs
Of constant toil and care.

I do not ask a life of ease,
From pain and grief set free;
I only ask that I may live
In harmony with Thee.

Safe in His Father's Arms.

In a great steamship disaster a father was seen carrying a sleeping six-year-old child in his arms to a lifeboat. The boy was awakened by the commotion and fear about him; he opened his eyes to look up into his father's face, and then he snuggled a bit more closely into his father's arms and closed his eyes again in sleep. He was interested only to know that he was in the protecting embrace of his father. In the storms of life it is not the sound of the waves that matters, it is the sense of the enfolding arms of God about us that makes for peace.—S. C. Cooper.

TRUST IN GOD.

Frances Charlotte Davis.

Will you trust the God above you,
Trust in God?
He is Love, be sure He loves you,
Trust in God.

Cast your faithless fears behind you,
Trust in God;
Love will loose the cords which bind you,
Trust in God.

He is yours if you receive Him,
Trust in God;
Lo, He wants you to believe Him,
Trust in God.

See His hand extended toward you,
Trust in God;
Life abundant will reward you,
Trust in God.

The Magic Shawl.

Alene, frocked and furred, stood within a high iron gate, in a shaft of winter sunshine, and looked disconsolately into the street. Flaxen curls hung in a cluster about her shoulders and her somber eyes were big and dreamy.

As she stood thus she suddenly drew back with an exclamation of surprise. Another little girl stood outside the gate.

"How did you get there?" asked Alene.

The stranger laughed, and there was a quaint ring of music in her voice.

"May I come in?" she asked.

As she stood thus she felt that the lustrous beauty of the stranger's brown eyes and hair and ruddy cheeks had not escaped her, nor the threadbare coat she wore, but she was particularly fascinated with a shawl which hung lightly on the little girl's arm. It looked soft and ancient, yet rich with magic hues of embroidered blue birds in a forest-like setting of red and gold.

"Oh, what a lovely place!"

The visitor skipped across the yard like a flitting butterfly, peeping here and peeping there, and looking everywhere. She passed a bird bath, and finding no water in it, went on and in and out among the shrubbery until she had disappeared. When Alene found her she was sitting on a wheelbarrow handle, talking to the gardener. She arose and ran forward.

"You look unhappy," she said, touching Alene's arm.

"Well—" she paused. "Maybe I am."

"Haven't you lots of things to play with?"

"Yes, but I'm tired of them all."

The visitor looked long into Alene's eyes.

"Listen," she said, "I have a secret for you. Come."

She flung the magic shawl about them and in a twinkling they were in the midst of a large park where children played. One little girl had wandered off and lost her doll and was now weeping as if her heart would break.

"Don't cry," said Alene's companion. "We'll find it for you."

Beneath a low-hanging shrub she rescued the doll from a puppy and brought it out to the weeping child, torn and bedraggled, yet nevertheless so precious that joy now showed through sparkling tears as the child clasped it into her arms.

The magic shawl was about them again and in a twinkling they were upon the crowded sidewalk of a busy street. A ragged little boy stood beside his poor, frail mother, looking hungrily at a pile of buns in a baker's window.

"Wait, little friend," said Alene's companion, peeping into his troubled face.

She went into the baker's shop and purchased a large bags of buns and brought them all to the hungry little boy. Alene never forgot the look of surprise and joy and gratitude she saw in his eyes.

The magic shawl was about them again. In a twinkle they were between two rows of tenement houses along a narrow street, where children romped like cats among the push-carts, and the sound of crying babies filled the air. A bent old woman with a heavy bundle was struggling toward an open doorway.

"Let us help you!" cried Alene's companion.

The old woman set down her bundle, looked queerly at the girls, muttered foreign words, and pointed bony fingers up a dark stairway. The girls lifted the bundle and lugged it slowly up the stairs. The bent old woman followed. At the top she muttered more foreign words and laid her hands on their heads.

The magic shawl was about them again, and in a twinkling they were once more beneath the spreading trees in Alene's yard. Bright color glowed in Alene's cheeks, and a new light was in her eyes. She looked in speechless wonder at the girl with the magic shawl.

"Come," spoke the little stranger, skipping to the bird bath. "Look! There is no water for the birds."

"Yes, yes," cried Alene. "Wait!"

She ran into the house, and presently reappeared with a silver pitcher full of water, which she poured into the shallow basin. Then they ran away, and when they looked back a goldfinch was at the water's edge quenching its thirst.

"See yonder!" exclaimed the visitor, now pointing through the trees. "The poor gardener goes home to his crippled boy who has to sit all day in a chair. Couldn't we send him something?"

Alene thought for a moment.

"I know," she cried, clapping her hands, "my roses Aunt Jane brought me! Wait!"

Again she ran into the house, and again she reappeared, this time with a glorious bunch of fresh pink roses. Through the shrubs they sped and caught the gardener as he was passing through the high gate.

"Here, Jerry!" gasped Alene, all but breathless. "Take these to your little boy."

The gardener stared in amazement. Then he took the flowers. There was a break in his voice when he spoke.

"Thank you, Miss—Miss Alene."

Alene stood for a few moments looking thoughtfully at the gate that closed behind him. Then she turned to her guest, who observed her, quaintly smiling.

"I must go now," she said.

"Don't," pleaded Alene. "Oh, and your secret! Tell me."

"My secret?" The stranger's bright eyes twinkled. "Why, child, you know it now!"

The magic shawl flashed and she was gone.

Alene stood speechless, her eyes big with wonder. She ran quickly toward the house. Her heart beat fast with sudden joy. For she really had learned the stranger's name was Kindness.—Southwestern Episcopalian.

The Little Lady Who Lived in a Shoe.

There was a flutter of wings, and something flew swiftly past me, out through the woodshed door! A tiny wren! Wondering where she came from, I soon found out!

A pair of old shoes were hanging on the wall and inside of one of them I found a tiny warm nest. Mrs. Wren's home! In it were three tiny eggs.

Mrs. Wren was flying about frantically outside, so I hurried through my work and left her to her home life.

I was an interested visitor, slyly peeking into the shoe now and then as time advanced. The baby wrens soon grew up and all departed at the close of summer.

The following spring I noticed that the shoes were gone, so I found another pair and hung them in the same place. Sure enough Mrs. Wren again appeared and kept her summer home.

Nesting time is here again, and Mrs. Wren's home is waiting for her! I hope she comes. I am placing other old shoes, in sheltered nooks, near my home. Perhaps other birds would like to live in a shoe too.—Our Dumb Animals.

Pork Chops.

Scrap loved pork chops. Why his family so seldom ate them was a mystery to him, and the amount of chicken and fish they did eat was appalling, for neither of these was he ever allowed to touch lest a bone become lodged in his throat.

Ridiculous, he thought. But nobody paid any attention to his ideas, or even appeared to understand them, though he barked them out lustily.

Of course, he was a member of the family, and as such should have been listened to.

For years he had performed his duties in the household as any self-respecting member should. He drove the cows to pasture and sent the pigs back into their yard, when they sometimes managed to escape and get into the potato patch, he carried sticks of wood and acted as general protector to everybody on the farm.

He had been such a tiny ball of brown fur when he had first been given to the boys, that Scrap had seemed the only appropriate name to call him, and Scrap he had been ever since, though as time went on the name was not so descriptive as it had been at first.

He loved the boys dearly and was their constant companion, and they taught him tricks enough to have fitted him for any circus. All together, he led a very happy life, and if the rest of the family did not always understand him, he felt that it was not his fault. He understood them well enough. He knew that, when the boys started off right after breakfast with books under their arms, he was never expected to go further than the gate with them, and that, when they went off up the road with an ax, or perhaps a box of lunch, it was time for a grand frolic, and that by no chance whatever would he be left at home.

Oh, the delight of those tramps! The boys usually walked miles on those occasions, but Scrap easily ran three or four times as far, making little excursions around trees and bushes, chasing dozens of delightful odors, scratching up the soft wood mold in search of no one knew exactly what, and again flying (so lightly did his paws touch the ground) in pursuit of some incautious rabbit that had strayed from its burrow.

When these tramps were over and two very tired, hungry boys came back, an even more tired brindle dog followed them and could hardly wait to get to his comfortable napping-place behind the kitchen stove.

It was when they were coming back from one of these long tramps one brisk fall afternoon, that Mother, opening the door, spied the boys up the road. Scrap proudly trotted beside them with a long stick in his mouth.

"Take it to Mother," said Jay, as Scrap looked up for instructions.

Away he bounded, laying the stick at her feet.

Mother patted him and told him he was a good dog to bring her kindling wood for her grate fire, and then as the boys came nearer she called to them to hurry, since dinner was ready; for, you see, Scrap's family had lived in the city until the last few years and had clung to the city custom to have dinner in the late afternoon.

"We have some nice pork chops and baked potatoes, and Sister has made us some soup, too," Mother added.

"That sounds pretty good to me," said Jay. "I am hungry enough to eat the barn door."

"So am I," echoed Will.

No one noticed that Scrap's ears went up and his tail gave an extra joyful wag at the mention of pork chops.

It took but a few minutes for the boys to wash their hands and make themselves sufficienty presentable to sit down at the table, and it was not olng before six hungry people were doing full justice to Sister's good soup.

Father looked up suddenly and asked where Scrap was.

"Behind the kitchen stove," answered Sister.

"What did you do with the chops?" Father asked.

"They're on the hearth," she answered.

"Aren't you afraid Scrap will get them? He is as hungry as the boys, and you know how he loves pork chops."

Right here I must explain that the stove in that kitchen was an old-fashioned, rather large affair, with no warming oven, but with a wide low hearth in front, where the food next to be served was often set to keep hot. The hearth was so low indeed that it was only just about the level of Scrap's nose.

"No," said Sister, "he won't take them. You know, Daddy, you have yourself often boasted about Scrap's honesty. You know he has never stolen a thing since he was a little bit of a puppy. I am sure there is no virtue in being honest if things are put so far out of the way that one can't reach them."

"Very well," said her father, "but I'm not looking out for Scrap's virtues just now so much as I am for dinner."

By this time the most of the family had finished eating their soup, and Sister rose to take the dishes from the table, walking very softly toward the door. Once there, she beckoned to her father, who followed quickly and peeped in the kitchen door.

Scrap was no longer snoozing behind the kitchen stove as Sister had left him, but had gone to the other end of the long room, and was lying with his nose in the corner farthest away.

Triumphantly Sister returned to the dining room with the platter in her hands, and Mother carefully counted the chops and said, "Yes, that is exactly the number I cooked." It was perfectly certain that they had not been touched.

"Now, Daddy, what do you say to that?" asked Sister.

"Well," said Father, "I'll tell you just what I think. Scrap is a great deal wiser and better than some people. He not only did not yield to temptation, but he got as far out of the way of it as he could."

"Come here, Scrap. You certainly deserve a reward. Sit up like a gentleman," and Scrap straightened himself up at once on his hind legs, joyfully took the nicely browned chop Father gave him and carried it out to the old back porch, which was his usual dining room.—Zion's Herald.

Baby Bruins.

So tiny, helpless and undeveloped are baby bears that the people of the Middle Ages believed them to be born a shapeless mass, licked into some semblance of the proper shape by a loving mother's tongue. That, of course, is untrue, but it is a fact that the brand-new cubs are almost hairless mites weighing less than a pound. It is many weeks before they can leave the warmth and shelter of their secluded den.

But, once they have seen the light of day, it is not long before the bear twins —they usually come in pairs—are enjoying life to the utmost. Few woodland babes are more playful or interesting to watch than black bear cubs. They seem to be able to think of endless tricks for their own amusement and the annoyance of their companions. Mother bear often has to administer a well-deserved, if somewhat staggering, cuff on the head as she teaches her offspring how to behave themselves, for their own good and safety, in the stern school of woodland experience.

Bears are among the most inquisitive of all animals, which is saying a great deal. And nothing escapes the thorough investigation of the bear cubs as they search every nook and cranny for succulent grubs or roots or honey to satisfy their never-ending appetite. Curiosity and greed combine to make the bears among the tamest of animals in the national parks, where they soon learn that no harm will befall them from humans. Tourists are always amused by the comical antics of the roly-poly cubs as they boldly beg for dainties, or rollick together in mock combat.

But mother bear is always watchful for her babies' safety. And the latter often like to fool her by crying for help without reason. It is never safe to take liberties, however well intended, with the cubs if mother bear is anywhere near. One tourist stepped from his car to take a picture of a bear family, begging for dainties, on a mountain motor road. He made the mistake of stepping between the mother and cub in order to snap the latter. The she-bear mistook his peaceful intentions, and the tourist continued the journey wrapped in his lap-rug, having parted with the seat of his trousers.—W. J. Banks in Our Dumb Animals.

The Little Girl With the Crooked Back.

Inez whimpered when she came in sight of the new schoolhouse, and clasped her mother's fingers tightly. She dreaded facing a room of strange children. The boys and girls in the other school had made fun of her crooked back. Of course, these boys and girls would do the same. Inez cried softly to herself.

But no one stared at her as she passed through the playground, and the teacher in the second-grade room was sweet and kind.

A little girl with heavy brown curls hung up her hat for her. Another girl showed her where the bubbler was, and how to turn the knob so as to get a good drink of water.

At recess Inez had usually sat alone in her seat, but today Rose and Ethel —she had heard the teacher call their names—helped her down the steps and chose her to be the first one to throw the bean bags. At noon Ethel held her coat for her, while Phylis, a little red-headed girl, tied her shoestring, which had become loosened.

And instead of walking home alone, hippity-hop, hippity-hop, five or six girls came along with her, and they walked slowly, so that Inez did not get out of breath once.

"Oh, mother, I love school!" shouted the little girl with the crooked back.

"I thought you didn't like to go to school, dear?" asked Aunt Annie.

The little girl with the crooked back looked up from a large piece of bread and butter.

"Every girl in the school was kind to me," she smiled, "and Ethel and Rose say they are going to call for me every morning. Oh, yes; I love school."

And the happy little girl with the crooked back took another bite of the bread and butter.—Selected.

BUT.

F. J. Earl.

Could we have seen the Master, as
He taught each summer day
Among the flowers of Galilee,
Or out there on the bay;

Could we have heard the simple way
In which He spoke to all,
And just how very homely were
The words that He let fall,

We'd understand how empty is
Our pride—our love how poor;
But we should seek to exercise
His Spirit all the more.

BEAUTY.

Beauty is a hidden thing,
Not the morning chimes that ring,
Nor whispering rain against the wall,
And plaintive whippoor-wills that call:
Nor is it in the sunset glow,
Or poplar shadows on the snow.
It is not what I hear or see,
For beauty's hiding deep in me;
I only find it when I roll
The stone of self from off my soul,
And let the light of love make real,
That beauty I may hope to feel.

The Funny-Looking Cow.

"Oh, what a funny-looking cow!" said the chic young thing from the city. "Why hasn't it any horns?"

"There are many reasons," answered the farmer, "why a cow does not have horns. Some are born without horns and do not have any until the late years of their life. Others are dehorned, while still other breeds are not supposed to have horns at all. There are many reasons why a cow sometimes does not have horns. But the chief reason that this cow does not have any horns is that it isn't a cow at all. It's a horse."

I would be joyful, as my days go by,
Counting God's mercies to me; He who bore
Life's heaviest cross is mine forever more.
And I, who wait His coming, shall not I
On His sure word rely?

DEATHS

MRS. PEYTON RANDOLPH NELSON.

There is a quietness and unobtrusiveness about those who walk in the Spirit which is characterized in the Scripture as "hid with Christ in God". Hence those souls who are of priceless worth to the world and adorned with Christian graces, often slip out of life unnoticed save by a few spiritually descerning ones. Such is the case of MRS. PEYTON RANDOLPH NELSON.

A saint of God has gone to her rest of whom as of St. Paul, it might be said, she "fought a good fight, she finished her course, she kept the faith", Mrs. Nelson combined the culture and refinement of the Virginia nobility and the charm of the Southern women of the old regime, with the radiance and tenderness and sweetness of the Spirit filled Christian.

Leaving her delightful home some years ago, she went to the bleak sagebrush desert of an Idaho Indian Reservation, There with a devotion and patience and arduous toil, she taught and practiced the love of God in Christ, with a perseverance and fidelity to the truth that furnishes one of the bright pages in the annals of the missionary work of the Church. Alone, amid hardships, cut off from congenial society, with heroic self-sacrifice, she trained the children to sing the hymns and taught them the faith. She drew about her the Indian men and women and brought the Gospel message to them with convincing power. Eternity will tell of the deep and abiding results from the touch of this consecrated personality upon these crude people of the sage plains.

Sue Garrett, Miss "Sue" as she was affectionately known then, later married Mr. Peyton Randolph Nelson and for some years they have resided in Williamsburg.

Mrs. Nelson was wonderfully grounded in the Bible. She was a thorough evangelical, and her beautiful Christian life is a testimony to what that doctrine can do in a yielded life. It was refreshing to come in touch with one whose gentleness was markdly heavenly. Even under provocation, she would never speak unkindly of any one. Her consecration was marked in her generous gifts to Christian enterprises. Her prayer life was so constant that she never failed in being a faithful witness to her Master and Lord. In all that she said and wrote she evinced a wonderful grasp of Christian truth and she was a mine of spiritual knowledge, upon which troubled souls often drew for comfort and counsel. She radiated goodness, and even under great suffering, she cherished a great interest in the work of the Lord to the last.

Truly she was a light of the world in her generation, and all who knew her mourn her loss.

A Salad.

If a man of science dogmatizes concerning the emotions and the will, and asserts that he can reduce them to atomic forces and motions, he is in peril of being laughed at. Lord Kelvin said: "Scientific thought is compelled to accept the idea of Creative Power." The story of Kepler and the salad just about settles this point. "Yesterday," he says, "when weary with writing, and my mind quite dusty with considering these atoms, I was called to supper, and a salad I had asked for was set before me. 'It seems then,' said I aloud, 'that if pewter dishes, leaves of lettuce, grains of salt, drops of vinegar and oil, and slices of eggs, had been floating out in the air from all eternity, it might at last happen by chance that they would come to a salad.' 'Yes,' says my wife, 'but not so nice and well-made as this of mine is.' "—Southern Christian Advocate.

The Good King's Love.

There is a very beautiful device whereby the Japanese are accustomed to express their wishes for their friends. It is the figure of a drum, in which the birds have built their nests. The story told of it is that once there lived a good king, so anxiously concerned for the welfare of his people, that at the palace gate he set a drum, and whoever had any wrong to be redressed, or any want, should beat that drum, and at once, by day or night, the king would grant the suppliant an audience and relief. But throughout the land there reigned such prosperity and contentment that none needed to appeal for anything, and the birds built their nests within it, and fixed it with the music of this song.—Mark Guy Pearse.

WINGS.

I watched
A little bird upon a fragile stem,
It looked as if 'twould surely break with him;
He did not seem to notice or to mind
In spite of all his swaying in the wind,
But sat erect and sang his lilting song;
He felt so very sure, so very strong,
For he had wings.

I watched
A soul so tossed in life's uncertain gale;
'Twas such a struggle . . . how could he prevail!
And yet with courage fine and with a smile,
He met each disappointment and each trial
Without a fear. He seemed to understand
That God was present to sustain him, and
That he had wings.

Low Cost Life Insurance and The Family Budget

Nothing is more important to the welfare of a family than the budgeting of its funds on a business-like basis.

After the essential needs of living have been provided for, Life Insurance should occupy a prominent place on the list of necessities. An insurance policy will continue the financial welfare of the family in the event that death removes its main support. There are policies that provide a Retirement Income for the insured.

The facilities of this Corporation are offered to clergymen and their families, and to the lay officials and lay-workers of the Church and their families.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

Let your will be one with His will, and be glad to be disposed of by Him.—Cardinal Newman.

"Christ wants to lead men by their love, their personal love, to Him; and the confidence of His personal love to them."

I think it would be real misfortune, a misfortune of lasting consequence, if the missionary program for the world should be interrupted.—Woodrow Wilson.

Never make a plan without seeking God's guidance; never achieve a success without giving God the praise.—A. T. Pierson.

Here are the three chief causes for spiritual inefficiency. We are not still enough for God to come to us, nor empty enough for God to fill us, nor sanctified enough for God to use and honor us.—Western Recorder.

"He needs in His work great men and women. But He needs humble men and women too. His rewards are never reserved only for those who have the posts of leadership. They are also for those who are faithful in that which is least."

Dr. R. E. Speer says: "For my part I do not know any authentic Gospel except that of the New Testament. . . . There is only one Gospel, and that is the Gospel of the New Testament, to which the historic faith of the Church has clung and whose ever clearer and richer understanding is the only quest we know."

Jesus is pre-eminent among men because He alone has discovered something that is completely satisfying. The immensities of eternity are contained in the conception that ruled the mind of Jesus.—John Short.

You have heard it said that when a pump is dry you must pour water down it first of all, and then you will get water; and so, Christian, when thou art dry, go to God, ask Him to shed abroad His joy in thy heart, and then thy joy shall be full.—Spurgeon.

"E'en for the dead I will not bind
My soul to grief.
Death cannot long divide,
For it is not as though the rose
That climbed my garden wall
Had blossomed on the other side,
Death doth hide,
But not divide."

It is entirely erroneous to assume that a passion for social justice cannot go with deep spirituality and is unbecoming in a follower of Christ. The very opposite is true. In all great natures, as in Moses and Paul, devotion to God and desire for human welfare go together. This Christ Himself taught in His great law of love to God and to men.—J. T. Stallings.

Is not the best of all our hopes—the hope of immortality—always before us? How can we be dull and heavy while we have that new experience to look forward to? It will be the most joyful of all our travels and adventures. It will bring us to our best acquaintances and friendships. But there is only one way to get ready for immortality, and that is to love this life and live it as bravely and cheerfully and faithfully as we can. —Dr. Henry van Dyke.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

Epitaph for the Living?

The sentences reprinted below lay bare our inmost selves, so far, at least, as the supreme objective, of existence is concerned.

The epitaph appears on an ancient slab in the Cathedral of Luebeck, Germany:

Thus speaketh Christ, our Lord, to us:
Ye call Me Master, and obey Me not;
Ye call Me Light, and see Me not;
Ye call Me Way, and walk Me not;
Ye call Me Fair, and love Me not;
Ye call Me Rich, and ask Me not;
Ye call Me Eternal, and seek Me not;
Ye call Me Gracious, and trust Me not;
Ye call Me Noble, and serve Me not;
Ye call Me Just, and fear Me not—
If I condemn ye, blame Me not.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Great Need.

Mr. Editor:

A few weeks ago I read an article, "The Unemployed Clergy." I certainly agree to this truth. I am a young man studying for the Sacred Ministry for the Lord Jesus Christ, and I am going on with more fervent zeal to that which He has called me or, in spite of many people who discourage me and tell me of "The Unemployed Clergy." But I say that this country and the whole world does not have too many ministers. The plea comes from some quarters that there are already hundreds of ministers in America who have no jobs. Yes, that is true, and there are thousands and millions of men in other professions who have no jobs, and yet that is no reason why we should stop producing lawyers or doctors or farmers. There are many men who are burdened with jobs, who, if their days were doubled, could not begin to get through with what awaits their attention. Of that sort there will never be enough.

The principle applies to the ministry. It is hardly likely that God is guilty of miscalculating. The man that He has truly called into the ministry He will certainly employ. Before His face there will be whitened fields and by His hands a certain harvest. The fact that a man imagines that he is a minister, or that he has had hands of Bishops laid upon him in ordination does not make him such.

I do not imagine one second that God ever intended that all ministers should be equally successful, nor can I possibly believe that God ever called a man to the ministry and then closed every door before his face.

My keywords through my life are, When God Guides, He Provides, and a whole Bible for my guide, a whole Christ for my salvation, and the whole world for my parish.

The Ethiopian Situation.

Mr. Editor:

Your very timely editorial for July 27, 1935, entitled: "A Test for Christians," finds plenty of common ground for its statement: "It is natural for us all to sympathize with Ethiopia." That is preceded by the "problem whether we really can keep our hands off and play the part of real idealists."

With that fine beginning, it is a keen disappointment to many of your readers that the last sentence of your editorial seems to solve the probelm by saying, "No." You refer to a case still in hearing before the League of Nations as: "This farce of a thug-like politician in provoking war with a peaceful, simple nation."

It seems not very probable that words like those, in black and white, in a religious journal, are going to be much help to "common sense and Christian decency in averting such things by the prayers and thoughts and sanity of more Christian men."

If in 1898, anybody knew all the rights and wrongs of the sinking of the Maine, a "heavy censorship screen" prevented the knowledge from becoming public property. Spain's appeals for arbitration and our rejections thereof resemble the Ethiopian-Italian situation in many respects. It is hard to see how outsiders calling hard names help any, in 1898 or 1935.

How About Cartoon Decency?

Is there not needed a league of decency to do something about the so-called funny paper? We can remember that for many years people have been worried about this feature of the newspaper, but the antics of the Katzenjammers is purity itself to much that has been placed in our papers in recent years.

Lest we be misunderstood, let us say at once that we still admire many of the strip comics that appear. "Moon Mullens" may be a bit coarse, but he is very funny. Skeezix is beyond reproach and keeps a high level of good humor. There are others for whom we wish long life and many ideas for years to come.

But the morality of the average "would be" detective or adventure strip is too low for decency. And the worst of it is, it comes into our homes and into our children's heads in a way that is hard to prevent. We can keep children from movies of which we do not approve, but little boys and girls who get up early in the morning to meet the paper boy with the most recent episode of "Dick Tracy" and allow such stuff to enter their minds is a problem that is a puzzle to many parents.

A child character in one of these strips goes to bed armed with guns. Killing seems to be the only social method of obliterating the criminal element in our midst. There exists a hatred between the righteous characters (and how righteous they are!) and the delinquent element. Feuds are the ordinary course of every-day life and—the worst element—there is no saving sense of humor.

In one nationally read strip an orphan is the chief character. The only institution she ever was in was a cruel and hateful place. Social workers are always pictured as busybodies, and the chief male hero is a gentleman who seems to believe that all reformers are communists in disguise. Any child welfare worker is greatly resented as cruel and selfish.

Perhaps we are silly to even worry about such trivial things. But are these not some of the influences that are forming the minds of growing children? Are not many adults being influenced daily by this philosophy, and what is the reason for its existence? Is not the chief reason an admission that America has little sense of humor actually and that anything exciting and thoughtless is good enough to spread before our people as a form of amusement? Perhaps the great American press will take remedial measures before it is too late. Their great advertising rivals—the radio chains—have had sense enough to consult child psychologists and maybe as great an organization as the newspapers will have sense enough to go and do likewise.

A Warning to the Churches.

The recent statement of Mr. Hopkins that during the year the government would withdraw from ordinary social service work and concentrate on the public works program is of especial interest to church members. He stated, among other things, that each state was perfectly able to do its share, provided the people of the state were socially minded.

There is the rub! In many states, in all sections of the country, the people are far from socially minded. Many people, perhaps all people, are charitably minded in an older sense of charity. But whether we have an educated public that can really be expected to live up to the requirements of the modern times is a question.

In particular it is a challenge to the churches and to the church membership. If our task is not easily seen as one of interpretation of social service in a Christian sense, we must be blind indeed. It is going to be a hard task, and it will be harder unless the pulpit and the thoughts Christian people use make every effort to educate those who are blind to the fact that conditions are not the same as our grandfathers faced.

One attitude that will take a good bit of education to change is the old attitude that probably came from pioneer ancestry—that only those who are lazy ever need relief. The virtuous, according to this false philosophy, never need help. But we have only to go to our Bibles and read the story of Job to see that even the virtuous can suffer. We have only to read over the sayings of Our Lord to realize that what modern social workers have discovered recently, He taught long ago—the responsibility of each of us for the whole.

Another thing that will have to take a good bit of re-interpretation and is implicit in the Teaching of Our Lord, is that every community is just what it deserves to be. Of course that is put in modern language, but it is true just the same. If we have panhandlers and racketeers in modern city life, it is but the reflection of the worst of ourselves in our social and business life. The good Pharisees didn't like this teaching nineteen hundred years ago, and we find it hard to receive now, but that does not destroy the truthfulness of the idea.

Church and World Problems as Others See Them

The Modern Mind.

The Guardian, London, England.

The Bishop of Gloucester has made a characteristic and valuable contribution to the discussion in The Times about reconciling Christianity with the modern mind. "What I should wish to know," he writes, "is, What really is the modern mind?" Philosophy is always changing, and it is a little difficult to adapt Christianity to such a kaleidoscope. Science, which Professor MacBride probably has in view, seems to be in a state of flux. What is dogmatically asserted at one time is equally dogmatically denied a few weeks later. Dr. Headlam finds that the main teachings of the Nicene Creed show greater fixity than scientific theories. He recognizes that Christianity must be taught in such a way that people today understand it. "It is not that we must adapt Christianity to the modern world, but that we must try to adapt the modern world to Christianity. There is great truth in this dictum. Unfortunately, too often the faith is not presented in such a way that it gets home to the modern man.

Abyssinian Christianity.

The Record, London, England.

From an account published in The Times it is evident that the Christianity of the Abyssinians must have been grafted on to a previously existing form of Judaism. They have a legend that Menelek, son of the Queen of Sheba by King Solomon, was crowned in Solomon's temple and returned to his own country with a numerous following of leading Israelites. That there must have been an importation of Judaism is shown by the fact that the Abyssinian Christians keep the Jewish Sabbath as well as Sunday, practice circumcision, abstain from pork and other "unclean" foods, bake their bread after the manner of Jewish passover cakes, have other traces of Hebrew ritual and boast their descent from Israelites. Their language contains many Hebrew words. In their churches they have a courtyard, an inner court corresponding to the Holy Place, and within this again a Holy of Holies which only the priests may enter. This contains the Ark of the Covenant, four posts supporting a shelf for the holy books, sacramental vessels, censers ond processional crosses. Apart from what the evangelism of the eunuch of Queen Candace may have left behind, the earliest knowledge of their receiving the Gospel is from Frumentius about the year 327, who was ordained by the Patriarch of Alexandria and became first Bishop of Axum, the former metropolis. They have never recognized the authority of the Pope, but only the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria from whom their Abuna or Archbishop must receive consecration. The Abuna must be celebate but the rest of the clergy may marry. The laity are not allowed to read the New Testament but only the Psalms.

Gandhi Would Not Kill the Rats.

The Christian Sun.

Mahatma Gandhi has appeared in a new role if the London Times is correct in its report. He is opposed to rat-killing even to prevent the plague. It is said that fleas carry the plague from rats to human beings, and one of the first steps in the elimination of this dread disease is the destruction of the rats. Gandhi, in a recent address, is reported to have said: "An advocate of non-violence like myself would die before killing rats. We should by strict observance, no less than by sanitation, prevent rats from breeding."

U. S. Mint Operated on Sunday.

Lord's Day Leader.

We sent a letter to the Director of the Mint, expressing our regret that the Mint in Philadelphia was operated in full swing on a Sunday in April. In reply we received the following communication:

May 11, 1935.

"I deeply appreciate your interest in the welfare of the Mint employees of Philadelphia; and share also your interest in observation of the Sabbath day.

"It is only under the most extraordinary circumstances that I authorize operations at the Mint institutions on Sunday. There are times, however, when emergency conditions place the situation in the class of 'pulling the ox out of the ditch.' Such were the conditions on the recent Sunday to which you make reference.

Yours sincerely,
Nellie Taylor Ross."

Reunion by Compulsion.

Church of England Newspaper.

Some in despair may be tempted to think that perhaps nothing short of secular compulsion will ever bring about what so many Christians in all the religious denominations feel to be imperative if the Church as a whole is to pull its weight and make its witness felt in the solution of our social, industrial and national problems. The weakness of a divided Christendom in face of a well organized and relentless secularism needs no emphasis. Is it possible that a friendly and impartal outside tribunal might discover for the Churches a modus vivendi which they themselves seem helpless to reach?

No doubt the mere suggestion of the intervention of the State in the domestic concerns of the Church and the idea of an external body considering the relative merits of doctrinal differences would be fiercely repudiated in many Church circles. May it not be, however, that the ecclesiastical disputants themselves fail to reach a settlement because they are so immersed in the partisan details as to lose the larger vision which an impartial tribunal might see more clearly and adhere to more closely?

In any case the times are evil and the days in which we are living too critical to allow us to acquiesce much longer in an ecclesiastical complacency which takes the rent garment of Christ as a matter of course and incapable of repair. If we fail to do anything others outside may have to try.

Devils In the Choir Loft.

Presbyterian Banner.

When it was proposed to introduce choirs in his London Mission General Booth put his foot down upon it and crushed it flat, saying that "in his experience choirs were infected with three devils, the quarreling devil, the dressing devil, and the courting devil," and he implied "that the third was the most damnable and diverting." He could do this with his despotic authority, but the average pastor would do well not to try it. The people up in the choir might retort that in proportion to the population there were as many devils down in the pulpit as up in the choir and some of the people might believe them. Some time ago we were visiting in a country congregation and were told of a fierce quarrel that started up in the choir with the pastor's wife's new bonnet as the center and cause of it and from the choir it leaped down into the congregation and tore it to shreds and then, it was claimed, it leaped over into Germany and started the World War! So a truthful United Presbyterian elder told us. Behold how great a bonfire a little bonnet kindleth! The choir is an important part of the service of the church, but the singers and the players upon instruments need to be careful along with the minister to behave circumspectly and maintain harmony in their behaviour as well as in their voices.

THE THOUSANDFOLD PAGE

ARCHDEACON FREDERICK W. NEVE, D. D.

Doing Honor to God

There are different ways of doing honor to God, but one of the most important is to believe in Him and His promises to us. Not to believe in His promises shows a want of belief in Him, that is either in His power to perform them or in His willingness to do so. In the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews, verse six, we read:—"Without faith it is impossible to please Him; for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." This fits in with the verse in the Psalm:—"Him that honoreth me, I will honor." Not to believe in God reduces life to a meaningless existence and we are left entirely without any friendly power between us and the untoward circumstances of life. A loss of faith in God is one of the most sad and terrible catastrophies which can happen to any man, and yet it has come to be treated as if it doesn't matter very much whether a man believes in God or not.

Reason Versus God.

Somehow or other Reason seems to have taken the place of God among many educated people. This was the case durig the French Revolution, when a woman, representing Reason, was carried through the streets of Paris with honors given to her as a Goddess. In Germany, at the present time, the country above all others where reason or rationalism, has for a long time been given the supreme place in human thought, we find a revival of pagan ideas and ideals. The state has been given almost divine authority and the Christian religion has been made completely subordinate to it, and not only Jews but Protestants and Roman Catholics are being more or less persecuted to bring them into servile subservience to the state, or rather to Hitler, as its representative. It seems like a throw-back to the time of the Roman Empire, when the Emperor was considered divine.

Widespread Influence of German Rationalism.

German rationalism, the full fruition of which has just been described, has profoundly influenced religious thought in England and America. In our Halls of Learning reason is supreme, and the questioning of its authority is regarded as putting shackles on the human mind, and as interfering with the complete freedom of thought and its expression which should prevail in intellectual circles. This means that God does not have a supreme place in education, but may be ignored altogether without such an attitude being regarded as having anything to do with the pursuit of knowledge, even though it may be having a disastrous effect upon the beliefs and characters of the young people who are being trained for life in such an atmosphere.

Passing Through the Fire to Molock.

We are told that the children of Israel, at certain times in their history, fell away from God, and even made their children pass through the fire to Molock. It would seem that the higher education of the present day, requires our children to pass through a fire which may have more serious and lasting effects than the ordeal above mentioned. We are told, too with regard to Israel, that the ark of God, after being captured by the Philistines, was placed side by side with their God, Dagon, in his temple. It cannot be said that we are giving due honor to Almighty God to place Him on a level with human reason, and even in some cases to allow reason to be placed above Him. We are commanded in the scriptures to love God, not only with all our hearts, but with all our minds and this command has been used to emphasize the importance of giving free exercise to the mind in matters of religion.

A Serious Question.

But is it necessary, in order to secure an education, that our young people should be subjected to influences which are destructive of their faith in God and immortality, and thus reduce life to a merely animal existence? We are told that we must face facts, but the facts presented to our young people, in University laboratories, which seem to be disturbing to their faith, are only so in appearance, for if they had powerful enough vision they would see the facts disappear, and become something entirely different. A piece of granite seems to sight and touch, to be as substantial as any thing in existence, and yet we know that in reality it is made up of protons and electrons which do not even touch one another but are floating in space.

"We Know in Part."

It is well to remember that we know only in part, and that the knowledge of even the most learned is purely relative, as may be seen from the constant succession of new theories and the abandonment of old ones on the part of those who have made the knowledge of Nature their constant study. True progress can best be served through doing honor to God by believing in Him and seeking to know more and more of His love and goodness and wisdom and power, which will enable us to please Him and to find a rich reward in the new and higher truths which He will reveal to us by His Spirit. God has endowed us with the gift of reason, more especially to enable us to rise to the knowledge of Himself, which is Eternal Life. St. John 17-3.

Ichabod.

Not to know; not to know
What is best worth knowing
Is to me an empty show
Like to dead seed sowing.
If I cannot know the Best,
Of what use is all the rest?

Science may have merely found
Dead and empty husks of things,
Classifying sight and sound
With all the other gifts it brings.
But if that is all it knows
Life no real gift bestows.

Should it lose its sense of God,
Gazing into nothingness,
It may well be Ichabod
As its light grows less and less.
Of Almighty God bereft
What of glory has it left?

Note: Ichabod—"The glory has departed." I Samuel 4:21.

Making Religion Personal

By JOHN S. BUNTING,

Rector of the Church of the Ascension, St. Louis.

OUR religion must be personal. As a matter of fact it is too largely institutional, doctrinal and organizational and we miss much. It should be as personal as our life itself is. Just as though someone were sitting with you before an open fire, or were by your side as you walked, or sitting near you in your office. There are three supreme facts, you, life and God. Most people leave out God altogether. Let God change you, and interpret your life, and all is different.

Something inside of us all is calling aloud for more "life" and that means calling for God, for God and life are near together. Like the man in Bunyan's great book who ran screaming from the city of Destruction, "Life, Life, Eternal Life!"

Take your life just as it is and see how convincing this is. You are three-fold. You have a body, a mind, a soul. You "find" your body, so to speak, by finding food for it and five things are needed for the body: water, air, sleep, work, food. Use these rightly and you will have a good body. Your mind calls for thought, reasoning and right judgment. Use these wisely and you will have an intelligent mind. Then you have a soul. The food and environment of the soul is God. Surrender to Him and you can become as certain of God by living lovingly as you can of your body and mind by living hygienically. But you will realize this by doing certain definite, personal things and you must do them and not someone else.

There are three facts about God to which you must awaken. You can do so if you will personally try. God is trying to do for you these three things and asks you to respond and cooperate. Each of them is a kind of an awakening.

SOMEONE OWNS YOU. Find it out. Examine and see. You do not own anything about you, about your immediate life. You did not bring yourself here, you will not take yourself away, nor do you keep alive a single organ or function in your body.

The whole wonderland of the body you understand but slightly and but slightly control. You no more own your body than a tenant owns the house in which he dwells and which he rents.

Moreover, many of our sicknesses and breakdowns, many sorrows and troubles are due to our misuse of Someone Else's property. The Owner lives inside. Get acquainted with Him, consult Him and He will enable you to conduct the affairs of your body and mind much more sanely. Then, when you do this, you will awaken to the fact that Someone does seem to own you.

SOMEONE LEADS YOU—or rather He is trying to lead you if you will let Him. Inside of you is the Secret of your existence. Inside of you is a faultless plan. Inside are the sealed orders telling you the port for which you are sailing.

You will never know this by mere secular study, just trying to live in any way. Simply resolve to enquire, to listen, to try it out, by surrender and testing Him who is within! Try to transact your financial affairs with Him. Remember also to do this along with someone else, helping him, comforting and cheering him on. For no one should hope for a satisfying realization of God's leading by selfishly considering just his own comfort.

But remembering this condition we wish to assure you of a wonderful fact, namely, that we can "get" more and better things by asking God to lead us to them, than we can by just asking God to let us "get" them. For all "getting" must be blended with a kind of "giving."

SOMEONE PROTECTS YOU, or rather He is trying to do so. We need shielding and defending. There are so many physical dangers in this machine age and so many selfish, excited and stupid people in the world today. More than ever before.

Therefore you are apt to be moved to fight your own battles, do your own protecting and "look out for number one." Do not imagine that you can be wiser than Christ. He reminds you that He is a Shepherd and that means a Defender and that He is a Saviour and again that means Defender. Then let Him do what He wants to do and that is defend you, protect you. You may destroy yourself otherwise. Countless lives are in our mental hospitals today, victims of human conceit, due to their self-sufficient thought that they were quite able to defend themselves.

We have never yet seen a suicide or a paranoic who had not permitted the sense of the beautiful defense of God's love to vanish and whose human selfishness and conceit had not taken things into his own hands.

There is within us all a marvelous armour, stronger than triple steel. For the Love of God is within us all. It is immune and can make us immune, and invulnerable, safer than if we were behind the gun-lined walls of Gibraltar.

Worry and anxiety are monuments to our unbelief in the reality of God's protecting care and to our own preference to live for ourselves, within ourselves and unto ourselves. We may perhaps live that way. But we are certain to become victims of fear.

But Fear vanishes when we discover a Love that lives within. This is a dangerous day for one who has a little religion. But it is a glorious day for one who knows God and who has "made religion personal."

You are Owned!—awaken to it!
You are Led!—try it out and see!
You are Protected!—therefore fear not!
Awaken! Awaken! Awaken!

So we have a job facing us for this coming year. If we have the courage to face the facts as they are and meet ignorance with understanding, we will have an easier time than if we try to stay in the "soup and blanket age" which was all the Victorians seemed to know about social service. The Church can take the lead, and we must not fail in our task.

I love all beauteous things,
I seek and adore them;
God hath no better praise,
And man in his hasty days
Is honoured for them.

I, too, will something make
And joy in the making;
Altho' tomorrow it seem
Like the empty words of a dream
Remembered on waking.

The Witness and Genius of the Anglican Communion Today

Her Position in Regard to Others

By ARTHUR B. KINSOLVING,

Rector of Saint Paul's Church, Baltimore.

I PURPOSE to attempt a recapitulation of some of the positive values of that system of evangelical Catholicism represented in the Anglican Communion. Rightly understood, it would seem to be a good home for the enlightened Christian soul, yet it is disparaged from two quarters, on the side of Rome, and on the side of Protestantism. Many men find it difficult to believe that a Church may be at once Catholic and free, and yet that is precisely what this Church aims to be. Its position embodies not a compromise but a balanced combination of principles and tendencies which elsewhere are too much separated, but which appear as permanent elements in the story of Christianity. It is alleged that its history is such a mixed and contradictory one, and the criticism has point. But what other Church has not had a mixed history? Certainly the Church of Rome has. And there are very dark passages in the record of the Puritan Communions. If under Henry VIII, Fisher and More were martyred, we must remember that under papal influence Cranmer and Ridley and Latimer were burned, and the Puritans beheaded Archbishop Laud.

In one of the clever propagandist books recently published, "The Life of Sir Thomas More," by Christopher Hollis, giving the portrait of a singularly exalted Christian man, in a closing paragraph the author, referring to the years subsequent to More, uses these words: "After a time . . . learning of a sort flourished once more among them," that is, among the English people, "and they made themselves the masters of a system of justice not notably inferior to that of other nations. But holiness they have never again possessed. . . . Since More's time there has been no one man in a position of political power in England of whom it could be said, without manifest absurdity, that he had in him any touch of holiness." How blind and partisan are such statements as these. Is it untrue to impute holiness to Jeremy Taylor, the author of "Holy Living and Dying"; to Launcelot Andrews, to Bishop Hall, author of the "Contemplations"; to Bishop Wilson, who gave us "The Sacra Privata," one of the most searching of all devotional books; or to Archbishop Leighton? Is it profane to impute holiness to the evangelicals, John and Charles Wesley, Symeon, Venn, and William Law; to George Herbert, to John Keble, author of "The Christian Year"; to Dr. Pusey, H. P. Liddon, and Dean Church, to Father Stanton, T. T. Carter; or to the great missionary heroes, most of them martyred, Coleridge Patteson, Bishop Selwyn, Bishop Hannington, and Bishop Tucker of Uganda, and to the late Father James O. S. Huntington, Mr. Gladstone and Sir Wilfred Grenfell, not to mention a great multitude of holy women? Do men gather such grapes of thorns or such figs of thistles? These and ten thousands like them bear witness that the spirit of holiness is still manifest in the Mother Church of the English-speaking peoples of the world.

And then as to the influence of the Church of England in the British dominions, I agree with Bishop Johnson of Colorado in a recent editorial; I am more impressed with the power and influence of that distinctively English Church than I am with the relation of the Church of Rome to the people of Italy or Spain, not to mention the other almost exclusively Roman Catholic peoples of Mexico and South America.

And, in spite of all their brotherly appreciation of some of the fine things for which this Church stands, we also come in for a good deal of adverse criticism from the churches of the Reformation. Marked progress has undoubtedly been made by thousands of these fellow-Christians towards a more reasonable conception of the Bible.

At the Lausanne Conference, after a noble presentation of the case by Bishop Gore and others, the necessity of accepting the Nicene Creed as a faith basis for the reunion of Christendom was one of its most notable achievements. But it became evident that the cleavage was very deep on the matter of sacraments, and especially the orders of ministers. There is a strong and growing demand among these brethren for a heavier accent upon the great duty and privilege of worship. But they are still sensitive on the point of connecting it, as the older churches have always done, with the sacrament of the altar. The Holy Communion is still with most of them only an occasional service, and the whole accent is upon the remembrance and communion aspect of the sacrament, as contrasted with that which views it as a pleading before the Father of the sacrificial work of our Saviour.

AND as to the conception of a ministerial order handed down from the apostles' times, it is boldly claimed that the very fruits of the Spirit which have been evident in all ministries, Congregational, Presbyterial, Episcopal, since the Reformation have made void all claims as to a special value attached to Episcopal ordination or Episcopal government. I think the growth and power of these churches in the past twenty-five years has had the effect of making them less interested in this subject today than for several decades past.

I remember that many years ago the late Dr. William R. Huntington warned against the danger that the Episcopal Church in the United States might become terribly flattened by the impact of an unyielding and supercilious Romanism on the one hand, and a powerful group of Protestant organizations on the other.

Without question we have kin on both sides. There is a growing school who prize more and more the relationship with the Latin and Greek Churches. The whole life of the late Lord Halifax was given heroically to bringing about an understanding between Rome and Canterbury. I was reading over lately a paper that he presented at the Pan-Anglican Congress in 1907. He began by quoting the last words which fell from Dean Church, the brilliant chronicler of the Oxford Movement, who might have had the highest place in the English Church, but preferred to remain as the Dean of St. Paul's, as follows: "If anything is certain, it is that a temper which desires peace is the essence of the Christian character." Then Lord Halifax cites some very noble words in the encyclical of Leo XIII: "It is Christ the Redeemer Himself, to Whom are known the times and seasons propitious for such attempts, Who urges us forward. The love of Christ constrains us. It is He, the Good Shepherd, the Prince of the shepherds of His flock, Whose example we so earnestly desire to follow." And yet His terms are again unconditional surrender. And even

Lord Halifax is forced to admit that in Rome there has been over-definition, that the principle of concentration has been carried too far, and that the absolute subjection of the priesthood to the bishops, and the bishops to the Pope, is wrong. This is the man, you remember, who knelt in the chamber of the saintly Cardinal Mercier when that noble cardinal lay dying, and received from him as a parting gift his pectoral cross.

And yet in spite of all obstacles, there is a large group in England, and a smaller in this country, who are reaching out to claim a fuller expression of the Catholic life than the Church of England has known since the Reformation. They are haunted by the universality of truth, by the fact that it is not provincial and racial, but wider than all races. They are going back to Aquinas, and Bernard of Clairvaux, to St. Benedict and St. Francis. They are haunted by that vision of the Master, when He said, "Many shall come from the east and from the west, and sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God." Without doubt the revival of this enlarging Catholicism both in theory and practice, and within the borders of the Church which is in communion with the See of Canterbury, is the most significant fact in the life of that communion in the last hundred years. The man who thinks it has run its course is mistaken.

At the present time both the Evangelical Liberal school and the Catholic school are each distinctly gathering strength. It is a mark of vitality and one of the fruits of liberty. Now and then we hear voices demanding the proscription of those of the opposite party. But the Church herself mothers and comprehends them all. We can certainly never be regimented into passive servants of the Latin hierarchy, and the Church at whose altars we serve is not likely to lose her identity by being merged with one or more of the individualistic groups which have increased in number for three hundred years. We still adhere to the ideal of one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, with a long history and a long memory. "We believe in a living Christ Who still guides and controls His Church through the processes which He inaugurated."

(Dr. Kinsolving will conclude this subject next week with an article on the principles and characteristics of the Anglican Communion.—The Editor.)

Salvaging the Best

By JAMES E. FREEMAN,

Bishop of Washington.

OUR age is engaged in studying what is salvageable in its several institutions and agencies. All our economists are busy re-studying their plans, all our educators in re-appraising their curricula. After pursuing uninterruptedly their established course for many years, they find themselves confronted with a new set of conditions that compel definite readjustments and re-adaptations. To many, to be compelled to reckon with such new demands, is a trial they reluctantly accept. What is of permanent value, obviously, must be preserved. What is of questionable worth, must be discarded. This may mean the loss of much that hitherto was zealously guarded and protected. Our situation is not unlike that of a ship that has sustained serious damage and that must be floated into port at any cost. The cargo must be appraised and such parts as are of less value must be jettisoned. There is no alternative.

Looking consistently and equitably at human life itself, what do we esteem of such priceless value that, at all hazards it must be preserved? Looking more particularly at youth, what are the indispensable things that challenge its deepest concern, to which we must address ourselves with increasing zeal and intelligence? Here lies a problem that must engage our most serious thought and call forth our strongest endeavors. Beyond any question of doubt, the most precious things in any evaluation of what we hold of worth, that are indispensable to our continuing security and happiness, concern character. Everything else we possess is inconsequential compared with it. We may develop along cultural, artistic, mechanical and industrial lines, but we shall ultimately fail, unless we stabilize our life by the strong elements of character. A distinguished educator pleads for the saving of that which contributes to beauty and truth in life. He would not have us lose in these hectic days when we are seeking to recover our material values, those finer things that belong to our better nature.

In looking out upon the world in which we live we are prone to measure life's chief assets in terms of what they represent of material advantage and satisfaction. The gold standard is the criterion by which all else is judged. Our youth in particular are admonished to think of life in terms of gain and the satisfaction of their desires. There is a legitimate and consistent search for the satisfaction of that which our physical nature craves; there is merit in an ambition to attain excellence and preferment in life's callings and occupations; indeed, life would be gray and monotonous without these things. To disparage such ambition is the part of folly. Along with this and to balance it, the recognition of the demands of our spiritual nature is demanded. A great teacher and exemplar of life, St. Paul, declared that, to properly measure life's real values meant to regard with consistency the things which are seen and those that are unseen, the temporal and the eternal. He speaks of the outward and the inward man, and affirms that while the outward, the physical man, may slowly but perceptibly fail, the "inward man is renewed day by day." He conceives that, a right evaluation of life means the recognition and cultivation of that which is imperishable, the immortal soul. To believe this, lends meaning and zest to life. It lifts it above the concerns and satisfactions of the physical and compels it to recognize the utter indestructibility of the inner and finer nature, the real man within.

To salvage this was the whole purpose of the ministry of Jesus. He placed a higher value upon life's capacities and potentialities than any one who had gone before. He took the seemingly lost and forgotten of earth and invested them with a new hope and gave them the will to fulfill it. He banished fear and despair and quickened impulses that had long lain dormant and unrecognized. What may we do to salvage life today? What finer task, yes, what more practical, than to revive in men and women the sense of their real selfhood, their inner and better nature; those great qualities of the soul that are designed to survive all the shocks of time and to grow despite physical impairment and weakness? For "though our outward man perish, the inward man is renewed day by day." It was this conception of life that prompted the great Master to ask: "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Turning the Other Cheek

By JOHN MOORE WALKER,
Rector of Saint Luke's Church, Atlanta.

"Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also."—St. Matthew 5:39.

THIS text is likely to make people feel uncomfortable, so emphatically does it run counter to the urge of our natural impulses. And yet remember it comes to us on the authority of Jesus Christ. Let's consider for a moment the import to our lives of His authority. Authority of some sort is a prerequisite, if one is to be saved from anarchy. It is authority that redeems liberty from being license, that preserves order against confusion. Without some authority to obey, one's life is undisciplined; and it is the undisciplined man who becomes the creature and the victim of his impulses. Perhaps there is nothing more urgently required in our generation than moral authority. And he who would be a Christian must decisively commit himself to the authority of Christ's leadership. Surely nothing less is to be expected. Let us bear this in mind as we consider the import of our text, "Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." Remember this mandate comes with all the weight of the Master's authority and is therefore not to be evaded or brushed aside. It expresses something clear and definite in the Christian program of conduct.

What is this clear and definite something? It is with no desire to evade, but to discover, the truth that I question the literal as being the real meaning of the text. "If any many cometh unto me and hateth not his own father and mother and wife and children, he cannot be my disciple," is an example of Christ's sayings in which the literal meaning is not the true meaning. So also, "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee . . . if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee." The intent here is clear enough, but it is not the literal meaning of the text (for surely our Lord in this context was not referring to surgery!).

Again, a person could follow the text literally and at the same time harbor black hatred in his heart. I can picture Uriah Heep literally turning the other cheek—and we all know what manner of man he was. But, someone may object, it goes without saying the text should be followed in the right spirit. Yes, there you have it, the right spirit. And this right spirit is the true meaning of the command. Recognize it, embody it in your conduct, and you will be following the leadership of Jesus Christ in this particular. And the spirit, what is it? It is one whereby we rise above the natural impulse of revenge and retaliation. It is when we conquer the desire to requite an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Show me the man who, with opportunity to do otherwise, has reached that greatness of soul wherewith he bestows a forgiving magnanimity upon one who has done him real harm, hurt and hindered him; and I will show you the man who so far from retaliating in kind has exhibited the spirit of turning the other cheek. And anyone, let me add, who thinks such an interpretation means a watering down of the text from its native strength and force undertake to embody the spirit just described in his own thought, word, and deed; and I believe he will change his mind.

VISIONS AND TASKS.

By Frederick Ward Kates.

LIFE can be and should be a bright adventure, a quest for a Holy Grail.

All great men have been, and all great men are, dreamers—deep dreamers. Great men know dreams and follow them. A man is as god-like or as ugly as the dream that lights his life. "We grow great by dreams," said Woodrow Wilson. "All big men are dreamers. They see things in the soft haze of a spring day, or in the red fire of a long winter's evening."

Dreams come similarly to all of us, but most of us let them die at birth. We are not brave enough to pursue the visions our eyes have seen. Yet, while some of us let die before they have fully come to life these visions of something high and great and fine, "others nourish them and protect them, nurse them through bad days till they bring them to the sunshine and light which comes always to those who sincerely hope that their dreams will come true."

And so we say: remain true to the dream that lights your days. For who cherishes in his heart and lives in his every hour a vision of some thing, high and great and fine, treads a magic pathway with certainty through life and finds his life one that is rich in meanings and full of colors and melodic tones.

Do not be afraid to live your life as a search for a Holy Grail just because it is following an ideal which seems perhaps too distant ever perhaps to be reached. A hero or a coward in life—it is ours to choose. Surely, it is one of the glories of a man to know that it is in his power to live and to die for a vision of things to come, of a world to be.

Life has to be lived according to some dream—some vision. The vision that fills one's eyes gives that life its meaning and color and power. It is only the star caught in our eyes, it is only the dream we hold, that matters.

We share our dreams only with those most near to us. Persons with whom we share our dreams are indeed our friends, for a man's dream is his truth, his life. A person's truest and most real friend is the person with whom he shares the spiritual purpose of his life. Touch a man's dream and you have his secret, and you have solved the man.

True it is that dreams never die. We live on our dreams, and for them, and by them. And a dream, in all its distant airiness, is stronger than the blunt sharpness of life's realities. Our life is our attempt to live our dreams.

"Our life is woven wind." We weave all threads of various colors, together; and, through all, the pattern—our vision—we must keep. Remember: life can be a vision all the way through and, though winters come, springs come too, ever with fresher secrets to whisper to us.

BOOK REVIEWS

CHRISTIANS, AWAKE! by Rosamond Crompton. Pp. 262. Price, $2.50. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

A really helpful book of twenty-seven essays on what the Christian Church should and is able to give to men and women of today. The topics are of a wide variety, which make the book fresh and its message interesting. Such topics as "Conversion," "Growth," "Selfishness," "Temptation," "Obedience," "Doubt," "Leadership," "Choice," and so on, are discussed. They can be made the basis for a series of sermons. The book is full of quotations which show that the author has been in touch with many minds. The reader will be impressed with the author's rather alarming temper and open denunciation of other people's views in matters of faith as we read in Chapter XIV, page 123. And more than this, the writer seems to accept literally the old tradition of demonology and the Apostolic Succession. However, the book is a fine exposition of the doctrine of the Church from the conservative Anglo-Catholic point of view.

Why a Forward Movement?

By ARTHUR M. SHERMAN, S. T. D.

THE rector of one of the largest churches in the country has been in touch with the Forward Movement from its beginning. He is thoroughly informed concerning its purpose and the methods by which it seeks to accomplish that purpose. During the spring there were thirteen thousand of the Forward Movement leaflets distributed in his parish. He preached six sermons on the subjects emphasized in the Forward Movement literature. At the end he reported the Junior Warden wanted to know what the Forward Movement is.

If this could be the case under circumstances so favorable, there must be many in less privileged circumstances who beyond knowing that the Joint Commission on the Forward Movement was appointed at the last General Convention have vague ideas about it and its purpose. Every one of us who is praying that this Movement may be used of God to bring new power into His Church can help toward this end still further by clarifying our own thinking about it and enlisting others. Only as more and more communicants share in the idea of going forward will the Church go forward.

The following statement by a lay-member of the commission will help to a clearer understanding and perhaps show us our part in the task:

"Basically, the Church has called all of its Communicants, Bishops, Priests and Laymen, to rededicate themselves to Jesus Christ their Lord and Master in Discipleship."

As a result of such dedication we confidently expect the life of the Church to be revitalized and the work of the Church to be rehabilitated.

To obtain this, the

First objective sought is to secure a definite determination on the part of the Bshop that the whole organized corporate force of the Church in his diocese shall, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be directed to an untiring, unceasing effort to move forward.

The second objective is that each Priest shall determine that in his parish all the organized corporate force of the Parish shall, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be vitalized and determined to move forward.

The third objective is the definitizing of the task in each Parish so that—

1. Each rector shall visualize the task confronting him and adopt some definite methods of procedure, his own or others' for attacking it.

2. Every communicant shall be challenged with the implications of Discipleship and a sincere attempt made to secure acceptance of rededication of life to discipleship.

3. The continuance of discipleship without which the whole Forward Movement will be but another flash in the pan, followed by a distressing lag in vital Christian living.

4. By Conferences on Methods to be accepted and adopted to bring the whole force of the Parish to bear on the fundamental tasks.

a. To secure rededication of life of communicants as yet unreached until all have been personally contacted on the subject.

b. To revitalize all existing organizations of the Parish and clarify the view of the work to be done in the Parish and the methods to be employed.

c. To plan for the preaching of the Gospel to every reachable person in the pagan population of the Parish area in the sincere attempt to win lives for the Kingdom of God.

d. To assimilate all lives into some workable plan of Parish life and activity.

e. To bring about on the part of every individual and organization a realization that the ultimate purpose of the parish is to discover and carry out its share of the task of bringing nearer the Kingdom of Christ to the Whole World. This involves an appropriate program of education for every organization in the parish.

The Commission undertakes to do nothing of itself, but rather puts itself at the disposal of the Church to assist by counsel and endeavor to integrate all existing forces, both individual and of organized individuals, into a Move Forward. The Commission holds as its aim the bringing of all parishes in the Church to a realization that the parish is for the purpose of ministering to the world, with the rector as its leader, rather than a society to be ministered to by the rector, in their own individual needs.

This is being accomplished by conferences with Bishops, Priests, Vestries and officers of organizations and groups gathered by the regularly constituted responsible officers of dioceses, parishes and missions, and by cooperation with them.

The New Pamphlet.

A FALL leaflet is being prepared by the Forward Movement Commissions, following those entitled "Discipleship," "Disciples of the Living Christ" and "Follow On." The new series will bear the standing title, "Forward—Day by Day." The first issue for late Trinity season, October-November, will be ready on September 10, 1935. This will contain nine weeks' Bible Readings and Meditations—a page a day under the general theme, "His Witnesses"—(the missionary motif). There will be a sub-theme each week with study review each Saturday and reference to the Epistle and Gospel for the succeeding Sunday. The cost for each issue will be only two cents per copy, $1 for fifty copies, postpaid.

The Young People to Have a Vital Part.

INSPIRED by the action taken by the National Commission on Young People's Work, meeting in Chicago, endorsing and undertaking their part in the work of the Forward Movement, two young members have been appointed on the Forward Movement Commission, Pauline Lyons, Boston, and Goodwin Roberts, Chicago. In the resolution passed at the recent meeting of the Commission, appointing these two young members, recommendation was made for "similar inclusion of young people in the counsels and work of all parishes and dioceses."

The Forward Movement at Kanuga Conference.

THE Forward Movement was presented at the adult and clergy conferences, just completed at Kanuga Lake, Hendersonville, N. C., in special services, and in a number of the classes for adults and special ones for the clergy. Great interest was manifested in the class on Latin America, in preparation for the 1936 study course, in which sixty members were enrolled, and a resolution was passed by the members to take to the individual parishes represented the spirit of the Forward Movement, also to endeavor to increase the amount of money pledged toward the Challenge of this year. Twenty-one dioceses were represented at the Kanuga Conference, and 126 parishes. At the Auxiliary Day meeting, when the Forward Movement was again presented, one provincial president and nine diocesan presidents of the Woman's Auxiliary were present. The feeling in the conference was expressed in an editorial in the daily mimeographed conference paper as follows:

"See, when you go home, that the Forward Movement has been brought to your parish and diocese. See that the booklets have been distributed, encourage them being read, talk to your rector, officers of various organizations, go to district meetings and diocesan conventions, work and pray that this wonderful spirit may be spread.

"Let the end of the Kanuga Conferences be the beginning of the Forward Movement wherever you may go."

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

HERE AND THERE.

South Australia.

A Bush Brother, the Rev. D. I. Anthony, writes from the Diocese of Willochra in South Australia. (The Bush Brotherhood is a band of young English clergy ministering to the people who are scattered far and wide over the Australian hinterland.) Mr. Anthony's residence is officially at Quorn, but he is not always there. Quorn has a population of 900, and is a delightful place in the foothills and even has trees which make up for the treeless and waterless miles of the plains.

Besides Quorn, Mr. Anthony cares for six churches fifty miles away in the Bush, and visits all the stations within a hundred square miles—sheep stations, not mission stations. This is sheep country with ranches thouands of acres in extent. The land is so barren that when a newcomer asks what the sheep can possibly live on, he is told that they lick the sunshine off the stones. "The distances are tremendous and the roads simply terrible. . . . This is the work that I came out to do and I enjoy it."

North China.

"So many of our communicants are neither quick nor dead," writes an English missionary in North China. This was apropos of a "short-term school". the mission was about to hold for the first time, having admired the success of the short-term schools held by American missionaries in the District of Shanghai. The new one in North China started under most discouraging circumstances and at once turned into a great success. Teachers and students together numbered 35. The students ranged in age from 14 to 62, including many mothers with babies. The whole affair is like a two-weeks' "summer conference," a period of intensive study, worship and recreation, all simple and informal. It would not mean much in an American parish or diocese, but in China where Christian background and fellowship are so scarce, it means a new lease on life for many who attend.

China.

The Shanghai Newsletter has completed twenty years of publication. It and its two sisters, the Hankow and Anking Newsletters, published from their respective bishops' offices, continue to supply detailed first-hand information, personal stories and comment on current life in China of keen interest and value to anyone who cares about the Church's mission there.

Philippine Islands.

In spite of increased fees this year, Easter School for Igorot boys and girls, at Baguio, in the Philippine Islands, turned away about twenty children for lack of room when the school opened for its thirtieth year in June. Some of the children turned away live too far from any public school for attendance there. Easter School has started a waiting-list for 1936-37. The Rev. R. F. Wilner is head of the school.

Canada.

Vancouver has a new church for its Japanese mission, the Church of the Ascension, standing in the midst of a strong Buddhist center. The new building is said to be the first Anglican Church built outside Japan almost entirely by Japanese money and labor.

West Africa.

In one of his remoter jungle villages, the Bishop of Accra, West Africa, was about to dedicate a new church (built of dried mud, plastered and shining with whitewash and roofed with sheets of iron that had been carried many a mile on Christian heads), a really imposing building, crowded for the occasion.

"We shall now go in procession to the door and dedicate the holy font," announced the Bishop. An awkward pause, some excited whispers, and the native priest said, "Your Lordship, someone has thiefed the font!" It was a new enamelled basin. A hasty search through the village ended at the mission house, where it was discovered that the Bishop's boy had all innocently annexed the font for the Bishop's bath. It was returned to its place and the Bishop said calmly, "Let the dedication proceed."

Announcements from St. Clement's Church, Honolulu, on a recent Sunday included: Sermon Topic, "Such As I Have." Offertory solo, "It Is Enough."

FROM THE INSIDE.

"Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, July 2, 1935.

Speaking of slaves, I note that Mr. Mussolini is ranting about the terrible slavery conditions existing here, complaining of border raids, the uncivilized state of the country generally, etc. "Blah," all of it. Slavery does exist, but it is of the most benevolent kind, a man treats his vassals exactly as he does his children; slavery has been officially abolished and is by degrees being terminated; thank goodness, not as it was in your own Southland. If all the slaves in this land were turned loose at one time we would see trouble.

As to the "uncivilized" conditions existing here, I rather think they are preferable to the conditions existing in Europe and America. The people live as they did two thousand years ago; their wants are few and simple and they are by far more happy than the majority of your countrymen. He also rants about the inefficiency of the Ethiopian Government, which is all "bosh". The government is ideal for this country and is now justly, efficiently administered. The atmosphere remains decidedly tense here in Addis Ababa. The majority of the foreign advisers to the Ethiopian Government have sent wives and children away. I feel, so long as the Emperor remains on the throne and his Government exists, we are perfectly safe, but should the Italians succeed in unseating him (much underhand work is being done to that end), almost anything might happen. All forengners have their "wind up." I should hate to see the American Legation removed. It would be a blow to the Ethiopian Government and they need that confidence now. I am mean enough to chuckle over England's and France's nervousness just now. In the beginning they did everything they could to force Ethiopia to allow Italy to walk on its neck, even made dire threats. Now that Hitler has thrown down the gauntlet, their tune is different, but I fear their change of heart has come too late. Italy has gone too far to withdraw, unless Mussolini wants to stand for serious criticism in his own country. Italy has told the whole world to keep hands off and undoubtedly its orders will be obeyed. I have to laugh at Mussolini's tirade about slavery, when slavery exists in every one of Italy's African colonies. It is indeed a case of "pot calling the kettle black." And as for the border disorders, Italy is entirely to blame for the Walwal incident, for which she claims indemnity, as British and French observers have hitherto testified.

Grace House-on-the-Mountain.

Some years ago a Mission was established in Wise County, Southwestern Virginia, now Bishop R. C. Jett's Diocese, not far from the present Grace House-on-the-Mountain; here lived and worked devoted Christian women whose lives were consecrated to service among the people scattered through the rugged mountains of this section. About fifteen years ago the Mission was moved to the beautiful location where Grace House now stands, on a mountain top nearly 3,000 feet above sea level.

Here the Mission Chapel raises its cross to the glory of God, a symbol of that love which came to seek and to save that which was lost, to comfort and help those who labor and are heavy laden, to raise up those who fall, to enable the weak-hearted and to resist the temptations that so easily beset them.

From the shadow of its cross have gone out to those in need, not only help and comfort, but clothing, religious literature, instruction, and assistance of every kind. Every Sunday there is Church School, a song service, the beautiful ritual of the Church and an address by Captain G. F. Wiese, of the Church Army, who, with his wife, an experienced Social Worker, lives at the Mission and carries on the work, holding weekly services at different homes, conducting farm meetings where problems of rural life are discussed and better methods of cultivation are explained.

Mrs. Wiese conducts the Girls' Friendly Society, several clubs, numbering from twenty-five to thirty; she instructs, advises, visits and distributes literature and clothing generously supplied by many branches of the Woman's Auxiliary. Bright girls are given opportunities for future usefulness, and encouraged in every way.

Families are large, averaging from ten to twelve; life is as hard as the rocky soil from which the farmers must wrest a living for his large family, or walk five to seven miles to the nearest mines to get work. The mother, while bearing many children, must do all the house work with no modern conveniences, running water or electric lights, and, besides, must work with her man and older children in the fields, that the crops may mature before the early frosts. Child labor? Yes, but thank God, it does not hurt these rosy, healthy youngsters, for they are out in the sunshine and God's out of doors with their parents; I never saw handsomer, healthier children anywhere.

The Mission stands for all that is best in the community, verily a light set upon a hill to shine into the deep isolation of these rugged hills and valleys. Seven miles from the nearest doctor, or telephone, and as many miles from the several points where Captain Wiese conducts services. The Mission does not boast an automobile, so he is oftenest obliged to walk these weary miles to and from his appointments. Seven miles from a doctor or a telephone, no auto, or any means of transportation and well-nigh impassable roads.

The winters are long and bitterly cold, the snow clouds perch upon the mountain-tops and block the road; colds and grippe are prevalent, help is sought at the Mission in lieu of a doctor, and Captain Wiese goes at all hours and in all weathers. There are other Missions doing the same good work in these mountains, but none as isolated as Grace House, to which I came as a substitute, May 1; while Mrs. Wiese took a much-needed vacation. The first in two years.

Once a month the Rev. John Winslow administers Communion and holds services at Grace House. Before closing, let me mention the splendid work being carried on by Miss Mabel R. Mansfield at this and other Missions by industrial training in wood carving, weaving, fine needle-work, and other crafts in which the mountain people excell. For the articles made by her classes she secures purchasers, mostly among the Gift Shops and summer visitors and resorts.

From Death Unto Life.

Sathemma, a young woman, was living happily in a little village. Her happiness did not last long, for perforating ulcers of leprosy broke out in her feet.

First, her husband, who really loved her, was made by his parents to leave her. Then she was mercilessly driven away by her own people. The fear of this dread disease overcame even the love of her mother and she said, "You are now a cursed woman with a cursed disease. Go somewhere and die."

So she wandered far from home, went to a holy temple, prayed to a goddess, and bathed in the sacred waters of the Godaveri, during the great twelve-year festival, Pushkaralu. Her wanderings made her condition worse. She had nothing to eat and none to care for her. The few clothes she had were tattered to pieces. She was now almost crawling on the ground, for her strength failed her. She had given up all hopes and only wished for death.

It was at that time that some news from somewhere threw a little light on her desperate life. She heard of a place where a doctor and a lady missionary were caring for people like her. At once she started on her journey. She dragged herself along the roads without food and without sleep, but now with great hope. Words are inadequate to express my feelings on seeing her thus crawling on the ground with only a few rags sticking to her ulcers. A skeleton of skin and bones!

I thought it was a hopeless case. But do you think that Sathemma had given up hope? No; when she was taken to the women's wards she saw many like her, but their faces were radiant. She wondered what the reason was. She soon became happy and realized that it was due to the sympathy and love shown to them. One could imagine her feelings of gratitude when she saw before her a plateful of rice and curry after many a day of starvation. She compared her present life with that of her past dreadful and helpless wanderings. She was touched by the singing in the morning worship. Her inexpressible gratitude urged her to love God Whom the others worshipped. Her face showed the fullness of her heart. In a short time she was miraculously changed; she went home to see her little daughter and to show her people the change in her heart and to tell of her new experiences. There she was a great surprise. She found them preparing for her death ceremony, as they had not heard from her for many months. She returned to the Home and made confession of her own newly-found faith. She who first sought help is now a great friend to many and a good helper. It was through trials and great sufferings that Sathemma was led to seek the living God, her Heavenly Father.

AVIATION.

Aviation in China has made great progress in the past six years. Figures in The Living Age, comparing the year 1929 with the first nine months of 1934, show kilometres flown, an increase from 93,167 to 989,869; number of passengers increased from 354 to 3,334. The China National Aviation Corporation showed a slight profit in 1934; Pan-American Airways controls 45 per cent of its stock. French and English companies are developing lines from Indo-China and Singapore, and a German-Russian company links China to the Soviet air network.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S FELLOWSHIP SERVICE LEAGUE

The Reverend Randolph F. Blackford

The First Americans

(A Missionary Program.)

To many people the word Indian represents as definite a picture as if we spoke of a Norwegian or a Greek. But in reality the word Indian is as vague a term as the name "White Man." It simply means a man whose ancestors lived in the Western Hemisphere before the coming of the white man and does not include the Esquimaux. There are more than two hundred different kinds or tribes of Indians in the United States, and our Church does work among more than twenty of them.

To give an idea of the different kinds of Indians and the many ways they lived, we will mention that in Arizona there are, first, the cliff-dwellers; second, those who live in two-story houses or pueblos, and third, those who live in hogans, or houses built of turf. Then we have the Shoshone tribes, who are much like the Hindoos in their customs, and the buffalo-hunting Indian of the plains, like the Dakotas, who live in tents. Some Indians are tall and thick-set. Others are tall and slender. Others are short and stocky; then there are tribes that are almost giants and others almost dwarfs.

Of course our schools books are written by the white man, and so we read of a battle in which the white men were victorious after brave fighting. The Indian method of warfare was to surprise, if possible, and they often took no prisoners, so wherever the Indians would claim a victory we often called it a massacre, though often the white men took few prisoners also.

Viewing the matter thus, we see the Indian fighting a losing fight for his homeland, until finally his whole country was taken from him. Among the last to be conquered were the Seminoles of Florida, if they can be said to be conquered now. Much depends upon one's viewpoint, as is illustrated by what men say of these Seminoles. The name means "outlaw", and they were made up of Indians who refused to accept subjection to the white man and fled to the Everglades to escape him. If we sympathize with them, we say they were much like the Welch, or Britons, who escaped the dominion of the Saxons by fleeing to the mountains of Wales, where they could not be reached, and so won freedom. But if we are not in sympathy with them we say that they were made up of people driven from other tribes who would not keep the laws of the red man or of the white. Probably the truth lies somewhere between these two extreme views.

The Indian is generally supposed to be a solemn, grunting individual, who has a few virtues and many vices and whose only joy was in the torturing of his enemies. Now, it is true that Indians did torture prisoners, but is the White man's past entirely free from this as a recreation? Did not vast hordes assemble to see the auto da fes of Spain, when Protestants were done to death, and lest we be too self-satisfied, were the burnings at the stake and public executions in England always completely solitary affairs?

Even as late as 1865 a huge group of morbid people hung about the prison hoping to see the death struggles of those being hung for the murder of President Lincoln. No, the White Man has often liked to see tortures, as can be proven if anyone notes the crowds that attend those disgraces to American civilization, lynchings, and by the way people try to see electrocutions and the space given them in our daily newspapers.

Then, as far as the silence of the Indian is concerned, if we were put into the midst of a group of people whose language we understood most imperfectly and who rather looked down upon us, would we White Americans be especially talkative. We do not think we would, yet that is exactly why the Indian has the reputation of being so silent. But, if the Indians really get to know you and trust you, they will be chatting and laughing together in your presence almost as much as Southern Europeans, like the Italians.

When we come to the subject of the Indian having no humor, it is about the same thing as the following story will show:

Waukansika is the figure in Dakota mythology, who takes the part of the comedian, much as the Devil did in the Mystery plays of the middle ages, and in many jokes today, and so is quite popular. The story goes that once a very wonderful girl was born who began to talk the day of her birth. When a few days old she was talking all day long, so she was named "She-Talk-All-Time." She grew up to be a very wonderful woman (and here the old Indian who would tell the story would have his eyes twinkle), for she always told the truth.

One day when she was about one hundred and twenty years old she began to talk about the future life so beautifully that many men and women began to commit suicide so as to go there, so Waukansika and Friend, Waukansika's intimate companion, decided to see what what could be done about it. Friend suggested she be given a Red Lodge treatment which was done by putting her in a teepee and pouring water over red-hot stones. But when three days were up she was seen to be changed into an alligator, all except her mouth, and she was still talking, so Friend asked Waukansika why her mouth could not be changed and received the answer, "Don't you know that not even Great Spirit himself can change a woman's mouth, or stop her from talking?"

Our Church's work among the Indians began at Jamestown soon after 1607, for we remember that the Indian princess, Pocahontas, became a Christian and married a white man. Another interesting item of early Church history concerns the Rev. Eleazer Williams, who was found among the Oneida Indians in New York, when our Church opened work among them in the early days of the last century. Mr. Williams was ordained a clergyman of our Church and later went with the Oneidas when they were sent by the government from New York to Wisconsin. But the interest-thing is that he considered himself to be Louis the Seventeenth, the son of Louis the Sixteenth, King of France, who was beheaded in the French Revolution.

Today the Episcopal Church has missionary work among a number of states. In some of these, like North Carolina and Virginia, the work is carried on entirely by the dioceses, with no help from the National Church, or from the red side of our church envelopes. The difference between a Diocese and a Missionary District is that the diocese pays its own Bishop's salary and other operating expenses, which a missionary district is not strong enough to pay for itself.

The dioceses receiving help are the two dioceses in Minnesota, Fond du Lac, in Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Sacramento in California. The missionary districts are Arizona, Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

The work is, of course, much complicated by the different languages the Indians speak, each tribe having its own language, that are as different from each other as French and German.

Many interesting stories are told of the earnestness of the Indians who became interested in Christianity. They lay great stress on fasting as a preliminary to great events in life. Thus, one by the name of Rising Sun became convinced that he should be a Christian, so he walked from Turtle Mountains in North Dakota, to Fargo, a distance of more than a hundred miles, fasting all the way, to ask Bishop Mann to baptize him, not knowing of any minister nearer to him than Fargo. On another occasion an Indian named Paul Yellow-Bear, who was lay reader, was compelled to move from his home by threats of his neighbors, who were desirous of going back to heathenism; so Paul tore down his log-house and floated it log by log across the Missouri River and set it up there. Then he came back and moved the church over in the same way and started service there with no one but his own family attending. By and by others came in from the heathen thereabouts and presently a strong mission grew up. These instances were in North Dakota. But similar ones could be told of practically every field where we have work.

In South Dakota the Church's work is much stronger than in North Dakota. Indeed, we have a greater proportion of communicants to total population in the Dakota Indians than in any state of white communicants, more than half the people there being members of our Communion.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

"THE RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CONNECTICUT TERCENTENARY."

By Rev. Oscar E. Maurer, D. D., Chairman of the Committee on Religious Observance for the Connecticut Tercentenary Commission.

The Connecticut Sabbath, October 5-6, 1935, which will usher in the concluding week of the Connecticut Tercentenary Celebration, is of more than state-wide significance. It might well be emulated by the churches throughout the nation, to remind the citizens of the spiritual basis of the commonwealth organized by the founders of New England. Like Massachusetts, Connecticut was a colony whose design was religion. It has rightly been called an ecclesiastical commonwealth. The three vines which embellish the seal of the state, represent churches as well as towns. The famous Fundamental Orders, which mark the beginning of constitutional government in America, are a reverent recognition of the spiritual basis of the state. The same year they were adopted by the river towns constituting the colony of Connecticut, John Davenport, spiritual leader of New Haven Colony, issued his treatise on "Government in a Plantation whose Design is Religion." Thomas Hooker and John Davenport differed in their views as to the relations of State and Church, but beneath those differences was the common agreement that religion and the religious institution were indispensable factors in an orderly commonwealth. New towns could not be organized until the inhabitants satisfied the General Court of their ability to form a church and support a godly and learned minister. Long before the Revolutionary War, white steepled meeting houses, which still inspire and delight the travelers, were already a characteristic feature of the Connecticut countryside.

Another characteristic which reveals the influence of religion upon Connecticut civic life, is the number of towns which bear Biblical names—Bethany, Bethel, Bethlehem, Bozrah, Canaan, Goshen, Hebron, Lebanon, Salem and Sharon. Less direct, perhaps, but still significant, are the towns named after English cathedral cities—Bristol, Canterbury, Chester, Glastonbury, Litchfield, Norwich, Oxford, Salisbury and Winchester. Thus did reverence for the land of the Bible, and their own native country, commingle in the pious minds of the fathers.

Candor compels the admission that these founders, themselves the victims of religious intolerance, were intolerant in turn to any who differed with the reverend elders in doctrine or discipline. But the principles which they had set free were too powerful to be held back. The new life here was set in a stream of freedom, the irresistible flow of which was bound to wear down the hardest barriers. For many years only one church order, the Congregational, was recognized, and any person who openly differed with its doctrine or refused to attend its services, or failed to pay taxes to its support, even though it be so exalted a personage as Mistress Eaton, wife of the governor of New Haven colony, was subject to severe penalty. But by 1708 there began to be a change and an Act of Toleration was passed, permitting citizens to organize separate churches, although they were still taxed for the support of the town church. In 1784, the law was broadened so that church taxes could be applied to whatever church the tax payer might designate, but he had to support some church. But it was inevitable that the principles of Thomas Hooker should finally prevail, and in 1818, with adoption of the new constitution, every restriction was removed forever assuring freedom of conscience and individual right of worship. Such an outcome would have been unthinkable to the grave and reverent seniors of early Connecticut. It seemed the end of constituted religion to many in 1818. In fact, however, it was the flowering of the seed of liberty planted when Pilgrims and Puritans landed upon the shores of New England, and with the opening of that blossom religion in Connecticut entered upon a new day of freedom and vitality.

The religious spirit demands self-expression. It weakens when it cannot find outlet. As early as 1789, the Congregational churches formed the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to follow the stream of emigration into Vermont and York states, and sent its missionaries as far west as central Pennsylvania, Fort Detroit, and the Western Reserve. Some of them helped organize western states, writing their constitutions and helping set up their public school systems. In 1810 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was organized in Farmington to send missionaries into non-Christian lands. These instances happen to represent the activity of one branch of the Church. It would be difficult to find any branch represented in the state which has not done similar work. A list of the names of Connecticut men and women whose faith and spiritual achievements have blessed the world reads like the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. To name only a few, there is Jonathan Edwards, philosopher, theologian, evangelist, missionary to the Indians, early president of the college of New Jersey, one of the premier minds of America for sheer intellectual power. There is Horace Bushnell, whose volume of Christian Nurture changed the entire attitude and method of religious education. There is Leonard Bacon, whose lectures against slavery fortified the convictions of Presidnt Lincoln. A Litchfield county woman, Harriet Beecher Stowe, was at a communion service in the little church of which her husband was pastor. As she sat in meditation she had a vision and the fruit of that vision was Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The religious spirit has also expressed itself in such outstanding educational institutions as Yale, Trinity and Wesleyan, all of which were directly founded by the churches. The purpose of Yale, as stated in her charter, is to fit men for service in church and civil state and this purpose has been carried out by the other colleges as well. The splendid structure of social welfare agencies which grace the state is the direct outgrowth of the religious spirit and was founded and nurtured by the church. If intolerance once marred the face of our spiritual life, it can be claimed that mutual good will now adorns it. Protestant and Catholic and Jew, clerics and laymen, are working together in harmony and with mutual appreciation. No one with a fair regard for history will deny that the noblest things that characterize Connecticut are the fruits of her religious heritage.

It is fitting, therefore, that the Tercentenary Commission should plan as a part of its program, a Connecticut Sabbath, on October 5 and 6, on which a service will be held in every church and synagogue in the state, to commemorate the three hundred years of Connecticut's history and to remind the people of the present generation of their spiritual heritage. The Commission invites the churches and synagogues of the nation, and especially in those communities which were established by Connecticut people and which bear Connecticut names, to hold a similar service on this occasion or at such time as they find desirable and to thus honor these early Christian men and women. The essential and enduring things in America's future, as in America's past, are spiritual.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS.

The Presiding Bishop has called the regular Annual Meeting of the House of Bishops to convene in Houston, Texas, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, November 5, 6 and 7, next. The following agenda is announced.

1. Action upon the resignation of the Bishop of Newark.
2. Action upon the resignation of the Bishop of North Tokyo.
3. Action upon the vacancy in the Missionary Bishopric of Idaho.
4. Report of special committee on the Missionary Program of the Church.
5. Reports of other special committees.
6. The transaction of any other business that may be lawfully presented at such session.

No recent meeting of the House of Bishops has had before it so wide a range of missionary problems. Bishop McKim proffered his resignation at Atlantic City, the House of Bishops at that time declining to accept since many critical issues in the East and in Japan especially seemed to demand that this great veteran should remain at the post he has graced for nearly half a century. Bishop McKim, pleading the infirmities of age, now insists that he be relieved. In the meantime the death of Dr. Rudolf B. Teusler, long the head of St. Luke's International Hospital in Tokyo, thrusts other problems than the Episcopate into this situation. Policies affecting the present operation, the future security of this great establishment, must be determined. The Rt. Rev. Norman S. Binsted, D. D., Bishop of Tohoku, now serving as Chaplain of the Hospital and temporarily its director, will visit the United States to attend this meeting of the House of Bishops to take part in the very significant discussions which will center about the Japan field.

The translation of the Rt. Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell, D. D., from the Missionary District of Idaho to the Diocese of Georgia, brought to the fore the oft-repeated suggestion that certain consolidations be effected among our missionary jurisdictions. In the meantime Churchmen of Idaho urge the continuance of the present District boundaries for which the leadership of the Eighth Province has commended a nominee in sympathy with their point of view. The National Council voicing still another judgment, has asked the House of Bishops to defer action until the meeting of General Convention at Cincinnati in 1937.

Affecting the whole missionary enterprise of the Church will be the report of a special committee, headed by the Bishop of Colorado, named at Atlantic City.

The House will be the guests of the Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, D. D., and the Diocese of Texas.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF THE AIR.

The Episcopal Church of the Air for the current season will be inaugurated on Sunday, September 1, at ten A. M.

Eastern Daylight Saving Time, by Mr. Spencer Miller, Jr., advisor to the Department of Christian Social Service of the National Council. Mr. Miller's address will be appropriate to "Labor Sunday", and will reflect his recent experience at Geneva, Switzerland, as technical advisor to the American delegation in the International Labor Conference held in that city.

Mr. Miller, in two earlier years, has voiced the social consciousness of the Church in the Episcopal Church of the Air in addresses which have attracted nation-wide attention. He will be assisted in the service by the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs, D. D., Director of the Church of the Air, which, for the fifth year, is being conducted under the auspices of the Department of Publicity of the National Council.

Following the inaugural broadcast on Labor Sunday there will be seven others at intervals. Five of these have been preferred by the Department of Publicity to the Commission on the Forward Movement and Distinguished speakers on these occasions will have opportunity to challenge the whole Church over nation-wide hook-ups. The schedule dates are October 20, 1933, and March 8, April 26, July 5 and August 16 of 1936.

Two memorable broadcasts in the series will occur on December 8 and 29 next. On the former date the Archbishop of York will deliver an address over the Columbia System from Washington, D. C., at ten A. M., Eastern Standard Time, preceding the great service of welcome, the Presiding Bishop officiating, which will take place in the National Cathedral in Washington at eleven o'clock of the same morning.

The Presiding Bishop for a number of years has delivered over the Church of the Air a national Christmastide message. This year, on Sunday, December 29th, the Presiding Bishop will greet the New Year with a message of timely significance to the whole American people.

VAST AUDIENCE SINGS FOR KING GEORGE.

A pleasing incident occurred in London at the Royal Albert Hall when a vast audience, at the king's request, sang Blake's "Jerusalem" set to Parry's music. "The king makes the special request," it was announced, "that at the end of the concert the entire audience will sing 'Jerusalem'," which includes the familiar lines:

"I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land."

This is better than any war cry or song exalting the material glories of England, and sets up an ideal that is worthy of a great people and a good king.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

Things began to take more definite shape for the Youth Forward Together Movement of the Episcopal Church at the Executive Committee meeting held on Saturday, August 3.

As was stated in a recent article, this Executive Committee is composed of five members from the National Commission and is the group responsible for seeing that things go forward in a real way.

The first thing the Committee did was to dig into the returns on the questionnaire which had been sent out to summer conference groups throughout the country. This questionnaire asked young people to indicate what things they were interested in and wanted to know more about. Replies to this questionnaire are to be used as the basis in determining the literature to be published during the coming year.

It was interesting to note from the returns received—all have not come in yet—that the three interests checked the most number of times were:

1. How to develop my own personal devotional life.
2. Knowledge of the Christian religion.
3. Developing a Christian philosophy of life—interpreted in young people's terms—help in developing the right attitude toward life and its difficulties.

Other interests that rated high were: Relations between parents and young people; the need to gain self-confidence; understanding more about the claims of Socialism, Communism, and Fascism, and the Christian answer to them; ability to meet all situations with poise; relations between boys and girls; and peace.

The Executive Committee took action to the effect that they would endeavor to have material on the first three mentioned subjects for the coming year, and would also discover what materials are available on these subjects to be recommended as supplementary material.

No sooner said than done. This Committee does not mean to let grass grow under its feet. Already an author has been invited to write a discussion course on "A Christian Philosophy of Life" with the hope that it will be ready in the early fall.

The National Commission of Young People at its meeting in Chicago asked the Forward Movement Commission if they would publish two pieces of literature which would help in developing the Youth Forward Together Movement. The two discussion courses requested were "Fundamental Christian Beliefs" and "Discipleship," these courses to be especially designed for young people.

A leaflet describing the Youth Forward Together Movement giving specific suggestions as to how groups and individuals can cooperate, is in preparation. It should be ready in the fall.

From Minnesota to Florida and from Maine to California come echoes of young people's groups who are committing themselves to the Forward Movement. It is hoped that all young people in the Church, whether members of the Young People's Fellowship, Service League, Girls' Friendly Society, Brotherhood, or any other group, will join in this Youth Forward Together Movement.

DR. KELLER'S METHOD.

The parsons play baseball with the prisoners at the workhouse this afternoon, and the thief may strike out one who will be a Bishop in the Episcopal Church some day.

Consorting in this way with sinners is part of the education of these parsons who must learn that people are not only those who wear silk hats to church on Sunday.

How it happens that these young men, who are dedicated to God, are mixing thus with sinful men has to do with an idea that Dr. William S. Keller, of Glendale, had thirteen years ago, and has been following up unto this day.

Eyes On the Earth.

Dr. Keller is a physician who has put his hand into the business of preachers. He thought ministers' eyes ought to be less on heaven and more on the earth. There seemed so much to do on the earth: People were falling into evil destinies by no fault of their own; the next generation of criminals was growing up in the miasma of slums; infants were falling off like flies, for no reason but the poverty of their parents.

But ministers' eyes were in the clouds and they were troubling themselves with the salvation of dues-paying members and preparing a good place in heaven for them; though they had heaven enough on the earth already.

All this was on the conscience of Dr. Keller.

Ways of the People.

He thought that ministers ought to be caught young and taught to direct their eyes horizontally instead of vertically to heaven.

In their youth ministers' noses were put into books on theology and when they grew up they knew all about the nature of God (in accordance with their theologies), but very little about people, except pew-owners.

They did not know the child in the slums, or the man helpless in the grip of evil heredity, or the boy being fashioned in the image of his environment. Dr. Keller made up his mind that whatever ministers he could catch young would be taught to know people, to feel the pain of the disinherited, to flame with desire to do something about all this.

Learning Feel of Pain.

Thirteen years ago he began going about to catch young students for the ministry in Episcopal seminaries, to bring them to Cincinnati for two months in the summer, to put them to work in the prisons, in the hospitals, in the slums, in the charities.

They go with case-workers to the tenement houses, they consort with the prisoners in the jails, they look after the social ills of the sick in the hospitals.

A few years ago two of them were arrested for taking up with the pickets in a strike of clothing workers, carrying banners. It is to be guessed that Dr. Keller was not in the least embarrassed by this. The boys were learning! They were learning to feel the pain of common men; this trouble of the strikers was also their burden, and they took it up.

The Best Selected.

In every summer of the thirteen years Dr. Keller has brought some twenty of these students for the ministry to Cincinnati for this work of learning that there is a sad world outside their books. He goes about from seminary to seminary hunting young men who seem to have prophetic fire; he takes the best of them.

This summer he has twenty-two of them. They work every day in the social agencies and attend lectures three nights a week. Playing baseball with the prisoners today is part of the course by which they learn that ministers do not sprout wings, but are human beings, equal partners in the common life.

The parsons' team is as follows: David Thornberry, Dayton, p.; Shirley Goodwin, Boston, c.; I. N. P. Skinner, Atlanta, 1b.; Winford Langhorst, Buffalo, 2b.; Angus Cameron, St. John, ss.; Edward Tate, Kansas City, 3b.; Charles Kean, Providence, R. I., rf.; Clyde Jardine, Atlanta, cf.; Glen Lewis, Cleveland, lf.; extra players, Leonard Flisher, Waterbury, Conn., and Stanley E. Ashton, Boise, Idaho . . . A. S.—The Cincinnati Post.

The "Challenge."

The second issue of the "Challenge," the official organ of the Young People's Service League of the Diocese of Atlanta, is being published in August by the Y. P. S. L. of Incarnation, Atlanta.

Warrick Elrod, president, will be the Associate Editor this month. Bob Bandy, the diocesan president, is editor-in-chief.

The first edition was received with enthusiasm. Each of the Leagues is competing for the prize to be given at the annual convention for the best issue published during the year.

Camp De Wolf Perry.

Camp De Wolf Perry, a Junior Camp for boys from nine through thirteen, ended a most successful season this year. Forty-one boys were present, being the largest enrollment the camp has had. The Rev. and Mrs. Woolsey E. Couch of St. John's Church, College Park, assisted by the Rev. C. W. Wilcox, Miss Ruth Sisson and Mr. Edward Simms, operated the camp at Toccoa Falls, Ga.

A benefit golf tournament will be sponsored by the Bishop's Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary during the month of September.

The qualifying will extend through the first two weeks of the month, and the decisive matches will be played the last two weeks.

Prizes or trophies, consisting of golf bags, balls, sticks, cups and other golf supplies are being given by the Atlanta merchants.

Flights are being made up of some of Atlanta's best golfers. The match will be held on the John White Golf Course, being one of the prettiest and according to some, one of the most difficult of the courses under the supervision of the Park Commission. R. M. Hubert, Pro at the Course, is assisting the Bishop's Branch in promoting this tournament.

The Bishop's Branch is composed of young women whose membership is in various Atlanta Churches. In addition to the regular activities of all Auxiliaries, they sponsor a girl at the Appleton Church Home, sending clothing and spending money, and also give the Bishop monthly checks toward the Negro work of the diocese, and contribute towards the charitable work of the city. The proceeds from this tournament will be used for social service work.

Miss Carolyn Nicolson, president, and Miss Emily Warren, vice-president, are co-chairmen of the tournament.

A Visit to the Cathedral.

In June about forty of the teachers and scholars of Christ Church Sunday School made a pilgrimage to the Washington Cathedral, and upon their return the superintendent requested that they write an account of their visit, telling how they were impressed with that visit.

Attached is copy of one of the letters written by a girl about fourteen years of age, which I thought might be of interest to the readers of your paper.

Very truly yours,
John W. Herndon,
Superintendent, Christ Church Sunday School, Alexandria, Va.

On Sunday, June 16, 1935, I went to Washington to St. Albans Cathedral. I assure you it was one of the best trips I have ever taken. The Cathedral contains eight chapels. The whole church was and is being built by donations. I hope to see the day when this mammoth structure is complete.

Most interesting to me was the Chapel of Joseph of Arimathera. You see, there are five chapels on the main floor and of those five, I like the Children's Chapel best. On the ground floor, or crypts, are three chapels representing the Birth, Death and Resurrection of Christ. As you can probably guess, the Chapel of Joseph of Arimathea represents the death of Christ. You remember that Jesus was buried in the tomb given by that man. What interests me in this chapel are the four massive pillars in the corners of the room and also the fact that the chapel is in the very center of the church. I also ilked the entrance to this room. Most people are struck with the strength and simplicity of the architecture when they enter the chapel.

I hope you, too, will be able to visit this lovely Cathedral, for it is an example of Gothic architecture as found in Europe. When you do, I hope you will look especially at the Chapel of Joseph of Arimathea and see if I am not right.

Sincerely, your cousin,
(Signed) Jacquelyn Vincent.

"Isolated Churchfolk."

The Committee appointed from the St. James' Church School, the Auxiliary and the Vestry will meet this Thursday night at 7:30 o'clock at the rectory to confer with regard to the problem of the "Isolated Churchfolk." This is a very important matter, as thousands of our confirmed members, and their children, living at greater or less distances from places where the services of the Church are held, have in the past been lost to the Church, and have either gone in with other Christian bodies or are living lonely, isolated lives, many of whom, it may be, are thinking themselves "forgotten," though, perhaps, they are as blameable—"forgetting," or not attempting to get in touch with the church or chapel nearest them. What will we do about it?

Mt. Olivet Guild.

This Guild met last Thursday afternoon at the new and attractive home of Mrs. Oscar Schadel, Mrs. Schadel and Mrs. R. C. Peddy as co-hostesses. There was a goodly attendance present, and after the devotional service conducted by the rector, the routine business of the Guild was completed. The work of supplying the increased choir with vestments and caps was discussed and steps taken to secure them. It was decided to give the Church School a picnic this coming Wednesday, with further arrangements to be made after Church School today. At the conclusion of the meeting delicious refreshments were enjoyed by all present. The next meeting will be on the first Thursday of September. The Guild is prepared to do quilting for those desirous of having same done. Communicate with Mrs. J. T. Twilley, President, 2572—R.

Summer Work in the Church.

During the first six months of 1935, ending June 26, 8,415 persons attended the 101 services at St. Mark's Church, Louisville. Of these services, 54 were celebrations of the Holy Communion, with 2,180 communicants. The Rev. William H. Langley, Jr., and Mrs. Langley spent the month of July visiting friends in Virginia and Maryland and vacationing in Newport, Rhode Island. During the Rev. Mr. Langley's absence, the services were in charge of lay-readers of the congregation.

Dr. Milton A. Barber Resigns Ministry.

It was with extreme reluctance and regret that the vestry of Christ Church, Raleigh, accepted the resignation of Dr. Milton Augustus Barber, for more than twenty-eight years rector of the old and historic parish. The action was taken at a meeting held Monday night, at which time Dr. Barber was made rector emeritus of the church and voted a special honorarium. A committee was appointed to communicate with him today at Brevard, telling him of the extreme sorrow of the congregation and of his many friends here at the necessity for such a step.

Dr. Barber himself and many of his friends and parishioners had hoped that he would recover sufficiently from the illness which had its inception last March to enable him to resume at least part of his duties as rector, and it was his wish to die if need be in the service of the church he had served for so long and which was his life, but his family and his physicians have insisted that to go back to the active rectorship of so large a parish carrying such heavy burdens and responsibilities would be beyond his strength and fatal to his recovery. His resignation is to take effect September 1.

Predicts Bright Future.

A prediction that many charitable institutions will pass into public hands and that the Church and charitable organizations generally will receive less in the way of gifts and contributions, if legislation now pending in Washington is passed, was made by Mr. Harper Sibley, prominent Churchman and president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, speaking Tuesday night (August 6), before a group of Church Club men at the Lake Shore Athletic Club.

The great need of the hour, said Mr. Sibley, is for the display of Christian character in both business and politics.

"In the final analysis, it has been a lack of integrity which has brought about our present situation tending toward governmental interference in business," declared Mr. Sibley. "We need men of sterling Christian character in both business and politics at the present time."

Mr. Sibley told of his personal experiences in visiting mission centers in the Orient and stressed the strategic position which the Church holds in these foreign countries from a missionary point of view.

He discussed the world outlook at the present time and predicted a bright future, basing his judgment upon contact with business leaders from the major countries through the international meeting of the Chamber of Commerce in Paris recently which he attended.

Mr. Sibley is a member of the National Council and, with Mrs. Sibley, went on the missionary investigation tour around the world, which resulted in the report, "Re-Thinking Missions."

Suggests Prayer as Economic Cure.

The Lord's Prayer holds the key to a solution of the world's ills, believes the Rev. Charles T. Hull, rector of St. Paul's-by-the-Lake, Rogers Park. Mr. Hull has been preaching on the Lord's Prayer from his pulpit for several weeks and out of his study he has drawn certain conclusions which he believes might be applied to society with beneficial results on the economic situation.

The Evening American has taken up Mr. Hull's idea and commends it strongly to the public.

"Think," says the American, quoting Mr. Hull, "of the universal and deeply effective power of this prayer, to say nothing of its age. A Jew can say it just as sincerely as a Christian. So can an Oriental. Yet, it is specifically moral, religious and spiritual. It is the essence of all righteousness and is known to millions.

"Mr. Hull suggests that if his fellow citizens will say the Lord's Prayer at least daily and sincerely, it will help them get back to the standards and habits that once made them what they were at their best. There is logic in his idea. To recite the Lord's Prayer every day, with honest feeling, must inevitably soothe the spirit, allay fears and strengthen self-confidence and self-respect."

Regular weekly services will be held at the Naval Station.

Dr. Lash has been in Naval service for some time. From 1927 to 1929, he was fleet chaplain of the U. S. Asiatic Fleet, and then he served at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Since 1933, he was chaplain on board the U. S. S. Virginia, flagship of the U. S. Fleet.

Inaugurate Community Program.

Announcement of the inauguration of an intensive church community program on the west side of Chicago with the appointment of the Rev. Albert E. Selcer as assistant at St. Luke's Church, 743 South Western Avenue, is made by the Rev. John C. Evans, D. D., rector.

The program is being launched under direction of St. Luke's Associates, set up by the vestry and embracing some eight societies and parish groups with a membership of more than 200. Maxwell E. Nickerson is president of the associates' group, which has established a fund to finance the work for an initial period of two years.

The project is considered a unique combination of church and community work. One of its phases will be recreation with the Parish Men's Club taking over property owned by St. Luke's for a recreational center. The groups included in the sponsors of the program are: Men's Club, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Children's Choir, St. Vincent's Acolyte Guild, Woman's Auxiliary, Kindergarten department of Church School and St. Luke's Social Society.

The Rev. Mr. Selcer will devote his full time to this community program. For several years he has been on the staff of Canon David E. Gibson at the Cathedral Shelter, and is thoroughly familiar with social service work on the west side. He has been released from his duties at the Shelter to undertake the new work.

Exploration Dogs Appear on Church School Platform.

Recently at the Community Church Summer School of Ridgewood-Glen Rock, N. J., Dr. John Stuart Thomson, F. A. and R. Geog. Soc. (see Who's Who in U. S., the East and Canada, 1934), delivered a lecture on Arctic and Antarctic exploration with his famous lead dogs, Pamelus and Pavlova (see Nature Magazine, June 1931, p. 354: N. Y. Times, Jan. 31, 1929. N. Y. Her. Oct. 25, 1931, p. 29: Lit. Dig., Feb. 16, 1929, p. 38), by request on the platform. Though the temperature was 90 degrees there, full-furred, they proudly sat like statues of white Boreas or cool Polaris himself in silent command of the audience. Their picture ("handsomest sled dogs in the world," says N. Y. Post), in N. Y. Post Feb. 24, 1931, Newark News, January 22, 1932, Jersey City Journal, February 2, 1932, were exhibited to the school by the Rev. Dr. Victor Simons, pastor, who introduced the distinguished lecturer, who is an able extempore speaker as well as author of six books of travel, all promission, especially Episcopal. His book, "China Revolutionized," recommended on subject by N. Y. Times, induced Rockefeller to found Peking Medical College as recommended by the book. He is nationally known as Father of revived wild chestnut tree movement—see Field and Stream, March, 1931; Amer. Boy, February, 1935. Since 1901 he has been a leading figure in and author on China-U. S. relations. He made the opening address at Clark University Oriental Conference of Statesmen and Sinologues. He is the liberal cousin of Chairman of U. S. Steel Corporation (N. Y. Post, May 4, 1934), though he is better known as champion of the Middle Class (N. Y. Times, January 25, 1935; N. Y. Post, June 8, 1934, editorial page). He said at the lecture, "if a dog can't use a man's mind on exploration, he can't be a good dog, and if a man can't use a dog's mind he can't be a good dog-minder, for the Creator has cogged all Nature reciprocally." See his God in Nature article, N. Y. Times, August 24, 1934; N. Y. Sun, August 13, 1934.

On July 31 Bishop McCormick of Western Michigan dedicated a stone altar at Camp Roger, the Choir Camp of St. Mark's Church, Grand Rapids. The altar was built by the boys in camp in memory of the late Dean Francis S. White, who was Dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral at the time the camp was founded.

Personal Notes

The Guild of St. John's Episcopal Church in City Point, Va., has adopted resolutions in recognition of the long and faithful service of Dr. Frederick G. Ribble of Petersburg, who served as rector of St. John's Church for more than thirty years. Dr. Ribble, who resigned early last spring, is still acting in an advisory capacity.

The Rev. Gregory J. Lock of Fort Thomas, Ky., a graduate of the Episcopal Seminary in Alexandria, who came to Hopewell, Va., about the middle of July, has assumed his duties as rector of St. John's Church, successor to Dr. F. G. Ribble. He was ordained at his home town shortly after graduation.

Bishop Irving Peake Johnson of Colorado has been preaching in the Cathedral of All Saints, Albany, N. Y., during the latter part of July and will remain until August 18.

The Rev. Thomas A. Simpson, until now rector of All Saints' Church, Valley City, North Dakota, and secretary to the Bishop and Council, and registrar, of the missionary district of North Dakota, has been appointed archdeacon for Indian work in the district, with headquarters at Mandan. He succeeds the Ven. A. L. Parcells.

The Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, rector of St. John's Church, who is chaplain of the 118th Field Artillery, is attending the summer Military Training Camp at Camp Jackson, Columbia, S. C., from August 3-17.

COLLECT FOR THE NINTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY.

THY WILL BE DONE.

O God, not only in distress,
In pain and want and weariness,
Thy tender spirit stoops to bless,
Thy will is done.
But, oftener on the wings of peace,
And girt about with tenderness,
Thou comest, and all troubles cease.
Thy will is done.
In all that nature hath supplied,
In flowers along the countryside,
In morning light, in eventide,
Thy will is done.
In youthful days, when joys increase
In light, in hope, in happiness,
In quiet times of trustful peace,
Thy will is done.

WILLIAM CAREY.

It was fitting that William Carey, whose life was to be given to a land with four-fifths of its people dwelling in villages, should be himself village-born, in Paulers Pury, in the southeast corner of mid-England's Northhamptonshire, on August 17, 1761—the first child of Edmund Carey, a hand loom weaver. When he was six, his father was promoted to be the village schoolmaster, as his father, Peter Carey, had been promoted before him. So Carey, who was to do really great things for education in India, was the son and grandson of schoolmasters.

The boy himself soon learned to love books, too—especially of history, science and travel. "Columbus" the other lads dubbed him, because he was always reading of that great seafarer. But the book he loved best was the open-air world about him—the fields and hedgerows of his village and the wide Whittlebury forest. He soon knew these by heart. By the grace of his understanding mother, Elizabeth, his bedroom was an aviary, and he was daily waked by the needs and calls of his bird-pets. And he stocked his father's schoolhouse garden with treasures from the lanes and woods, making it his first "botanie". His Uncle Peter, home from Canada and a life-long gardener, quickened within him this interest in plants and birds. His sister and brother have told how he would take or carry them over the dirtiest roads to see a plant or an insect, would keenly observe every hedge, and delight to show them the beauties in the growth of plants, studying each with great care. This love of knowing and growing plants became his life-long hobby and passion, and yielded for India incalculable good.

While still a lad, another keenness declared itself, which was to distinguish him through life, an unusual appetite and aptitude for languages. In the cottage of Tom Jones, another weaver, he came upon a Latin vocabulary and Latin classics, reminiscent of the years Jones had spent in Kidderminster Grammar School, when his father meant him for a doctor. Carey coaxed him to teach him, and contrived, with his rusty help, to make a beginning with Latin, and presently with Greek, the taught soon outclassed the tutor. So his young life was very full. He had no time to be idle. The days were too few and short for the things he wished to learn and accomplish. He laid the foundations of his life-long diligence. Even his father, who would never declare him clever, could not deny his attentiveness and toil. He himself contended that it was his only genius. "I can plod, and that is all."

When he was fourteen, his father apprenticed him to the shoemaking trade in a village eight miles from his home. In the workshop to which he was sent, he met another apprentice older than himself, and thoughtful for the deepest concernments of life. And before long this John Warr became a zealous Christian, to the deep joy of his father and grandfather. Then John began to pour his own warm love of Christ into the heart of his workmate. But Carey was not interested. John Warr was, however, "importunate", and never rested till Carey learned the secret of true life.

All the world knows the name of William Carey, but John Warr's name had been completely forgotten, till I was fortunate to find it in a letter of Carey's. Yet, except for this fellow-apprentice, Carey might never have become a Christian, and so never have made his notable contribution to the Kingdom of God. Warr, with not a tithe of Carey's brain-power, was the Andrew who led this gifted Peter to Christ.

A little later Carey got his second eventful experience—through the "Voyages of Captain Cook", whose murder in the South Seas was the grief of all England. As Carey read Cook's records, he was enthralled by the simple-hearted, childlikeness of these South Sea islanders, and appalled at their barbarities. They were at once so likeable and terrible. And his soul was moved to a deep compassion. He craved to be among the first to take them the news of the Saviour. The voyage-book of the immortal Captain made Carey yearn to be a missionary.

From that time he could never forget. He felt the world's darkness. Day and night he carried in his heart the unevangelized peoples. He strove to make even the children of his little day-school feel the tragedy of the continents which were still pagan. He steeped his mind in the Scriptures, and found them missionary. He spent hours in tense intercession. He kept himself informed of all the missionary daring of the Moravians. He worked harder than ever at languages, though still shoemaking, and won a considerable familiarity with Latin and Greek, Hebrew and Dutch. He became lay-pastor of the litle Baptist church in Moulton, and kept preaching there and in the neighboring villages the world-embracing grace of his Saviour, the world-embracing commission of his Lord. To his astonishment he found himself a "voice in the wilderness", none else feeling and thinking as he. He seemed the only one of wakened ear in a world of the deaf. He sought to rouse every other preacher he could influence to the urgency of Christ's call. But they regarded him as a fanatic. He published in Leicester, where he was then pastor, an unanswerable challenge to the Home Church. He preached in Nottingham a never-to-be-forgotten sermon with this same burden, packing his message into two ringing slogans:

Expect great things from God,
Attempt great things for God.

The next morning, May 31, 1782, he pleaded his co-delegates, in their business session, for joint action, and was in anguish when they refused. "Is there nothing going to be done?" he moaned, and that cry awoke Andrew Fuller, and thenceforward he lived as single-mindedly as Carey for the world program of their Lord.

At last, in Kettering, on October 2, 1792, Carey constrained thirteen others —including Fuller, Ryland, Sutcliff and Samuel Pearce—to join him in founding a missionary society—the Baptist Missionary Society beloved of all British Baptists. The rest were mostly pastors of tiny Baptist churches in mid-England villages, with no influence beyond their narrow bounds. No wonder that they trembled, having neither experience, nor precedent, nor funds. But Carey heartened them with the story of the Moravians' achievements, and presently they let themselves be launched into God's deep

Three months later, the chief solicitude was not for money, but for messengers. And God sent them the answer. For at this very time there was home again in England a young Christian doctor from India, a former surgeon of the East India Company's fleet —a certain John Thomas. Instead of living self-indulgently in Calcutta, he had pitied the Indian multitudes in their diseases and distresses, and became their voluntary and honorary physician, with the backing of a few British friends there. He had learned Bengali for the sheer joy of telling the people about Christ, and for five years had preached and practiced the Gospel—a lay missionary before any medical missionary society was born.

He ascertained what had just happened in Kettering, and got in touch with the infant society, and presently they met. Finding him keen to return to India, he was appointed as their first missionary. He at once begged for a colleague. Now, Carey was there amongst the rest and, burningly, had listened to Thomas' missionary story, the only missionary then in all England! To his appeal for a comrade he would fain have made instant response. For seven years he had coveted to be one of Christ's first ambassadors to Asia, and had prepared himself to the utmost for the great chance. And now the hour seemed to have struck; he rose and volunteered; and Thomas, in the presence of them all, fell on his neck and kissed him.

The committee had only the slenderest funds; not enough, indeed, to send the Thomasses to India. But, knowing Carey's ardor and peculiar fitness for the work, they trusted God for the money, and accepted his offered service. A faith mission assuredly!

So thus it came to pass that he, who for years had craved to serve the South Seas, was guided to India—the far-east land which for aeons had been seeking after God; the birthland of two potent religions, and the conquered home of a third. Surely it was time that the millions, who had bowed so long to Siva and Vishnu, to Buddha and Mohammed, should learn the love and law of Christ!—Rev. S. P. Carey, in Christian Index.

"Practicing the Presence of God."

This expression is often used, and we have been asked as to its meaning.

It is very much easier to feel a great thought than to express it. We believe that this expression has reference to our attitude toward God in our every day life. To practice the presence of God, we must feel that God is with us. This requires a complete study of what God is, and of what He is in relation to us. We must study His promises and the covenants, which He proposes to make with us. We should meditate upon these things, until we become imbued with the spirit, which permeates them. We should then engage in frequent and prolonged prayer, not merely at set times, but all through the days our hearts should go out to God in earnest communion. We should seek His guidance in all things, and should listen for His answer to our prayers.

It is possible for us to become so familiar with God in our thoughts, that in a real sense we can become conscious of His presence, but, to be assured of His presence, we must learn to know what is God's will concerning us, and then we must strive in all things to make a full surrender of ourselves to Him, and to do His will in all things. Our constant attitude toward God and our earnest prayer to Him should be expressed in some such way as Miss Havergal expressed it in her hymn of consecration.

He who would practice the presence of God should live as he believes that he would live, if he could see God in bodily form constantly at his side. The result will be such peace and joy, as we are accustomed in mind to associate with the lives of the redeemed in heaven. And we would also feel security and protection against all of the attacks of Satan. The true life of a real Christian is living consciously in the presence of God our Father, of God our Saviour, and of God the Holy Spirit, our Sanctifier and Guide, our Teacher and our Comforter.—Presbyterian of the South.

THE OLD GARDENER SPEAKS.

Emory C. Pharr.

Bury me in the garden where the pansies grow—
Beside the yellow rose where south winds blow.

Please not in some plot whose growth is stones,
Where the ground is filled with dead men's bones.

Let me sleep in the garden where I lived my years.
If there's to be grief let the clouds shed tears.

The Lingering Influence of a Sunday School Teacher.

How much we owe to Sunday School teachers—now "on the retired list!" Only "when the roll is called up yonder" will we know the long list of names of men and women who have taught in little country churches throughout the State of Alabama, and whose teachings are embodied in the principles which govern the lives of some of our greatest citizens.

I am thinking today of a certain "Miss Alice" up in one of the sunny front rooms of a big down-town hotel in a busy city. There she lives—a "little nosegay of a woman", as a modern novelist has described such a little bright-eyed, white-haired, cheery person. She has never married; she won't tell any one just how many years old she is, but she does admit that those years run well up into the eighties.

Once she had a home of her own. That home had a big swing out on the lawn in front, where boys could "pump" to their hearts content, and almost reach the lowest branches of the old elm with their bare toes. Inside the house—the old house was built in 1828—back in the cool, long dining room there was a big cooky jar, and somehow it never seemed to get empty; there was a bucket of cool water by the old cistern with a gourd dipper that a small boy could just reach comfortably by standing on his tiptoes. But the original house was torn down years ago in the march of progress. No longer able to take care of a big old house she has given away the high four-posted beds and the walnut dressers to her neices and nephews, and she lives up there in that sunny hotel room, where the sunshine reaches her geraniums and dyes them a deeper red each afternoon.

Almost every day you can see from one to five gray-haired men making their way up the elevator and down the long corridor to that little room, often with mysterious packages tucked under one arm.

Why do so many men go up there to see her? Machinists, lawyers, doctors, stoop-shouldered printers with the hands that somehow always tell their trade?

"Is she some kind of a clairvoyant? Does she tell their fortunes?" a new chambermaid asked the elevator boy.

"No," he said, "she told them how to live so that they would have things inside the heart that makes life fuller and richer many, many years ago."

She taught a Sunday School class for twenty-five years. And she taught boys. Always boys. Nobody else wanted to teach boys. These are her "boys"—these gray-haired men who come to see her. Sometimes they bring her little gifts of fruit or candy, the things she used to have for them when they came to see her.

"Do you still have that little splint-bottomed chair, the one painted green, that I always sat in when I came to see you—because the others had such long legs that my feet hung high above the floor," a sober-faced unromantic looking cashier asked her one day. "You know I'd just love to have that chair in my home." You would never have guessed the sentiment that lay behind the bargain they made over the little splint-bottomed chair, which was to be unearthed from a dusty corner of an old attic.

And thus transactions are carried on, conversations flows, friendship reigns —Christian fellowship in that little room.—Alabama Christian Advocate.

Making Old Things Better.

All anyone ever does, even the greatest inventor or genius, is not to create an absolutely new thing, but to improve an old thing. Study the history of the world and especially of inventions and ideas, and this becomes obvious. Columbus was not out in quest of a new world, but of a shorter path to the old world. He never knew or dreamed of a new continent, but stumbled on islands which were named the West Indies, as they were supposed to be the outlying fringes of the East Indies. In the Smithsonian Institution in Washington are modeles of our inventions, and they are an interesting study. Steam engine and telegraph, telephone and typewriter were all improvements of crude means of doing these things. The first boat was a log that floated down the stream on whch the inventor rode, but thousands of improvements carried this forward through successive stages, of which the latest step is the Normandie; and even this is not the last step, for other improvements are yet to be made, and are being incorporated in the Queen Mary, which will be an improvement on the Normandie. The world is yet full of crude ways of doing things that loudly call for better ways, and so the field of the inventor is not exhausted, and never will be.

Ideas travel the same road. Any great thinker that devises and leaves a system of science or philosophy derived its germinal ideas from earlier and perhaps forgotten thinkers, and he developed and enlarged them. It was from an older book, Goodwin's Equiry, that Malthus derived the hint of his theory of population, and it was from the book of Malthus that Darwin and Wallace got the principle of evolution, which made them famous. Great books or any books are improved editions of old earlier books. Shakespeare worked over old plays and improved them with the blazing light of his genius.

What did Jesus do at the wedding in Cana of Galilee? He turned water into wine, He took an old and familiar means of refreshment and improved it into a richer one, at His touch the water blushed into wine. This is a model for all our work, and we can do no better than improve old forms into better.

She Shall Not Be Moved.

" . . . God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved." "Shall not be moved"—what an inspiring declaration! Can it be possible that we, who are so easily moved by the things of earth, can arrive at a place where nothing can upset us or disturb our calm? Yes, it is possible; and the Apostle Paul knew it. When he was on his way to Jerusalem, where he foresaw that "bonds and afflictions" awaited him, he could say triumphantly, "But none of these things move me". Everything in Paul's life and experience that could be shaken had been shaken, and he no longer counted his life, or any of life's possessions, dear to him. And we, if we will but let God have His way with us, may come to the same place, so that neither the fret and tear of little things of life, nor the great and heavy trials, can have power to move us from the peace that passeth understanding, which is declared to be the portion of those who have learned to rest only on God.

"Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out." To be as immovable as a pillar in the house of our God, is an end for which one would gladly endure all the shakings that may be necessary to bring us there!—H. W. Smith.

Who Are the Happiest?

Who are the happiest people on earth? This question was asked by an English newspaper, and prizes were offered for the best answers. There were four prize-winning answers:

"A craftsman or artist whistling over a job well done."

"A little child building sand castles."

"A mother, after a busy day, bathing her baby."

"A doctor who has finished a difficult and dangerous operation and saved a human life."

No millionaires among these, one notices. No kings or emperors. Riches and rank, no matter how the world strives for them, do not make happy lives. A sand castle does that far better than a palace. It would be a sad day on earth if only the great could be happy. But happiness is for everybody, not for a few.—Sunshine Magazine.

LIFE.

Monica Williams.

It isn't the things we think we do
That count in the way of Life.
It isn't the I, the Me and the My
That is able to conquer the strife.

For back of the thing we think we are
And the thing we want to be
Is the Spirit of God—the Saving Life
That is living through you and me.

The Love of God is a Moving Life
As endless as waves of the sea
That rise and fall with the surging tide,
But flow on through Eternity.

The waves of the sea and the fathomless deep
Are one in the Ocean's embrace,
So, love in our hearts and the wide, wide world
Is one, by the Father's grace.

So it isn't the I, the Me and the My
That carries us on through life,
It is God through all and all through God
That will win at last in the strife.

Gold Wolf.

William Allen Ward.

As a blue norther whistled over the divide a tragedy of life was taking place down in the deep arroyo. One life was oining the norther in crossing the divide, while a tiny mite of babyhood was ushered into being. The mother, a brave collie, had died when her single puppy was born. Old in the ways of the wild, this creature of sheep ranges knew that her baby was facing a battle for existence, in which the odds for his survival were many to one against him. But deathed closed the eyes of the mother while yet she watched, and the wee pup was left alone on the wind swept ranch lands of western Texas.

It was Villa, the killer, mighty wolf and leader of a mighty pack, that came bounding toward the New Mexico line that freezing night. The pack charged into the arroyo, and it was there they found the puppy nestled against the cold breast of his courageous mother. The sheep had been gathered at evening into the shelter over the ridge, but the shepherd had been unable to locate the faithful dog, and did not know that she had died in the gulch behind.

Villa, so named by the herdsmen of the Staked Plains because he was a butcherer of countless sheep, paused and sniffed at the body of the fallen mother. Then the pup caught his eye; and when the pack charged onward toward the New Mexico line, the collie puppy was carried along, rudely held in the tight grip of an old wolfe's teeth.

Months passed, and the puppy developed into a snarling creature of the wild. Even Villa was proud of him. And Villa was a killer. Nowhere in western Texas was there a wolf with the record of this giant. When a wolf is hunted by ranchers and given a name by government hunters, he is certain to be a master-killer. Such a beast was Villa, named for the Mexican bandit.

But soon there was another creature to attract the attention of herdsmen. Reports from the lower section of the Staked Plains told of a great wolf. They called him the Gold Wolf, because he appeared of a golden hue when seen dashing far away at the head of the pack. Hunters likewise observed that Villa was missing from the pack or had drifted to another section. But there was a secret of the wild that the ranchers and government hunters did not know. Gold Wolf had declined to trail at the heels of other beasts of the wild, and had challenged the rule of the mighty Villa. But Gold Wolf was not yet sufficient strong of muscle and wise in the way of claw and fang to overthrow this mighty monarch of the wastelands.

Gold Wolf lost. But the very next night Villa came limping into the canyon sorely wounded. At last, after years of fruitless attempts, the hunters of the government biological survey had been successful, and Villa had been mortally founded while on a solitary foray into a neighboring valley. He lingered but a day and died. Gold Wolf, offspring of a wise old collie mother and a battling German shepherd father, in whose veins there was more wolf than dog, now took his place at the head of the pack.

The outrages committed by the wolves in the power plains country called for drastic action. Scores of sheep were being killed. Ranchers combined to rid the country of the pack, now led by Gold Wolf. Hunting expeditions were organized, and a price was set for the scalp of the butcherer. Meanwhile Gold Wolf and his followers sulked in their hiding places far back in the foothills at the fringe of the "cap rock". The hunting expedition continued for weeks, still no scalps were brought in, and sheep continued to fall victims to the wolf pack. The Gold Wolf was the arch killer of western Texas. Utah had boasted of her wolf that had slain hundreds of sheep and thousands of cattle, and last died a victim of rabies, despite the fact that numerous government hunters did their best to trap him or get in range of him with their rifles. And Texas had battled the terrible Villa and won, but never was there a wolf that compared with this merciless Gold Wolf.

But there were secrets in the soul of this dog leader of a wolf pack that were unknown to the hunters and the ranchers. They did not know that the Gold Wolf slew to satisfy his hunger, and not wantonly. They did not know that back in the foothills there were many wolf cubs that had to be fed. And they did not know that Gold Wolf had never looked into the face of a man! All that the hunters and ranchers knew or cared was the fact that Gold Wolf was a killer, and must be hunted down and slain, like a mad dog.

Into the teeth of a cutting norther rode Dave Brownlow, hunter from the Biological Survey. Dave was determined to trail the pack to its hiding place, and now he believed that he had found the right way. Dave was following an ancient cow trail that led toward Lobo Canyon when a tragic event, all too common in the sheep country, occurred. The pony that Dave was riding stepped into a prairie dog hole and fell. The rider was caught unaware and thrown. His leg was broken.

Trapped on the open plains at sunset with a freezing norther whipping down from the north was not a comfortable manner in which to spend the night. The rifle also had suffered from the fall. Hurled to the ground ahead of the stumbling pony, the barrel had been bent in such a manner as to make further use impossible.

Twilight approached. The wind cut Dave's face like a steel-pointed stiletto. The fallen rider was not a novice to the way of the wild. He knew that death lurked just beyond. There was a howl —the weird howl of the wolf pack!

Two burning eyes approached out of the darkness. There was a sniff at the freezing's man's boots. And another pair of eyes came from somewhere—and another. Dave closed his eyes—the Gold Wolf was approaching! Dave knew the law of claw and fang. The wolf pack was starving!

The Gold Wolf sniffed Dave's face. Then he paused—a snarl. But the snarl was directed at others of the pack, and not toward Dave. The pack approached an inch further. Then the Gold Wolf stood over the fallen man and defied the pack. Never did a creature battle as did Gold Wolf on this icy night out there on the wastelands. Snarling and clawing like a demon, he forced the pack back. Dave, helpless as the result of his fracture, was amazed at this strange turn of events. But there was nothing baffling about the fight to Gold Wolf. It was the voice of a million generations of dogs, the friend of man, talking to him in the silent language of nature. This voice said that the man on the ground was in trouble, and must be saved. Gold Wolf obeyed. The pack retreated in disorder while Gold Wolf stood guard until help arrived hours later.

When neighbors tell mother our baby is dear,
I know that our three-year-old thinks it is queer;
He is here without teeth—as she looks for his hair—
She is surely disgusted—not very much there!

He is not just the stranger she thought in the way;
She is finding it easy to love him. We know
She is learning to love him while watching him grow.

Shep Counts the Sheep.

A farmer friend of ours had a small flock of sheep, eighteen head. And these sheep were the especial charge of the two small boys of the family. As a matter of fact the most care they received was that given them by "Shep", the Scotch collie pet of the two boys.

The boys would open the gate of the sheep-yard in the morning, and Shep would take the flock away to the pasture, where they would stay till about sundown. The boys never went after the sheep in the evening, but would tell the dog, "Time to get the sheep, Shep", when he would go to the pasture, round up the flock and bring them home.

When he got them to the sheep-yard, before he would let them enter, he would give three short, sharp barks, that the boys could hear from the house, a hundred yards away. Then he would let the sheep into the yard, one at a time, and as each sheep went in through the gate, he would give one short, sharp bark. The boys at the house would count the number of times he barked, and know that their sheep were all there. Then Shep would lay down in the gateway and wait till the boys came down and fastened the gate for the night. But one evening Shep had brought up the sheep, and the boys had counted the signals. One—two—three —and on, up to eighteen, and then one more—nineteen.

"Ho!" They cried to their mother,

"even Shep makes mistakes. Eighteen sheep and he barks nineteen times."

But when they went down to fasten the gate for the night, Shep proudly led them into the yard, and there were the eighteen sheep as usual. But one ewe with a wobbly-legged lamb, born since morning. The first one of the spring lamb crop, and good and sufficient reason for Shep's extra signal.—Myron Patch, in Our Dumb Animals.

SOBER-SIDES.

The blackbird always makes me laugh;
(He's such a sober fellow).
I think he's funnier than if
His coat were red or yellow.

He walks along the garden path
With very solemn tread:
You'd almost think he really knew
Some dear bird friend was dead.

But when he comes quite up to me,
I'm sure I've seen him wink;
As if he'd have me understand,
He's not just what I think.

His Life for Others.

Some men of the West Yorkshire Regiment were marching through the long, narrow street of a village near Rheims, when a man suddenly dashed out of a farm house on the right. Immediately a number of rifles cracked in front of the troops, and the man fell dead. He proved to be a man of the Royal Irish Regiment who had been taken prisoner the previous day, and was held in the farm, where the Germans were in ambush. Although he knew that the slightest movement on his part would mean death, he, as soon as the British were near enough, made the rush, which, being followed by the firing of the rifles, disclosed the enemy's ambush. His body was carried into a house until the fight was over, and then the men buried him. One who took part in the ceremony said: "There wasn't a dry eye amongst us when we laid him to rest in that little village."—The Chrisian Herald.

THINK ON THESE THINGS.

Florence Van Fleet Lyman.

Who said "This is a grey world"? I find it golden!
"Gold, gold, gold, gold,
Bright and yellow, hard and cold."
So someone sang long ago,
Forget that, and remember gold is precious.
It is good to remember the legend
Of the Rainbow and the pot of gold;
And the golden rule, the law and the prophet;
The golden fruit—the pomegranate;
The golden words, "God bless you" and
"God speed you";
The yellow marigold;
The angel shimmering gold of the sunrise;
And the golden crowned sunset hills;
Ever and ever the Golden Age!

The Policeman of the Bird World.

Perhaps no bird is better known and loved than the plebeian and self-reliant robin. His numbers seem to be increasing. Sometimes coming north as early as January 20th, he stays till late in the season, although not so noisy nor so much in evidence during late summer and fall.

The robin is wise in selecting a place to nest. Generally up high in the maple or a large apple tree is where the nest is found. Being near human habitations, crows and hawks do not molest him. As for the bluejay the robin is more than a match for him.

The robin, being an avid insect-eater, is one of man's best friends. Nor does he ever in any way impose on any other species of bird. He is the friend and cooperator of the feathered world. Usually rearing two broods a year he builds a new nest for each brood. His nest is a substantial structure made of mud and grasses. Often after the robins are through with a nest, the innocent but indolent mourning dove plays squatter by taking up his abode in it and rearing a family therein. The robin's notes of defiance scare marauding creatures away, and are a protection to his own family as well as to the families of other birds.—Willis Mehanna, in Our Dumb Animals.

Why He Gave So Much.

An Indian chief, who had been converted from heathenism, was exceedingly fervent in his prayers and praises during worship, and extremely generous in his kindness and gifts to the missionary and his work. The missionary at length asked the Indian why he was so jubilant in his devotions, and so lavish in his gifts. The convert made this pathetic reply: "Ah! you have never been in the darkness."—The Sunday School Chronicle.

A Cat-Power Engine.

"When I was a girl," said a useful and busy woman, "I came across a sentence by George William Curtis that I have never forgotten, and that has encouraged me more than any other saying I know. It was that 'An engine of one-cat power, running all the time, is more effective than one of forty-horse power standing idle.' I realized strongly that I had not a forty-horse power, that my life was narrow in many ways, and my opportunities were likely to be few. But one-cat power I certainly possessed, and I determined to run my little engine as hard and as steadily as I could."

Living Above.

Over the door of a cabinet-maker's shop in London there hangs this sign, "Living Above." It is a notification to customers that he can be found above his shop if the door is locked.

It is a great thing for a worker to be able to say he is "living above" his work; that his dreams and hopes and real life are above the level of his day's toil. He may have to work amid the clods and clutter, but at least he can "live above". No matter how lowly a man's work, his life can be above if his life is hid with Christ in God.—Exchange.

Instead of Criticism.

If you are looking for faults in your minister, you will no doubt be able to find many. If you are looking for things to criticize, you can find plenty of them. But when you begin to think of it, destructive criticism is very cheap. We have a beautiful building on our campus. It cost more than six hundred thousand dollars. With a dollar you could probably buy enough dynamite to wreck it. Dynamite is cheap. Did you ever think of substituting prayer for criticism? It would do a lot more good. It would do the minister good and do you good.—Dr. W. L. Lingle.

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

DEATHS

REV. JOHN ISRAEL YELLOTT, D. D.

The REV. DR. JOHN I. YELLOTT, rector of Emmanuel Church, Belair, Maryland, for twenty-eight years, and of the Church of the Prince of Peace, Fallston, Maryland, since 1913, died on Saturday, August 3rd, in the Church Home and Infirmary, Baltimore.

Dr. Yellott officiated at the services in Belair on April 27th, and had been ill since that time. Five weeks before his death he entered the hospital.

He was Diocesan Librarian and Dean of the Convocation of Towson and a member of the Executive Council of the Diocese. He was Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Masons in Maryland.

He was born at Towson, Maryland, on May 15, 1873, a son of the late Major John I. Yellott and Mary Virginia (Traill) Yellott. He was graduated from St. John's College in 1892 and from the General Theological Seminary in 1895. Washington College conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1915. He was made Deacon in 1895 and Priest in 1897. In 1898 he married Miss Mildred Walker Nelson of Virginia, who survives him.

He was assistant in St. Mark's Parish, Frederick and Washington Counties, from 1895 to 1897, and then went to Bayonne, N. J., for a year, later taking charge of Holy Cross Chapel, Baltimore. He was then called as rector to St. Mark's and Mount Calvary Church, Howard County, where he served two years, going from there to St. Mark's Parish, Frederick and Washington Counties, as rector for six years. From there he went to Belair.

In addition to his widow he is survived by two sons—Kinlock Nelson Yellott, of Baltimore, and John I. Yellott, Jr., of Hoboken, N. J.; three daughters, Mrs. George Denny of New York; Mrs. Benton T. Boogher, of Alexandria, Va., and Miss Elaine Yellott, of Belair; four sisters and six grandchildren. He was a first cousin of the Rt. Rev. Edward Trail Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop of Maryland.

The funeral services were conducted by the Bishop of Maryland and the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson, D. D., his brother-in-law, in Emmanuel Church, Belair. Burial was in Trinity Church Cemetery, Long Green, Maryland, on Tuesday morning, August 6th.

IN MEMORIAM.

David Walker.

I knew him all my life, and nearly all of his. From early manhood DAVID WALKER stood, to me and all who knew him, for loyalty, and honesty, and loving kindness; in short, for as near a perfect Christian gentleman as one meets in the journey of Life.

Disappointment and trials filled his life—a veritable testing time set him by his Heavenly Father, and out of it he came as pure gold, for no one ever heard an embittered word from his lips. Retiring, unassuming, he lived his life for his wife and children. But oh; the difference to all who knew and loved David Walker, that they can no longer go to him for sympathy, or receive that smile of welcome he always had ready for his friends and family. "This friend of mine who lives with God" never failed or disappointed you—and that is no small thing to truthfully say of any man. As I looked at his children standing by his resting place where

"For a space the tired body
Lies with feet towards the dawn
Till there breaks that last and brightest Easter Morn,"

the words of the psalm came to me, "Yea, they have a goodly heritage". "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," says the wise man; these riches abundant are theirs. Wealth, earthly possessions? say you. No, but in the character their Father left his children—a character from youth bearing the marks of the Leader whom he followed daily—till the end—even Christ.

PERSONAL NOTES.

Dr. W. W. Memminger, rector of All Saints' Church, Atlanta, and his family are spending the month of August at Flat Rock, N. C., at their ancestral summer home.

The Rev. and Mrs. Russell K. Smith of the Church of Epiphany, Atlanta, are visiting their daughter in Gibson, Tenn., for the month of August.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Henry Bedinger died last month in San Diego, California, in his eighty-second year. Mr. Bedinger was a graduate of the Berkeley Divinity School. He had been rector at St. Luke's, Beacon, N. Y., and St. Peter's, Salem, Mass., where he was for twenty-nine years. He has been associated with Bishop Satterlee at Calvary Church, New York. His wife and three children survive.

RETIRE.

The Rev. John S. Alfriend, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church at Weston, W. Va., has announced that he will retire from the ministry on August 31. Mr. Alfriend is seventy-six years of age and is the oldest man "on the job" in the diocese of West Virginia.

Born at Petersburg, Va., he later moved to Norfolk and made his home there. Later he went to the Episcopal Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. He served the early part of his ministry at Pulaski, Va., and was then called to Charles Town, W. Va. Having served there long and well, he was later called to Weston, W. Va.

During the forty years of his service, he has made many friends throughout the diocese and nation, who love him, and regret to see him go, but all agree that he deserves a rest. May his life, as it has been in the past, be useful and happy!

F. G. Weber.

The Rev. Dr. Kensey Johns Hammond, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, Va., tendered his resignation at the meeting of the vestry held last week, to take effect October 1.

Returning in April from a vacation in Florida, bringing recovery from his winter's illness, Dr. Hammond took up, gradually, his duties in St. Mark's Parish. But, after a four months' trial he found he lacked sufficient strength at his age, for its proper promotion in all details.

Dr. Hammond, who this year rounds out his fifty-third year in the ministry, has, in all that time had but three charges. After graduating from the Virginia Theological Seminary he engaged in work of the mission church of West Virginia, under Bishop Peterkin, for five years, going at the end of that time to a parish in Wilmington, Delaware, where he remained for twenty-five years, coming back to Culpeper, Va., where his pastorate has lasted for twenty-three years.

It was largely through the interest and efforts of Dr. Hammond that the work of restoration on the Colonial Church at Little Fork was continued to completion, and it was also during his pastorate that the present Peterkin Memorial Hall was built to serve as the parish hall of St. Stephen's Church in Culpeper, and named in honor of the late Bishop George Peterkin, of West Virginia, who, before going to West Virginia, had been pastor of St. Mark's Parish here.

The community services, which have become a feature of each Good Friday, were inaugurated by Dr. Hammond, who is said to have done more to bring about a harmony and unity of feeling between the various denominations in Culpeper than any other man, and who, in return, possesses the affection and esteem of members of all congregations, as well as his own.

The vestry has given no formal consideration, as yet, to the selection of Dr. Hammond's successor here.

A vision clear, a morning prayer,
A mind attuned to all that's bright and fair,
The will to serve, the aim to share,

And when the evening shadows fall,
To feel the sweet content, and consciousness of peace
Which comes with duty done.

THOUGHTS for the THOUGHTFUL

There is no private sin, no isolated wrong.

"The future peace of the world depends upon the spirit in which the young are brought up."

Serve God. The true worshipper is a faithful servant. Serve Him and serve Him always.

The influence of a good life is like the influence of the sun on the flowers. Wherever you find a Christian you will find a garden.

Jesus is the Saviour, the deliverer, and the great physician, the healer of soul and body. Not a pang is felt or a tear shed on earth, but He sorrows over it.

Swedenborg had a quaint idea of the angels. "In heaven," he said, "the angels are advancing continually toward the spring time of their youth, so that the oldest angel appears the youngest."

Modern missionaries, in all their wanderings among the lost and sinful tribes of men, have never found a people who did not approve and respond to the gospel message.—Dr. Theodore Copeland.

If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.

Jesus confidently teaches that if the disciple abides in Him, lives in Him, lives for Him, devotes himself wholly to Him, follows Him, as Master and Lord, he may ask whatever he wishes and it will be done.

A busy preacher was one day telling a venerable Quaker how many times he had to preach, and altogether, how much talking he had to do, when the Quaker made this timely remark, "If thou doest so much talking when hath God a chance to speak to thee?"—"The King's Business."

In an ancient legend, a seer was shown with an aged woman seated for very weakness in a chair, and he was told that she was the Church. Then he was shown a woman building a light tower above the waters, in whose building multitudes were employed, and he was told that she, too, was the Church. When he asked for the key to this mystery, he was told that the explanation lay within himself. When faith was weak, the Church seemed old and helpless. Then when faith revived, he saw her young and beautiful and strong.

WAR A SIGN OF WEAKNESS

War is a failure, not a triumph, of government. It is a waste of national wealth; so far from securing peace, it defeats every influence that makes for the world settlement and world agreement.

The Western Hemisphere may imagine that it can keep out of a European war, but when the war is over, with all its destruction of life and civilization, then there will be smokeless factories in the Western Hemisphere; there will be grain rotting in its fields, because the people who were to command labor and use the labor of America will be lying rotting corpses under the ruins of the destroyed buildings of the cities of the East.

War benefits nobody, therefore the British Government and every enlightened government in the world have declared that they will do their best to make war unthinkable and an impossibility.

But I must say this by way of warning—no one country can secure peace. Peace is an international venture. Great Britain cannot disarm whilst other countries are arming. Great Britain cannot trust to security of peace and co-operation and good-will whilst other countries are pursuing an opposite policy in an opposite spirit. Therefore the question of Geneva is this, do we trust each other enough? Are we going to pursue our problems in the spirit of good-will and with the determination to co-operate in order to secure peace rather than to arm against each other?—Ramsay MacDonald.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Eventual Thing in Christianity?

Mr. Editor:

Apropos of the question asked by the Guardian of London and printed in your issue of August 10, as to "What is the eventual thing in Christianity?"

Is not the eventual thing in Christianity this: In the Incarnation of the Son of God we have the clear revelation of God's purpose in man's creation and also the Way by which that purpose is made possible of fulfilment for every man—an ever living, continuing historical fact.

She Is a Saint.

August 13, 1935.

Mr. Editor:

I enclose thirty cents in stamps for three copies of the August 10 issue of the Southern Churchman.

Mrs. Neale, a very good picture of whom is on the cover, is an old friend. I was rector of the church at Pt. Pleasant, W. Va., for over seven years. She is a saint as your correspondent said.

I never have an All Saints Day service without thinking of her among others whose lives have given the lie to the indifference and scepticism of the unreflecting portion of mankind.

I used to take the Southern Churchman, but quit several years ago. It comes as an old friend now and I enjoy it as in other days.

I wish you success in trying to put the paper back where it belongs.

Countless weavers in the night,
Spin their webs of crystals bright;
Everywhere their trace is seen,
In bush and tree and mosses green!

The grapevine with its silv'ry skeins,
The fence a web of crystal veins;
The ivy drops its spangles too,
The hen-house is agleam with dew.

The berry brushes tangled lie
Within the mesh, and humbly vie
In witchery and tracery fine
With every glistening tree and vine.

The fields like pools of shining glass,
Reflect the sunbeams as they pass;
And lend to all this brilliant sight,
A dazzling dream of fairy light!

Some Important Facts in English Church History

EXAMINED AND REVIEWED

By

REV. W. P. WITSELL, D. D.

This is an illuminating and instructive review of the history of the Episcopal Church in England from the earliest records, with commentaries on the book with the above title compiled by the Rev. C. L. Wells, D. D., of Sewanee, Tenn.

As a digest of the records of the establishment and growth of the Church; its maintenance and continuity of existence as an independent religious body amid the vicissitudes of early English politics, and efforts of outside interference, this review affords a valuable fund of information to churchmen.

America For Christ—Why Not Now?

The Forward Movement has stirred the heart and imagination, and the pictures of the far-reaching possibilities of what The Church-in-Action really might and should be in a community, in a great and fair land which calls itself Christian, opens before us, not as a visionary impossibility, but as a practical and thrilling adventure. An adventure in which youth, age and experience; men, women, every organization and social service agency could join forces in a supreme and glorious ideal effort. Our city—community for Christ!

Some twenty-odd years ago, Dr. Howard Kelly, with charts and maps in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, unfolded a plan for the city of Baltimore. Whether anything was ever developed from his idea, we never heard, but the suggestion lingered in memory, and it now presents itself as a highly practical starting point.

The Forward Movement has said, "We have talked a great deal. There has been much exhortation. Now we need a plan of action for 1935-1936. It should embrace the whole parish and every part of it.

This, then, is a plan of action for 1935-1936—To make a map of your city—place every Protestant Church in it, in its proper locality. We say Protestant, because we mean Protestant—for this is to be a Christ-inspired campaign—a Christ as "the one and only way"—campaign, with the open Bible in hand.

With the Church of the Living Christ as the center, or heart, draw a circle around that church until its lines reach the circle of other churches similarly surrounded. Within the circle of that circumference is the territory of work and responsibility of that church or parish. "To seek out in hospital, prison, lonely room, or wherever it may be, those whom you may serve."

Will our brethren of other denominations join us, is it workable? I think so. But if not, the Episcopal Church is strong enough to assume the greater responsibility and we would have but "to lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes."

The Social agencies at work in our cities today are splendidly organized, they are clothing the poor and feeding the hungry. Their workers are entering the homes of the poor and down-and-outers. Physical wants are being supplied, but are they looking after souls? Social Service has been defined as "Christianity in Action". Are they giving the needed Spiritual food and comfort and encouragement? Bishop McDowell reminds us "that the Church's business is to inject the spiritual element in all man-made schemes for human development".

The Forward Movement Commission reports that church attendance has increased generally during the last months—there is an increased interest all along the line—but is it not those who are already church members, who had fallen off, and who might already be counted to belong to the church-goers? And how many of the needy are coming to the churches? "God believed in is not enough for our life and work as Christians today. He must be actively present in Power." Have we a passion to win the world for Christ?

Is our Church really making a great effort to reach the non-churchman? Are we going into the highways

Will Rogers.

Millions of Americans will feel in the death of Will Rogers the loss of a personal friend. A host of others throughout the world, who by radio, the screen, the newspapers, and by personal contact have enjoyed the homely philosophy, critical but friendly comments on men and affairs, and keen wit of this gifted citizen of Oklahoma, will mourn his loss. His philanthropies were large, for he loved his fellow man, and gave freely of his time and fortune in aid of the distressed.

Most widely known for his homely humor, his wit was packed with philosophy, and his philosophy did not less deserve its name because it was shaped to make a laugh. His wit was clean, without sting or malice, and his own solid sense and high courage exerted a wholesome influence in strengthening the heart and purpose of his fellow citizens.

Will Rogers has been designated a typical American. Born at Oolagah, Indian Territory, he began his active life as a cowboy on his fathers ranch, proud of his Cherokee Indian blood, and his ability to throw a lariat. He ended it as the intimate friend of Presidents, monarchs, dictators, millionaires, and leaders in every walk of life.

The record of his life gives emphasis to the fact that clean living, clean thoughts and clean acts, with love of fellow man still brings its reward.

Wiley Post, pilot of the ill-fated plane and companion of Rogers on the vacation trip to Alaska, was regarded as one of the most expert aviators in America, and his loss will be greatly felt in building up of Americas air communications.

Church and World Problems as Others See Them

A Noble Letter.

The Guardian (English), August 2, 1935.

The Times of Tuesday published a letter from Lord Lugard which states the issue before the League with the perfect simplicity of which the exposition of most great issues is capable. He does not hesitate to say in the first place to the Italians that they are "good sportsmen" and that in most circumstances they would be the first to admit that their dispute with Abyssinia does not provide "the conditions for a square fight." He then goes on to point out that the issue far transcends the personality of either belligerent. If there should be a war and that war should be condoned by the principal nations of the League, the League itself could hardly survive as an effective agency for peace. In the circumstances in which war in Abyssinia is being planned it is used as an instrument of policy. That is a negation of all international policy since the War. The result would be that no nation could trust the solemn pledge of another. The very basis of our civilization would be swept away. Lord Lugard concludes:

"England has her opportunity at Geneva—God grant she may not lose it 'through craven fear of being great.' She is not pledged to single action, but if our representatives declare sans phrase that Great Britain stands for the observance of treaties and the procedure they prescribe, we may with confidence leave it to the others to declare before the world on which side they stand. Are not our troubles in Europe sufficient without lighting the torch of racial and colour antipathies? We see only too clearly the implications, the risks and the dangers, but they are less than the alternative."

The Church Leaders on Abyssinia.

Not the least significant incident in connection with the Abyssinian crisis is the joint action by the Archbisop of Canterbury and the Arcbisop of Upsala. Speaking in the name of multitudes of Christian people throughout the world they "appeal to the Council of the League of Nations to use every possible effort to secure a peaceful settlement" and "to prevent the outbreak of a war between the members of the League, which would shock the conscience of the world." By this appeal the two Northern primates have given a lead on the spiritual and moral implications of the crisis which will greatly encourage Christian opinion everywhere. The lead is definite and it concentrates on the right point—the prevention of war through the League. The Pope has also expressed his concern, though in vaguer terms. At the beatification of an Italian missionary to Abyssinia he said, in a few and carefully weighed words, ". . . we hope, still hope, shall always hope, in the peace of Christ, in the Kingdom of Christ. In any case, we have every confidence that nothing will happen except in accordance with truth, justice and charity." The Pope, of course, is hampered by the Treaty with Italy, which in giving him the simulacrum of temporal power greatly limited his action where Italy is concerned. Even so, his utterance will disappoint many who had hoped for something more decisive.

Terror in Africa.

By Romain Rolland, Noted French Author.

The Witness, August 15, 1935.

Italian Fascism having reduced an entire people to poverty, is now waging war in order to subjugate the last surviving independent people of Africa, at the risk of thus setting fire to Europe and of provoking another world-wide conflagration. To prepare for this war, a new wave of terrorism is now breaking over Italy. The Special Tribunal of Rome has, in the first few months of 1935, already exceeded the total of 1934 for the number of trials and years of imprisonment inflicted upon the heroic adversaries of Fascism. Former prisoners, liberated after the "conditional" amnesty of September, 1934, have nearly all been re-arrested and sent for five years to the "Confino di Polizia." Young men have been sentenced to 20 years imprisonment for their personal opinions. Wives and mothers have undergone the same treatment. Men who had already served six or seven years of hard labor, after a few months of conditional liberty, sometimes on mere suspicion, have been once more arrested and condemned to very heavy sentences for having been found in possession of a mere pamphlet or even for having protested, in the correct legal forms and in the fascist unions themselves against the theft of their wages and the annoyances to which they have been submitted in the Italian factories. Mothers, wives and children are considered responsible for the anti-fascist opinions of their sons, husbands and fathers. Everything possible is done to hinder them in finding work. Political prisoners and likewise their families, are forbidden to accept money from their friends and relations. Whoever gives or receives help is inexorably condemned. Fascism tries to starve and to annihilate —morally and physically—not only its enemies, but also whoever is connected with them by bonds of relationship or friendship.

The protest of hundreds and hundreds of anti-Fascists suffering inhuman treatment is rising from Fascist Italy, from the accursed islands of Ponza and Ventotene, from the dungeons where they suffer and where they die. Dozens of intellectuals of high standing have recently been arrested in Turin, Milan, Padua and Venice. Scholars, journalists and university professors have been imprisoned, not only for any revolutionary or anti-Fascist activity, but simply because they did not think along Fascist lines. In the past four months, a total of 1,210 years of imprisonment has been imposed by the Special Tribunal. Such is the balance-sheet at the beginning of Italy's subjugation of Ethiopa. Our duty is to expose these facts to the whole world and arouse protest against such atrocities.

God Is Not Dead.

From Editorial in The Richmond Christian Advocate, August 15, 1935.

One thing is certain. Through all the changing circumstances of life the Truth, the Good, the Noble—these things have stemmed the storm. They have climbed out of the mire. They are not dead. Maybe we are going into the Dark Ages once again and it may be worse than the other chapter. Civilizations may collapse. Democracy as we know it, may disappear from the earth. These institutions we worship more than we worship God, may crumble under our gaze. This economic system that glorifies the secular, honors greed and tramples the helpless under feet, while the privileged sleep in the lap of luxury may go down with a crash that will shake the earth. But even that will not carry God from His Throne. God is not dependent upon American civilization for the preservation of His Truth. Even if this system passes that will not be the defeat of all that is Truth.

God is not dead. God has a plan and His hand will be seen and felt in the unwinding of this skein and the unfolding of this book. The Truth has never died nor can it die. It is immortal and will live. The God who has guided this world these centuries in the midst of man's folly and his sin has not given that job over to any brain trust or man-made commissions.

The program of Truth will not collapse. Right will win. The Light will keep on shining.

Doing Honor to God

Part 2.

Doing honor to God consists, in the first place, in believing in Him as our God, for without this faith "it is impossible to please Him." Heb. 11:6. We can no more do without God than the earth can do without the sun. It is a loss, however, which unbelievers fail to realize, because they share in the benefits of a more or less Christian civilization. But doing honor to God consists not only in a belief that He is, but also "that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him."

A Lack of Faith a Barrier to Progress.

The world is suffering from the lack of faith of those who profess to believe in God, because faith is the key by means of which "the innumerable benefits procured for us" by Christ's Death upon the Cross, are made available for the needs of mankind. The Church, which according to St. Paul, is "the Fulness of Him that filleth all in all," should be the distributing agency through which the blessings of the Kingdom of Heaven may reach those for whom they were intended. It is honoring God to believe that the infinite resources for the carrying out of His great work of redemption are fully available now for its complete fulfilment.

Realizing the Possibilities Ahead of Us.

We have scarcely begun to realize what the loving-kindness of the Lord implies, nor have we fathomed the depths of His everlasting mercy. "There is much land yet to be possessed," and the Word of God is full of invitations and even commands to His people to go up and take possession. What is needed is a far more adventurous policy than has yet been pursued. We see acts of daring on every side of us. Attempts are constantly being made to do things, as in aviation, which, a generation ago, would have been deemed impossible. The only reason why these new attempts are being made, is that men, by their daring and faith in their own powers of skill and endurance, have converted the impossible into the possible.

Christianity Has Lagged Behind.

But Christians, who should be in the lead, lag behind. Christianity is a religion of faith. Its whole history consists of a continuous record of great ventures of faith, which have again and again given a new inspiration to mankind to reach higher ground. It seems incredible that with the number of Christians there are in the world today, and with the full measure of the divine resources placed at their disposal, the world should still be in the condition which exists at the present time.

The Infinity of the Divine Resources.

The divine resources are equal to the task of redeeming a thousand worlds; in fact, all the worlds, no matter how many, which need redemption, and yet Christians in this tiny speck of a world, in the vast universe of God, so far from going forward with a triumphant progress, are actually losing ground in various parts of Christendom. A Century of Progress has lately been celebrated at the Worlds Fair in Chicago, and an astonishing advance has been made in the realm of scientific knowledge, but Christianity no longer leads the world, in spite of the fact that it has far vaster resources to draw upon, and far vaster possibilities beckoning to it.

The Enabling Power of God.

The main cause for this timid and hesitating policy of marking time and even making so-called strategic retreats has been, as already stated, a lack of faith and a neglect to do honor to God by taking Him at His word and attempting what He wants done which He is fully able to give us the power to bring about. The first petition in The Lord's Prayer, is "Hallowed be Thy Name", that is, may Thy Name be honored. This stands at the very beginning of our duty to God, and there is no better way of making His glory known than by manifesting to the world what great and wonderful things He is able to do for His people, if they will only go forward trusting to Him to keep His promises and do for them "exceeding abundantly" above all that they ask or think.

A Soldier's Battle.

It is no use trusting to our leaders and imagining that they can do the work for us. A Captain may lead, but if his soldiers do not march with him, his attempts to go forward will be a complete failure. We must be ready to do our part and encourage our leaders to feel sure that we are ready and eager to follow in the path marked out for us.

"Like a mighty army Moves the Church of God."

We are fond of singing this in our Church services, but is it really the case that we are like a mighty army and that we are really moving forward, like the saints of old?

The Great Cloud of Witnesses.

The great cloud of witnesses who may be watching us, who have taken their place in the great work of setting forward the Kingdom of God, must wonder at the indifference and want of genuine loyalty to our Lord, instead of gladly and joyfully embracing the opportunity of showing our devotion and gratitude to Him. Do they not ardently wish that they might be privileged to once more take part in the good fight of faith and set us an example of the way in which the victory must be won and can only be won? These are plain words, but as St. Paul says:—'If the trumpet give an uncertain sound who shall prepare himself to the battle?" (1 Cor. 14:8.)

Knights of the Order of the Thousandfold,
What is there God wants done, thou can'st not do?
The mighty deeds of faith once wrought of old
Thou can'st today renew.

Why wait for some "far-off Divine event"?
The present hour doth claim thine utmost zeal.
Go forth with the belief that thou art sent
To make Christ's promise real:

His promise, that by faith thou mayest do
As mighty works as He Himself hath done,
And greater works than these; go prove it true,
And glorify God's Son.

Not by thy power or might, but bowed in prayer,
Thou shalt prevail as Jacob did of old;
Princes with God to be, His gifts to bear,
And bless a Thousandfold.

The Witness and Genius of the Anglican Communion Today

Her Principles and Characteristics

By ARTHUR B. KINSOLVING,

Rector of Saint Paul's Church, Baltimore.

NOW LET US pass in review some of the principles and characteristics of the Anglican Communion. First, I would mention a certain reverent and convinced conservatism. Its deepest root strikes into a profound appreciation of the Incarnation. When I sat in a class-room at the Virginia Seminary fifty years ago, my dear old professor of theology used to say with a confident smile: "Gentlemen, other religions have their incarnations; we only have the Cross and the Atonement." Since then the whole emphasis has shifted; we have come to realize that the deeper, prior, more comprehensive truth is the Incarnation. Hence the faithfulness of the English Catholic Church in her witness to the completeness of our Lord's humanity and the glory of His divinity. That Christ was the Son of God matters everything, as we now know, as to the value of the Atonement itself, and if the Incarnation is the root of everything in Christianity, then what think ye of Christ? whose son is He? is the important question. The Greek fathers of the Fourth Century were not wrong, but rendered an immortal service when they wrought out the Chalcedonean symbol, which for sixteen centuries the universal Church has repeated: "God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God, begotten, not made, being of one essence with the Father, by Whom all things were made, Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man."

I was recently asked to address the Young People's Fellowship of a large Methodist Church. There were more than a hundred young people present. The subject assigned me was the Virgin Birth, Miracle, and the Resurrection. The textbook put into my hand, and written by a theological professor at Drew Seminary, made such ample room for either a positive or a negative attitude toward Incarnation, Miracle and the Resurrection as to discount thoroughly the necessity of believing in Christianity as a supernatural religion. With our formularies as bases and guides, this would be impossible among us. Individual teachers may go very far in the exercise of their freedom of interpretation. But both they and the people have before their eyes as a counter check the citations from Holy Writ and the interpretative language of the Book of Common Prayer. The evident conception of this book of devotion and offices is that Christianity is the religion of a Person, not of a Book, and that we take our Christology and theology, as well as the bases of our prayers, from the mind of Christ and His Apostles.

As another consequence of this firm grasp upon the principle of the Incarnation, we have the rich sacramental mysticism of the Prayer Book. The great Swiss reformer, Zwingli, did his utmost by cold rationalism to destroy belief in anything of which he had not sensible proof, and thereby turned the Lord's Supper into a bare memorial of a past event. His influence among the churches which took their rise at the Reformation in determining their doctrine of the Lord's Supper, has been amazingly long-lived, but it is growing less.

But the Church of England, through her reverence not only for the great sacramental teachings of St. John and St. Paul, but also for the mind of the early Christian fathers, has preserved for us the glorious Eucharistic teaching, which is becoming increasingly precious to our Church today. Graciously and tenderly she has gathered the little children into the covenant of Holy Baptism, linking their lives with the life of Christ Jesus, and seeking to bring them up in His fear and love. And then as we enter her sanctuaries, our eye falls in the central place, not upon a pulpit or lectern, but upon the Lord's table, the Christian altar.

The Church holds a strong and definite doctrine of God, of the objective reality of God, and of God's activity in our behalf. The Incarnation itself is the pledge of this divine initiative. Hence her strong doctrine of the sacraments. My faith and my obedience have their value, but the action of God is supreme. What He does at the font and altar is infinitely more than what we do at our best.

AGAIN. A part of this conservatism is her tenacious hold upon the principle of historic continuity. To me it seems unthinkable that our Lord should have flung into human society truths and channels of grace so infinitely precious without the guardianship of an authentic ministry. If so, why should He have bestowed such pains upon the Twelve, or sent out the Seventy as His forerunners in every place whither He Himself would go? Why did He call out of heaven St. Paul to be as directly sent by Himself as any of the original eleven? And why did St. Paul so carefully commission Titus and Timothy for their work, and why is it true that many years before either the canon of New Testament Scripture was settled, or the Apostles' or Nicene Creed was formulated, the Church came to a clear consciousness of its type of ministry?

On the one hand, we have one of the original five patriarchs claiming monarchical and absolute authority over the whole of Christendom, and we can trace the historical steps by which that claim was made effective.

On the other hand, we have more than three hundred divisions of Christendom, the largest number of sects in any religion in the history of the world. And yet we face in that most sacred High Priestly prayer of the Lord Jesus His plea for a visible unity. In view of these broad facts, I love and revere two things about this Church: first, the way through all weathers, under Gods' Providence, she has adhered to the ancient order; and next, her deep yearning and active leadership in bringing together the severed groups of the Church of Christ on earth. In this connection, let me say I never think of Charles Henry Brent and his heroic, if for the time being futile, efforts to further the work of reunion, probably at the cost of his own life, without recalling the words of our Master: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

A singularly scholarly and well-informed book, "The Church Catholic and Protestant, a Study of Differences That Matter", by the Rev. Dr. Williams Adams Brown, has come into my hands since most of this paper was written. The dedication reads:

To
The Memory Of
CHARLES HENRY BRENT
Bishop In
The Protestant Episcopal Church
Priest Of
The Church Universal

Among the subjects treated are, The Genius of Catholic Piety, The Genius of Protestant Piety, What Rome Offers and What She Demands, The Christianity That Is Catholic But Not Roman, What Catholics Might Learn From Protestants, What Protestants Can Learn From Catholics. As a work making for a better understanding between the several groups that constitute Christendom today, Dr. Brown's monumental study is likely, in my judgment, for its insight and love of truth to mark a milestone along the highway of Christian thinking.

I TURN now from this note of Anglican stability to that of Anglican progressiveness. The two distinctive marks of this Communion are Authority and Freedom. As A. E. J. Rawlinson, in his Paddock Lectures, pointed out, "There is authority without freedom, and freedom which is the reaction against all authority." While no where in things human is there to be found a perfect balance, in this Church there is an effort honestly to combine the two. Hence, we enjoy here freedom of scholarship and spiritual freedom in a notable degree. Our Anglican scholars, as they pursue their investigations in Church history or in the deepest and greatest of all sciences, theology, do not have to keep one eye upon the Index Expurgatorius. They are not haunted by what Paul Elmer More calls "The Demon of the Absolute." They have tried to be reasonable without being rationalistic. We have the treasure of the Christian ministry and the treasure of a divine revelation "in earthen vessels." There is a human element and a divine element in each, and this accords with the principle of the Incarnation. The rationalizing Protestant has set up an infallible book, and the rationalizing Roman Catholic an infallible Church, speaking through an infallible head, viceregent of the Lord Christ on earth. There is perhaps no more dramatic passage in Church history than the story of the Vatican Council of 1870, where for weary weeks noble scholars within that communion opposed with all their might this decree. Brave Roman archbishops on their return home to this country even refused to promulgate it. This "Demon of the Absolute," says Mr. More, "is perhaps the most subtly malign of all the idols set up for worship by the human race."

By contrast, the scholarship of this Church is clothed with humility, recognizing that "we know in part," and must "prophesy in part," showing a willingness to face the truth as we find it more clearly manifested. Our divine Lord says to us each, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind"; and St. Paul counsels, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Think with your intellect, not with your heart or your emotions only, and beware lest ye think with your prejudices.

AGAIN. I believe we can justly claim for the Anglican communion a marked spirit of fairness and comprehension, which gives her an important place as a bridge Church in divided Christendom. One of the tragedies of the Christian Church today is that while we try to unite the world in a brotherhood, we are not ourselves united. There is more fundamental unity than some people realize, and it would be a surprise to many to know how much of this is acknowledged by the Church of Rome itself. But there are strong contrasting types of Christian thought and marked differences between Catholic and Protestant piety, which seem to be permanent. Ever since Abelard wrote his "Sic et Non," setting out in columns side by side the conflicts of doctrine among the great teachers, even in the Roman Church in the ages of faith, differences have existed. At the Reformation these became violently emphasized and stereotyped, and some are likely to continue for a long time to come. What should be our attitude? One of aloofness and disciplinary exclusiveness, or one of hopefulness, friendliness and respect? The whole history of the Church through the ages shows us a composite canvas in which evil and good are inextricably interwoven, and then when things seemed darkest, some prophet has arisen, an Augustine, a Benedict, a Francis, a Wesley, a Keble, a Newman, and the institution has taken on a new lease of life. Professor Karl Adam, one of the ablest of living Roman Catholic scholars, speaking of the imperfections of the Church, says: "That there is no perfect equation between the ideal and the real, that actual Catholicism lags considerably behind its idea, that it has never yet appeared in history as a complete and perfect thing, but always as a thing in process of development and laborious growth: such is the testimony of ecclesiastical and social history. . . . The primitive Church was never at any time a Church 'without spot or wrinkle', as St. Paul puts its. . . . The early Church, for all its brilliant light, had grievously dark shadows also, and the same is true in general of the Church throughout the centuries. As long as Catholicism lasts, it will feel the need for reform, for a more perfect assimilation of its actuality to the ideal which illumines its path."

I think bigotry is more unlike the mind of the Lord Jesus than almost any other sin. "Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name, and we forbade him." Jesus said, "Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is on our part." "What God hath cleansed that call not thou common." There are such curious facts to confound the narrow person, and justify the intelligent comprehension of the Anglican communion. For example, the great Bach mass, one of the noblest ever composed, was written by a Lutheran. Scores of the hymns we sing came out of the hearts of Latins and Greeks, Moravians, Evangelicals and mystics cradled and nurtured under other Christian systems. The wife of the stern Puritan, Jonathan Edwards, seems to have been one of the saintliest, sweetest, most loving disciples of the Lord Jesus who ever lived, though she bore and trained eleven children. The Baptist, Walter Rauschenbusch wrote one of the tenderest prayers ever penned about little children. It is one of the "Prayers of the Social Awakening." "O Thou great Father of the weak, lay Thy hand tenderly on all the little children on earth, and bless them. Bless our own children, who are life of our life, and who have become the heart of our heart. Bless every little child-friend that has leaned against our knee and refreshed our soul by its smiling trustfulness. . . . But bless with a sevenfold blessing the young lives whose slender shoulders are already bowed beneath the yoke of toil, and whose glad growth is being stunted forever. . . . . Grant to all the citizens and officers of states which now permit this wrong the grace of a holy anger. . . . By the Holy Child that nestled in Mary's bosom; by the memories of our own childhood joys and sorrows . . . we beseech Thee to save us from killing the sweetness of young life by the greed of gain." Charles H. Spurgeon and General Booth are perhaps two of the greatest Christian influences in the Nineteenth Century, as Kagawa undoubtedly is in this. We have all heard German Lutherans accused of being only a cold, time-serving, obsequious state Church, but how manly has been their struggle against unjust state oppression, and how fine the recognition by the Roman Church of Germany that these Protestants, with a consciousness that they are fighting the battle of the Church universal, are defending the cause of the Catholic Church as well as their own. And, by the way, anyone who ponders the difficulties of the Church in Germany under Hitler, ought to understand a little better those of the English Church in the days of Henry VIII.

BUT we are coming to more reasonable days and juster judgments, and the Anglican communion has an honorable part in leading the way. She refused before Edinburgh and Lausanne to attend a conference which closed the door to reunion on the side of the Church of Rome. It was a great shock to many of the Protestant leaders. Since then there has been a profound modification of the traditional prejudice of Protestants toward Rome. A distinction is now made between the Roman Church as a legal institution and that Church as a spiritual fellowship, mother and home of saints. Her piety is reverenced, her mighty Christian responsibilities are appreciated, and her saints are revered. Many years ago I heard Bishop David H. Greer of New York, who began his ministry as rather a narrow Broadchurchman, but grew bigger through the years, say that we owe a great debt to the Roman Catholic Church for standing so bravely through the centuries for the supernatural. And I think that the Anglican communion is rendering today a great service by holding up before the eyes of the churches taking their rise at or since the Reformation the ideal of worship, which does not consist merely in the singing of hymns and the saying of prayers.

I may only refer briefly in closing to the robust, courageous and, in the main, profound and sane contribution which a school of thinkers in the Anglican communion, especially in England, have made, and are making towards social reform. The names of leaders which will at once occur to you include these: F. D. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, Charles Gore, Henry Scott Holland, R. H. Tawney; W. G. Peck, author of "The Social Implications of the Oxford Movement"; and in the United States, Howard Melish, Father Hamlin, Dean Lathrop, and William B. Spofford. This is only a skeleton list. Of late there has been the flowering of Maurician theology in a fuller appreciation of the social implications of the Incarnation. It is realized that a vision of the supernatural end of human life must first be restored to a broken and blinded humanity by the witness of Church and Sacrament. "The unbridged chasm between sacred and secular is intolerable," writes Mr. Peck. ". . . If the natural world is essentially an evil to be fled, the less the Christian has to do with it, the better. But the soul of man is incarnate in such manner as to be organically related with the world." Psychologists tell us that environment profoundly affects the human organism, so the Church must be concerned with the social environment of God's children, and must fight plutocratic individualism as well as godless collectivism. There are many fine spirits in Anglicanism today who feel that it is up to the Church of the present to redress as far as it can the sins of the Church of the past, when it acquiesced too smugly in abuses that were a disgrace to any Christian land. Secularism is collapsing before our eyes, and with it an unsocial individualistic capitalism. It costs now on an average nearly as much to sell as to produce an article, and one-fifth of the people of this nation today are being fed by the state. As has been said, "The problem is terrific in the complexity of its social ramifications, but surprisingly simple in its central principle." The Sign for today is the sign of the Elder Brother, the sign of the Son of Man, of the Holy Cross, and the fellowship of believers in the Christian God. There are already "signs in the sun and in the moon and in the stars."

"Cynicism, flippancy and gloom have supplanted the confidence of the generations which assured themselves of unfailing progress," writes a man of noble faith. Never has there been such a challenge to the reality of the Christian Church as today. In the words of Dr. Gavin, "The Church is enthroned not in the earthlies but in the heavenlies; she is as much above Capitalism as above Socialism, Communism, or Fascism. . . . She has outlived the heydays of many social and economic organizations of human life: the Pagan, Roman omnicompetent State; . . . the barbarisms of many a transition epoch . . . . the nascent nationalism and individualism of the Renaissance, and the Revolution of the Reformation: these are incidents in the history of her experience. She has long since learned that when men fail to face facts, they make futile the finest faculties they possess . . . In the troublous times in which we live, equanimity, fearlessness, honest courage, and a high faith are the unique contributions she can make to the needs of men. . . . The glory of our faith is its perennially fresh vitality. The spontaneous novelty of it comes from the wellsprings of eternal life in the age-long Heart of God."

BOOK REVIEWS

TOWARD RELIEF, by Hoxie Neale Fairchild. 157 pages, price $1.75. Published by The Macmillan Co. New York City.

This is a book written by a well informed man who found it difficult to accept the truths of Christianity at first but now, as he confesses, he sees "That after all, there is something in it." His main difficulty was intellectual. He states in the Preface that ". . Although my book is extremely personal, I have shrunk from the stylistic egotism of 'giving testimony'." This is the prevailing note of the whole book. The best classification is that it is a fine Apology in the spirit and style of an honest doubter who when he saw for himself, he demonstrated the courage of his convictions in his crying with Thomas, "My Lord and my God."

The reading of the book will stimulate those who have suffered a similar experience in faith and are confused as to what to believe and what not to believe. It contains much information from many theological, philosophical and literary sources. Moreover, it is our personal joy and gratification to know that Dr. Fairchild is a communicant of the Church of Saint Mary the Virgin, in New York City, confirmed last year. The reviewer finds in this book as fine a discussion on realistic theology as he has ever seen in recent years coming from the pen of one who does not claim to be a theologian in the strict sense of the word. The younger of the clergy will find in this book a real food for thought and inspiration. We welcome it from his pen and remain in hope that he will write another in the same spirit and courage in the future.

FAITH THAT PROPELS, by G. Ray Jordan. 208 pages, price $1.50, published by The Cokesbury Press, Nashville, Tenn.

A book of fifteen sermons by the author of "Courage That Propels," who is the pastor of Centenary Methodist Church in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. He points out the need of a vital religious faith to lead us through these difficult times and solve these difficult problems. Eight of the sermons are in a form of question, such as "Why Be Good?" "Character Or Chaos?" "Your Religion—a Load Or A Lift?" This is interesting and suggestive. He puts forward a convincing reason that religion is a lift and not a load! The last sermon on "The World's Progress—What Next?" The preacher says "Only as we build in the realm of the spirit can we build permanently." (P. 207.)

Each sermon contains illustrations from many sources that make the reading suggestive and interesting.

The Ministry

By A. HUGO BLANKINGSHIP,

Dean of Holy Trinity Cathedral, Habana, Cuba.

St. John 15:16. "Ye did not choose me, but I chose you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide."

WE are gathered here this morning to give our witness to the source of the creation and the continuity of The Sacred Ministry of The Church, and with Divine assistance to do our part to perpetuate it in the world. We fully realize our joyful privilege and our solemn responsibility. The office of the ministry was not created by man nor can it be continued by man alone. This service is not of our making, not of our choice; it has its origin from God, it is for us to accept and use, rather, to be used by it. In it we link ourselves to the glorious life of The Church of the past and to that still more glorious Church, which is to come. As living channels we pass on to another, that which we have received, viz,: the office, work and authority of a priest in The Church of God. We dare not do otherwise. The source of this act is found at the beginning of The Christian Era, if we take into account the complete purpose of God, it is to be found at the very foundations of the world. God in His infinite wisdom from the beginning chose to reveal His purpose and love through man. This is the glory of man, that he shares with God the building of His Kingdom and its order. It is important that we get this point of view, that our act today is not of our choosing, but in obedience with God's Holy will. Only as we understand and appreciate this, can we give the ministry its proper place in the history of the world. One does not chose the ministry, but he is chosen by the compulsion of those invisible, but real forces, which finally shape the destiny of man. One cannot seek the ministry, he is sought and found. His liberty is only in obedience to The Divine Call. The call might come suddenly or it might be the result of gradual and accumulating evidences which point to no other way than that of The Sacred Ministry. This is the conviction that gives one the boldness to undertake such an adventure and task.

In the fulness of time God sent His only Begotten Son, Our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, into the world to proclaim the blessed news of His everlasting love and salvation. Through the ministry of Jesus, we can discover something of the plan and purpose of God and we can also discover the purpose, which God has for us. Jesus in due and appointed time continued His own God-given mission by the calling, training and the sending forth of The Twelve. This was the first link, which holds the Christian ministry to its Divine origin. As to the full details of how and in what manner the next few links were made, how this original God-sent Christian ministry was passed on from the first Apostles to those of the succeeding generations, is a question of considerable debate and the record of the facts is too obscure to give any certainty; but there can be no question concerning the passing on of this life of the spirit. We cannot believe that the office, work and authority of the ministry of Christ came to an end with the Apostolic Age. To the contrary, we believe that which Christ began with and in the Apostles continued, that through them and their successors He extended the spirit of His life. So our act this morning has a far deeper signficance than the witnessing to the long life of The Church, we are also bearing witness to The Incarnation and the continuity of the life of The Spirit. This and this alone gives importance to what we are doing. And the realization that this act is of God and not of man gives us a deep sense of humility, but it also gives a sense of independence and authority. When men ask the question, by what authority is the ministry of The Church exercised, we can only say as St. Peter said when he was brought before the Sanhedrin, "In the name and authority of Jesus Christ." From Him comes the power and continuing life of the ministry.

THE Holy Catholic Church and its ministry have other characteristics besides that of continuity. They have a spiritual content, a unique content. We find these characteristics in the ministry of Jesus. He revealed them in what He said, in what He did and in what He expected His disciples to do. Of the many characteristics of The Christian ministry, two especially stand out. The Christian ministry is above all a ministry of Unity and Reconciliation.

A ministry of unity in that it is a unifying power which draws men together into a common fellowship. Jesus spoke much concerning The Kingdom. All of His teaching and preaching had a far-reaching social significance. He saw the world as a home and humanity as one great family. He was fully aware of the disintegrating forces which would destroy unity and fellowship. So in the midst of the world's confusion He built His Church, a rallying point, a binding force, drawing and holding men together. This was not a new force in the world, the prophets of the older dispensation, The Temple, The Synagogue, had been unifying centers, but His was a fulfilment of the promise they made, a more perfect and compelling instrument for unity. He laid this burden of binding all men together in one loving kingdom upon all of those He called to do His work. And today as ever this task stands out pre-eminently as the great work of a priest of God, leading a divided world into the ways of oneness in God. It is a most difficult task, but a God-given one and because it is God-given we can hope for final victory. Doubtless God does use many ways in bringing the unity of mankind to pass, but He has chosen The Church and Her ministry to be one of the most helpful ways in accomplishing this work. A priest must use his greatest efforts towards the end of unity.

The other chief characteristic of The Sacred Ministry is that it is a ministry of Reconciliation. A ministry of bringing God to man and man to God. As it seeks to bind man to man, it dares also to bind man to God. It is above all a ministry of salvation." I have come to seek and to save that which is lost," said the Master. And He called and sent His disciples upon the high adventure of seeking and saving the souls of men. This strong conviction, that they were seekers of men for God was the compelling force which drove the first disciples to the then known ends of the earth with breathless haste. And this love of souls is the compelling force of the ministry today. And this is the real test of the validity of orders, whether they be of Christ or not, do they bear the fruit of salvation, this is the claim of catholicity. There is much talk about the decline of the influence of the ministry; the ministry can have the same power as it possessed in the first days of Christian history, if it will use its God-given power. It is only when it loses sight of The Divine purpose of unity and salvation that it suffers, when it allows itself to be stopped channels of God's grace. The world today, as ever, is faced with apparently insoluble problems, weary with the futility of many things, torn and divided by greed and selfishness, helplessly lost in its own confusion, only God

Cornwall---Truro Cathedral

By H. MARTIN P. DAVIDSON,

A Correspondent in England.

THE Diocese of Truro comprises the county of Cornwall, England's most southwestern county. For centuries Cornwall was included in the see of Exeter, but about fifty years ago it was constituted a new diocese. Truro was taken for the see city, and a cathedral begun, the south choir aisle of which includes part of the old parish church of St. Mary. The style of architecture adopted was the Early English, and especially fine is the first sight of the cathedral dominating the little town that one gets from the train window. The guide book to the cathedral is a model, having notes on the building on one page, and on the opposite one directions for prayer and intercession with relation to the part of the building described. The Baptistry, for example, is a memorial to Henry Martyn, "the Truro boy who became a great scholar, missionary and saint." The windows have depicted in them scenes from his life, "a pupil in Truro Grammar School," "setting out for India from Falmouth—1805," "translating the New Testament into Persian," "buried at Tokio—1812." On one page all this is described, while on the opposite is the suggestion, "At the Baptistry remember your own Baptism," and then is printed the Collect for Easter Even and a "Prayer for the Sending-out of Missionaries." In one of the side chapels is an especially interesting altar piece, a modern painting done by the wife of a Cornish vicar. The central figure is our Lord on the Cross, clad in a long white garment with His outstretched hands blessing the people. In the picture are men and women at work in the representative industries and occupations of Cornwall, farming, market-gardening, flower growing, tin mining, fishing, and loading a ship with china clay.

The war memorial takes the form of a Book of Remembrance, in which are written the names of the four thousand Cornish men who fell in the war. Over it is the legend, a challenge to the living,

"True love by life, true love by death is tried,
Live ye for England, we for England died."

Perhaps the most pathetic thing, however, is a framed prayer written by Marshal Foch, that hangs nearby. Here was a devout Christian caught in a system of life that was a denial of all Christian virtues, responsible for promoting the most frightful carnage in the name of civilization against people who were called "Huns", though they acknowledged the same religion as he did.

"I offer thee the most Sacred Blood of Jesus for the expiation necessary for the dreadful deeds of war."

Could a more pitiful dilemma be presented? In one of the windows there was a memorial to John Wesley, who was described as an "English clergyman, whose rhetorical claim that all the world was his parish naturally bred disorder. However, by his preaching and power of organizing, he did much to stir enthusiasm in an irreligious age, especially among the industrial population which, as in Cornwall, had outgrown the existing parochial machinery." The picture is of Wesley preaching in Gwenrop Pit, a nearby tin mine. Methodism is and has been a great force in Cornwall, and is a living judgment on the Church in the Eighteenth Century. The newly appointed Bishop of Truro, himself a native of Cornwall and formerly a Wesleyan, one was told, made a special gesture of friendliness and a plea for cooperation when he was "enthroned" as the English have it, in June.

A church in the county of Cornwall that has attracted much attention in recent years is that of St. Hilary, about ten miles east of Penzance. The vicar, the Rev. Bernard Walke, has just published his memories under the title, "Twenty Years at St. Hilary." He is an advanced Anglo-Catholic, and some of his ceremonial practices have met with opposition, but he has put a modern medievalism in his church that is interesting. During the war he found himself unable to square the carnage with his following of Christ, and as a result he found himself in the company of pacifists, Quakers and men of like mind, and his catholicity may have been broadened by that! Inside the church, which is a very old one, is at once striking; modern artists, among whom is the vicars wife, have painted or carved their offerings and acts of devotions. An altar in the north aisle has a lovely picture of the Visitation of Mary the Mother of Jesus to Elizabeth. Both figures are peasant women, bare-foot and simple, yet thoroughly reverent. Another altar has a great carved reredos in gray stone with turrets and windows, the whole representing the Heavenly Jerusalem. Here is a modern picture of St. Francis, there one of Joan of Arc. Roof and screens are painted gayly, but not in a gaudy or cheap manner, quite as the medieval church would have done. Over the chancel screen is a lovely figure of the youthful Christ with arms outstretched against a cross in an attitude of blessing. Reverence and devotion speak throughout the church, and by some unknown means, the horrible relics of mid-Victorian and even an earlier piety, weeping willow trees and angels of death mourning over sarcophagi are absent.

One of the chief glories of England must surely be her cathedral choirs. Two types of music are heard most frequently now, one is that purest type of English church music, that of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, and the other is what modern English choirmasters are writing in the classical idiom but with an accent of their own. Among these latter, one might name Martin Shaw, Vaughan Williams and Gustav Holst, who has lately died. In Exeter a choir of a dozen or so boys and six men sang gloriously at Morning Prayer, or Matins, as the English say, perhaps, more correctly than we. The Te Deum and Benedictus were by Alan Gray, organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the anthem was a setting of Charles Wesley's "Christ Whose Glories Fill the Skies" by Thomas Armstrong, who was organist at Exeter before he went to Christ Church, which is both college chapel and cathedral in Oxford. If these were examples of the modern school, we may rest easily and even join in the Te Deum. Evensong was a more popular service in the nave of the cathedral, where choir desks and a pulpit have been set up for such services. The building was well filled, and the singing splendid, though by volunteers, it was noted on the service lists. As almost always in England, Psalms and Versicles and Responses were sung, as well as Hymns and Canticles, and one wonders if the oft-spoken dislike for sung services that one hears in America has ever experienced them in England, or elsewhere for that matter.

The preacher at Exeter was the new Dean, Dr. S. C. Carpenter, lately Master (i. e., Preacher) of the Temple Church (the church of the law students and professors in London), and editor of "Theology". His theme in the morning was Sir Thomas More, or rather,

News from the Front

(The Southern Churchman believing that missions constitute the life of the Church hereby invites the missionaries of our Church to write letters to this paper describing the work they are doing in an interesting way, so that our people may know more of what is going on in the mission field.)

China Needs Help at Once.

"Thousands of sufferers from the summer floods along the Yangtse and Han Rivers are in dire need of food and shelter. They look to America and the Christian Church for help in their extremity."

That is the message that comes from the Rt. Rev. Alfred A. Gilman, Suffragan Bishop of Hankow, and from Dr. J. J. Heady, Chairman of the Hupeh Synod of the Methodist Church.

The Rt. Rev. Logan H. Roots, Bishop of Hankow, cables from Europe that he supports Bishop Gilman's appeal for immediate relief. "Many thousands of Chinese," he says, "are homeles and destitute. Immediate relief will do a vast amount in lifting morale as well as meeting the emergency. Let those who hear, in this emergency, the call of God to help, act at once. I know from my own experience in the great flood of 1931 how heavy is the burden of facing the first weeks of a great disaster. We must stand by our representatives in China in helping them to aid those who have suffered so terribly in the destructive floods of the early summer."

Gifts to help in meeting the situation may be sent to the Department of Foreign Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, or directly to Bishop Alfred A. Gilman, 43 Tungting Road, Hankow, China, American postoffice money orders and personal checks are negotiable in that part of China.

Bishop Roots writes that it is hard for him to stay away from China at this time, but that he feels in justice to his future work in the Diocese of Hankow he must comply with the directions of the medical adviser of the Department of Foreign Misions. His health shows steady improvement and he hopes to start back to China before the end of October.

Indians of the Amazon Basin.

The Inland South America Missionary Union, with headquarters at 113 Fulton Street, New York City, undertakes the arduous task of reaching the uncivilized Indians of the Amazon basin. Perhaps there is no field which presents more difficulties in all the missionary spheres. The debilitating climate, the infesting beasts, reptiles and insects, the hostility of the witch doctors who hold the Indians in subjection and the low mentality of the Indians themselves, all offer insuperable barriers. And yet, the volunteers for this mission are so dedicated to the effort that they cannot be deterred from entering the field.

There are thirty-seven missionaries, four of whom are in the homeland. The mission is supported entirely by voluntary offerings. No personal appeals are made. It was incorporated by the State of New York in 1921, and is thus entitled to bequests by interested supporters.

The fruits of this undenominational mission have been most gratifying. The slowly penetrating light has entered the minds and hearts of these simple children of the jungle. They show that they are capable of spiritual culture. Marriage becomes a sacred tie; children are no longer treated as animals; the aged are not only saved from the brutal burial alive when they become a burden; and the morality of the tribes, though at times not in entirety converted to Christianity, is uplifted. Even the treacherous witch doctors have been touched with the need of a better life. The Terenas have become almost wholly Christian, with their own pastors, as a result of the faithful ministry of one of the missionary families of this Union. There is now a Bible school organized in one of the outposts of the Union. This will train the Indians to go to their own people.

With about four hundred different tribes to reach and an innumerable company of souls waiting for the salvation of our Lord Jesus, the board of directors of this Mission hold a sacred trust.

Source of Whole Modern Library Movement in China.

Mr. Samuel T. Y. Seng, head of Boone Library School and of Boone Library, in a recent letter speaks of the contrast in available resources between the Church's library (Boone) and non-missionary institutions. For example, another Chinese college library has more than $100,000 Mex. to spend annually on books and periodicals. Boone has no appropriation at all for that purpose, except what little help the C. P. C. can give. Many classes of books cannot be kept up and the library cannot meet the demands made upon it.

"I write this not with a desire to compete with the other library," Mr. Seng says, "but we must try to keep our heads above water. . . . We are not afraid of competition, for those others depend upon money while we have men of strong Christian character."

The Boone Library and Library School, started many years ago, have been the source of the whole modern library movement in China. The Boone Library School graduates now hold most of the responsible positions in modern Chinese libraries and their work has brought prestige to the school.

Is This Support of the Mission of the Church?

One of the women missionaries in the Orient, carrying a heavy load of work and responsibility, writes that the people in her station have "read in the pastoral issued by the bishops at the close of the Convention, that 'the dominant note of the Convention was a determined and enthusiastic support of the world-wide mission of the Church'. The only results which have come to us have been first, the decree that the members of the Mission must pay twenty per cent of their medical and dental bills. Next, we received a further cut of five per cent in salary. Some of our staff say that this means for them, neglect of dental needs and of physical welfare generally, because reduced salaries are insufficient in most cases even to meet normal living expenses."

CORNWALL—TRURO CATHEDRAL.

St. Thomas More. The Church of England has deliberately accepted the Pope's canoization of More rather to the annoyance and discomfort of Roman Catholics. The canonization proceedings in the case of More and John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, both of whom were executed for refusing to accept the King as Head of the Church, was part of a well-calculated move on the part of Rome to appeal to Englishmen. For example, the usual miracles which are necessary before a man or woman can be declared a saint were dispensed with in this case, though for years a sign has hung in the Roman Cathedral in London urging the faithful to pray that the "proper miracles be vouchsafed". Was it because Rome in her almost infinite wisdom knows that miracles do not appeal to Englishmen? Of course, More and Fisher were martyrs to a tyrannical religious persecution, just as were Cranmer and Latimer and Rideley in a later reign, though the issues were turned. But in addition many Englishmen are seeing that More may also be said to have been opposing a Totalitarian State in which all loyalties, spiritual and religious, as well as cultural and intellectual, were to be subordinated to the political. It does not in the least matter that More's religious loyalty happens to have been to Rome. The issue is one that is very alive today, in Germany, in Russia, even in Italy. So Thomas More was clear-headed enough to see where the logic of Henry VIII's position led, and the fact that Englishmen as ever avoided it because they aren't likely to be bound by logic doesn't alter the case. Tomorrow Anglo-Saxons may be forced with such claims as are their German cousins today. In times of war they clearly are in such a case. We may do well to weigh the whole question of loyalty of conscience and national loyalty afresh, probably we are going to be forced to do so. Here the newest St. Thomas may stand us in good stead.

and slums and compelling them to come in? No, they wouldn't come, and they wouldn't be wanted, and yet there may be many who "Thirst for the Word of God."

Then, why not take the Church to the slums? Why not hold services in a vacant house or store, or lot, or street corner, if no other place is available. Let the Young People's Service League stage an open-air service. "The vision of a new social order has captured the imagination of young people. It is urgent that they should find leadership in the Church." With the church behind them, they will develop the leadership in themselves. It would be an exciting experiment!

There is the call for the work of all the Church's organizations. Let us adopt some of the Church Army methods, the Hiking Troubadour's motto is "Go for Souls". Start the Revival—that word rather scorned by Episcopalians, but so needed now. Many Christians have been looking eagerly and expectantly for this spiritual awakening, possibly on a world scale. They have thought it due to come soon.

The Church is facing many indictments today. It is said that the Church "is dead, for it has had no vision of what program should be followed, even within one mile of the altar".

It has been called "socially illiterate". "It doesn't see things except at a distance—let Christians expose themselves to the injustices which are at the heart of our economic order and it will get them, get them to the depths".

Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin goes further—"Now we see our civilization for what it is—spiritually hollow, cruel, blind, literally sliding toward hell; and unless Christ's Gospel is preached quickly, fearlessly, and passionately, ours is a lost word."

Bishop Perry writes: "Throughout the length and breadth of the land, there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with concern, not merely with this or that financial plan for rehabilitation. What we are all turning to now is the need of the Soul. We are asking, What is the meaning of life? What has Christianity to offer for a solution?"

Stanley Jones in his "Christ's Alternative to Communism," states: "We must provide something better than Marxian Communism, or succumb to it. In other words, that system will hold the future which does most for man."

The dominant responsibility for the moral and spiritual condition of the nation does lie at the door of the Churches.

The hour for Christianity to assume control has struck.

"Christ is rising again. His spirit is coming back to life in the passion for the underprivileged, in the belief in the common man. We must struggle for the existence of others. Facts are pushing man to the only open-door, the Kingdom of God. If we can get men to respond to the emotion of the ideal of the Kingdom of God on earth, then vast changes could be made in the total life of humanity, and they could be made in one generation. But let men see the Kingdom of God as a really possible way, the only possible way, and this latent Christianity will burst into flame."

Revival may be nearer than we suppose!

Then let your church, my church become the heart, the pivotal point to stretch out its loving arms until it touches the ministering arms of its nearest neighbors.

"And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to me."

THE MINISTRY.

can unify it and only God can save it. It is the glory of The Christian minister to proclaim this message, to bear abiding fruit. When the minister of God speaks with conviction and courage based upon a religious experience, "Thus saith The Lord," the world will listen, many will be awakened and seek salvation and fellowship. A ministry true to its high calling and its life of the spirit is still a powerful instrument in the hand of God.

THE priestly office of preserving and keeping alive the traditions and customs of The Church is an important one, but only so if it keeps one close to this unifying and saving purpose of God. One is a priest that he might tell better the story of salvation and heal more quickly the wounded spirits of men. Faithful priests, zealous to exhalt The Lord Christ, are ever fearless prophets. The functions of priest and prophet have often been separated and put into conflict with each other; this should not be, they should supplement and complete each other; both are needed to bind and to heal. But it is true, that the long record of the Church shows that these functions have opposed each other and there is still evidence that this strife is not ended. It is difficult to keep a balance between the two, not to emphasize the one to the hurt of the other. Man has ever found it difficult to keep a balance among his many activities. A perfect balance comes only with the perfect man. We have, however, reasons to believe that the Anglican Communion has to a remarkable degree found a balance between these two functions, between the emphasis on tradition and authority on the one hand and that of freedom and experiment on the other. It has kept the traditions without being tied too closely to the dead hand of the past and it has room for the enthusiastic message of the prophet. The Anglican Communion values the accumulated experience of the corporate mind of the Church, it also values the open mind ready to receive new revelations through the guidance of The Holy Spirit. It is catholic in holding to the original message and the essential characteristics of the Apostolic ministry, it is protestant against everything which attempts to usurp its freedom of mind.

Power unto Unity and Salvation. Amen.

A PROGRAM ON DOMESTIC MISSION WORK.

By Program Committee, Holy Trinity Y. P. S. L., West Palm Beach, Fla.

Setting.

Office of Bishop Creighton, Executive Secretary of Domestic Mission work.

Characters.

Bishop Creighton.
His Secretary.
Mr. Average Churchman, from Hometown Parish.
Secretary for each of the following domestic mission fields:
Negro work;
Indian Missions;
Foreign-born in large cities;
Mountaineers;
Rural communities and isolated persons.

(Curtain discloses Bishop Creighton working at desk near center of stage. There are several chairs ranged along right side of stage. Bishop Creighton's secretary is seated at small desk near rear door, back stage left. Both are very busy.)

Mr. Average Churchman (appearing at door): Pardon me, but is this Bishop Creighton's office?

Secretary: Yes, it is. Is there anything I can do for you?

Mr. Average Churchman: I would like to talk to the Bishop.

Secretary: Bishop Creighton is very busy today. Could I make an appointment for you to see him some other time?

Mr. Average Churchman: I am Mr. Average Churchman from Hometown Parish and will only be here today. I would like to talk to him while I am here.

Secretary: I am sure the Bishop would be very glad to see you. Just a moment and I will ask him what time can be arranged. (Goes to Bishops desk. Pantomime conversation.)

Secretary (returning to Mr. Average Churchman): The Bishop will see you now.

Secretary: Bishop Creighton, this is Mr. Average Churchman from Hometown Parish.

Bishop Creighton: How do you do?

Mr. Average Churchman: I am glad to know you, sir.

Bishop Creighton: What can I do for you?

Mr. Average Churchman: I have often wondered why, in a country such as ours, where the Church is so firmly established, it should be necessary to spend so much money on domestic mission work. Church members everywhere are continually being asked to contribute to the various mission projects. Perhaps you, being executive secretary of domestic missions, could tell me the need for this.

Bishop Creighton: I am very glad that you have come to me. The Church does seem well established here in this country, but few people realize how small a part it plays in the lives of the less fortunate people who live among us. The mission worker's task is to bring all of these people within the folds of the Church, but this is a difficult one, unless he has the support, both moral and material, of every member of the Church. This morning I am receiving reports from the secretaries of the various domestic mission fields. I would be pleased to have you listen to them (to secretary): Will you tell the secretaries of the various fields to come in now?

Enter secretaries of mission fields. Take seats in chairs, stage right.

Bishop Creighton (to secretaries): This is Mr. Average Churchman from Hometown Parish. He would like to know something of our work, so I have asked him to listen to your reports this morning. First, may we hear from the secretary of the work among the Negroes.

Secretary of Negro Work: The work of our Church among the Negroes is not yet nationally organized. The reason for this is easily seen: The Negro congregation in our country is not concentrated in any one locality, but scattered throughout the white dioceses. Industrial developments in the North during recent years have caused a constant migration to the Northern States. These conditions make it impossible to organize the colored congregations into a diocese of their own; however, appropriations are given by the National Council to the Southern, and other dioceses, where large Negro congregations are found, and under their direction the work is steadily progressing.

According to a recent count, there are in the United States 287 Negro congregations, 170 clergymen and 40,000 or more communicants. These figures are very encouraging.

Perhaps the Church's greatest accomplishment has been through its educational work. The American Church Institute for Negroes has made a very definite contribution toward the education of the Negro. The Institute consists of nine schools—the Bishop Payne Divinity School in Virginia, which has turned out over two-thirds of our colored clergymen, and eight industrial high schools scattered throughout the Southern States. About two-thirds of the annual cost of maintaining the Institute is paid either through endowments or by means of the labor of its students.

One of the greatest obstacles to the Negro work lies in the attitude of the white people themselves, who will not practice the doctrine of spiritual equality as taught by the Church. But with the passing years, racial prejudices are gradually being overcome, and more and more white people are lending themselves to bring the Negro within the folds of the Church.

Bishop Creighton: Thank you. Now let us hear of the Church's work among the Mountaineers.

Secretary of Mountaineers: It was forty-odd years ago that Archdeacon Neve began his ministry to the hill people in the Blue Ridge Mountains in Virginia. Since that time there has grown up a strong Church. More than twelve hundred of these people in communities far back in the mountains are communicants, and hundreds more have been baptized. Missions, which are scattered throughout the mountain region, are prepared to offer education, relief to the sick and injured, and spiritual guidance to the people which they serve. The results, where the missions have become well established, are very apparent.

Church bells echo through the hills, calling people to worship. Congregations crowd the churches. Offerings are generous. More and more the people are helping to support their own mission chapels.

The schools have given many boys and girls opportunities which once would have been unknown to them. From the little day schools, they go to industrial high schools, and from there the most promising are sent on to college, that they may return to teach their own people. Children who attend these schools not only carry home with them knowledge that will make their lives more comfortable, but also new ideas of religion and love.

And so, with an ever-increasing demand, the work goes on. Often the question arises, "Is it worth while?" I think so, don't you?

Bishop Creighton: May we hear from the Secretary of work among the Indians?

Secretary of Indians: Within the borders of the United States there are over 300,000 Indians living in more than two score states. They speak fifty languages and are in 200 distinct tribal groups. They constitute one of the major problems confronting the Church, the government, and interested social agencies.

The work of the Church must assume several phases. First, must overcome the natural hatred which the Indians feel toward the white man. Then he must be educated and trained to live life in the white man's way, and he must be won from pagan beliefs to the worship of the true God.

This great work is being carried on in the dioceses where Indians are found by means of mission chapel, schools and hospitals. The work is progressing rapidly, but there is much yet to be done for great are the abstacles to be overcome.

Bishop Creighton: Let us now hear what the Church is doing among the foreign-born in the large cities.

Secretary of Foreign-born: When many immigrants come to this country, they have the idea that the streets are literally paved with gold and that all their worries are over. When they become poverty-stricken because of inability to adapt themselves, and are forced to live in slums of our big cities, they soon take a strong dislike to America, and all that is American. It is people in this state of mind that the Church must deal with.

In order to help them, missions have been established in the slums of all the large cities. Trained social workers go among them, teaching to read and write the English language, how to cook and sew in the American way, and how to use their money to the best advantage. Their children are placed in schools and the men are placed at jobs as often as possible. With such treatment, the disgruntled immigrant soon becomes a happy American.

Bishop Creighton: And lastly, may we hear something from the Secretary of Rural Work?

Secretary of Rural Work: There are many places throughout the nation where homes are so widely separated that it is impossible to form a parish. This is true especially in the arid region of the great Southwest. It is the aim of the Church that no one who desires its benefits shall be deprived of its ministrations. To this end the blessings of baptism, confirmation, communion and the other sacraments are carried wherever there is need or call.

Bishop Creighton: I thank you all for your encouraging reports, but we must continue our efforts more diligently than ever to carry Christ's religion of love to all people in our nation and throughout the world. And now, Mr. Average Churchman, what do you think of our domestic missions program?

Mr. Average Churchman (enthusiastically): I cannot thank you too much for this opportunity to hear of the Church's splendid work here at home. I had never stopped to consider before how many there were close around us who have not received the Church's benefit, but there shall never again be any doubt in my mind as to the need for domestic missions.

(Curtain.)

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

VIEWS OF POLITICAL AND RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK IN LATIN AMERICA AND ORIENT TOLD BY DR. WOOD AT SEWANEE SUMMER SCHOOL.

In a recent interview, Dr. John W. Wood, of New York City, secretary for Foreign Missions of the National Council in United States and teacher in the Sewanee Summer Training School, now in session, expressed some interesting views on the political and religious outlook in the Latin American countries and in the Orient. Dr. Wood has spent many years in Mexico, South America, Haiti, Central America and the Orient. He has visited the Orient five times, spending long periods there each time. He is considered an authority on the culture and conditions of those localities, on account of his long research and study in these foreign parts.

Dr. Wood's class in the Sewanee Summer Training School has for its purpose the creation of a better understanding of the Latin American character, the development of Latin American civilization and the work of the Church in those countries.

The work of the Church in Brazil, Mexico, the Panama Zone, in China and Japan was discussed by Dr. Wood.

"In Brazil," said Dr. Wood, "we have the best missions of any communion in the world. They were founded by four Virginians of remarkable intellect and talent, in 1889. They consist of 110 completely organized and well-planned congregations, the largest of which is in Rio Grande de Soule. These four Virginians, Lucien Kinsolving, James W. Morris (who is the only living one now), William C. Brown and John G. Meem started with nothing. Because of the early Spanish influence, both in Mexico and in South America, these peoples accepted Christian teachings in our form more readily than did Oriental peoples, who had a completely non-Christian background. In Mexico, although there was a struggle for several decades to keep a Bishop active there, our work is now progressing. At present the mission work is almost entirely among the under-privilegd, and is concentrated in central Mexico, from Mexico City, in each direction. We have a fine Mexican clergy there now.

"In the Orient," said Dr. Wood, "although we have some fine missions, it has taken 100 years there to thirty years in the Latin American nations, on account of the non-Christian backgrounds of the people. The National Church in China has a membership of 60,000, and in Japan it has 45,000, with a growing number of clergy in each. The Episcopal Church also has many fine institutions, among them: St. John's University in Shanghai, St. Paul's University in Tokyo, St. Hilda's School for Girls in China and St. Margaret's in Japan. The finest missionary hospital in the world is St. Luke's in Tokyo. They are doing a great work. There are now only four American doctors and fifty Japanese doctors. A large part of the nursing staff is Japanese."

"What of the Episcopal Church's work in Central America?" Dr. Wood was asked.

"The Church's work in Central America consists mainly of work in the Panama Canal one. There the work is both with the natives, who are mainly West Indian, and among the white population, which is the ever-changing army and navy. However, we feel that that work is highly important, for although the army and navy officers move on quickly, they carry their religion, sometimes acquired there, with them, thereby reaching more and more people."

In response to a few questions of political and international nature, Dr. Wood expressed some sage views. "What of the report that South America is the coming continent of the world, commercially and politically speaking?"

"Brazil and Argentina, especially, seem to be the up-and-coming nations of South America," said Dr. Wood. "The type of population there is of the more energetic order. Especially in the raising and shipping of beef to American packing houses, has Argentina advanced in the last few years. That industry shows promise of a great future."

"Do you think this country is adopting a more enlightened policy toward South America?" he was asked.

As South America learns to know this country better, the people will understand that our policy has never been unfriendly to them. Some South Americans are still suspicious of the Monroe Doctrine. but this feeling is gradually disappearing. The attitude of the present administration is very friendly to the South American people. I am not sure it is wise for us to promise no intervention, for it might be wise and expedient for us—for the sake of South America—not for the mere sake of intervention—to go to the aid of South America, at some time. This is also true of Haiti, where I spent fifteen years. The marines have been withdrawn, but there is no way of telling whether at some future time, the marines—or the government could not be extremely valuable to Haiti—if they were in need of aid."

"What are your impressions of the Japanese attitude toward China? Are the people as war-like as the government?"

"The people of Japan—and the government of Japan—are not as war-like as the army and navy. A peculiar condition exists there. The army and navy are responsible only to the emperor. When they decide that their emperor—or their country has been insulted or put upon (being an extremely loyal and patriotic race) they fight. I've no doubt that the army and navy often embarrass the emperor. Japan's attitude toward China has been over-emphasized as being entirely aggressive. Japan simply feels that she has a big, overgrown, under-developed neighbor. This neighbor is being taught Communism by Russia. To Japan, Communism is a distinct threat. There is no doubt that Japan wants and needs land, but, on the other hand, there are already 250,000 Japs in Manchuria, the most talked of aggression of Japan, and Japan would hardly need to sacrifice lives and land she already occupies. The Chinese are a great people. The main difficulty lies in the fact that they are not organized as well as the Japanese. They fight among themselves. There is the possibility that even if Japan conquered China physically, China might still absorb the Japanese race, as she did the Manchus. I do not feel, therefore, that Japan is as aggressive as the pictures are painted. She simply likes order and organization—she has learned to play games. China hasn't. The Chinese have not the homogeneous qualities which make up a successful nation yet.

CHURCH ARMY MISSION SISTERS GET RESULTS.

Mission Sister L. Sherman, stationed near Scottsboro, Alabama, recently reported that on visiting the home of one of the children of the Daily Vacation Bible School, the mother said, "My husband drinks and sometimes we don't dare go to church. He threatens to kill us. We try not to do anything to oppose him. We like the Episcopal Church. I'm willing for the girl to be baptized, but dont dare do so. Perhaps the mission will in some way help my husband."

Captain Conder, who is preaching at mission here, visited the home and found the man under a tree reading the Bible. At the clos eof the mission during the singing of "Stand up for Jesus", the man and wife and children all came forward to be baptized.

From South Dakota, Mission Sister C. Gunton tells of one new family with six small children brought into contact with the Church. "Three of the children attended Bible School and the whole family turned out for the service and picnic. The oldest child, a girl of ten, quite surprised me one day as I was walking down the road with her. She said, 'You know I like that prayer you say beginning 'Our Father'. Mother had a copy of it on a paper and the other day she sent me upstairs to take care of the baby and I took the paper with me and learned it.'"

These consecrated Mission Sisters of Church Army do get results.

HOBART ADDS POLICE SCHOOL.

A police school for peace officers of the six counties surrounding Geneva, New York, has been announced by Chief of Police R. W. Morris, of Geneva, and Professor of Sociology James M. Williams, of Hobart College. The school, to be known as the Hobart College Police School, will open at the college October 1, and classes will be held several times a week for the ensuing eight weeks. The counties included in the school are Cayuga, Ontario, Seneca, Tompkins, Wayne and Yates. Mindful of the changing nature of the nations crime problem, the school will offer a broad curriculum centering on the technical training of peace officers, but including also subjects important for judges, justices of the peace, district attorneys, police commissioners, sheriffs and others. The aim of the school will be to furnish instruction without charge and so enable peace officers and others to profit by this opportunity. So far as is known, the only other college which has a similar course is Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania.

J. Edgar Hoover, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, will cooperate in the program.

ABYSSINIA.

Primate's Appeal to the League.

The following message has been sent to M. Avenol, secretary-general of the League of Nations, by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of Upsala, Primate of Sweden:

"Convinced that we are speaking in the name of multitudes of Christian people throughout the world, we appeal to the Council of the League of Nations to use every possible effort to secure a peaceful settlement of the dispute between Italy and Abyssinia and to prevent the outbreak of a war between two members of the League, which would shock the conscience of the world.

SEMI-NUDITY ON THE STAGE.

Action by the Public Morality Council of London.

At a meeting of the Public Morality Council in London yesterday week, attended by about seventy delegates from the eighty-nine societies represented on the Council, a campaign against semi-nudity on the stage was unanimously approved.

After the meeting an official statement was issued, which gave a precis of the Bishop of London's speech. He said that he had led a deputation to the Lord Chamberlain on the subject. They were not prepared to tolerate any longer exhibitions of semi-nudity on the stage in emotional surroundings.

The Bishop of Kingston expressed concurrence with these views. He urged the council to make it quite clear that this quetsion of semi-nudity on the stage was distinctly separated from any question of nudism or of the degrees of nudity observed in sea-bathing and sun-bathing on the beach. It was understood, he said, that many of the girls had to accept the conditions or lose their jobs.

A Public Protest.

The meeting agreed that the Council should concentrate in fighting semi-nudity on the stage and call a public meeting in the autumn for which, it was hoped, speakers representative of all ranks would be secured. The desirability of associating members of the theatrical profession with the campaign was urged, and the meeting had before it a confidential digest of the views on both sides of the question. Miss Edith Neville, as chairman of the Stage Plays Committee, addressed the meeting. She thought the Council ought to give the public details of the situation in a reasoned statement, at the same time making it clear what the Council regarded as permissible without offense to public opinion.

CHURCH TRAINING SCHOOL WILL OPEN FOR FORTY-SIXTH YEAR.

The Church Training School of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, located at 708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, will open October 2, for its forty-sixth year. The purpose of this school is to prepare young women for work in the Church, especially to supplement their secular education with a background of the Church's ideal and traditions, and to emphasize the need for highly developed techniques in the various fields of the Church's activity. Teachers, kindergartners, nurses, social workers, artists and musicians have studied at this school, and have gone from it to many parts of the world.

The young women already enrolled for the coming season, represent ten Dioceses. They will be trained for different types of Church work, some looking forward to missionary activity, at home or abroad; others preparing to be assistants in parishes of the larger cities. The training includes courses in religious and in practical subjects with ample opportunity for first hand experience in neighborhood visiting, club work and religious education. Ten weeks each summer is devoted to actual residence in institutions, such as hospitals, settlements or missions. During the past summer, the dean of the school, Miss Ethel M. Springer, visited four of the students who were engaged in rural work in the Archdeaconery of the Blue Ridge. Other students were assigned to work in institutions near Philadelphia.

Pennsylvania women, living near enough to the school to attend lectures are welcomed as day students. Bishop Taitt is president of the corporation of the school; the Venerable James F. Bullitt, warden; Miss Julia V. Sinkler, president of the board of managers.

DUBOSE TRAINING SCHOOL ANNUAL MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

The annual meeting of the board of trustees of the DuBose Memorial Church Training School was held at Sewanee, Tenn., August 8, 1935, and the reports of the president and treasurer were received, showing that the school had ended another year without incuring any debt, and had sufficient funds on hand to run along in its present condition, and it is one of the few educational institutions which has kept its expense inside of its income.

The dean, the Rev. A. G. Richards, reported that the past year had been one of the best years, and at the close of the term three men had graduated and taken positions in active work in the Church. There are now a total of 115 graduates of this school who are actively employed in the various dioceses of the country, most of them in rural work. Only one or two of all the graduates have no places, but this is on account of illness.

The following officers were re-elected for the ensuing year, or until their successors are elected:

The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, honorary chairman.

Mr. W. A. Sadd, president.

The Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, vice-president.

Mr. E. M. Ellsworth, secretary and treasury.

Mr. N. J. Simmons, assistant treasurer.

Commercial National Bank of Chattanooga, depositary.

It was reported by the dean that at the opening of the term on August 21, 1935, there would be at least five new students, which will make the number of students larger than during the past term. No student is taken unless he is a postulant of the Church, and recommended and backed by some Bishop, and in this way the class of men admitted are selected for their ability and consecration to the work.

The present board of trustees are as follows: Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, Rt. Rev. Frederick F. Reese, Rt. Rev. John D. Wing, Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, the Rev. A. G. Richards, dean; the Rev. William H. DuBose, the Rev. Oliver J. Hart, Mr. W. A. Sadd, president; Mr. Morrow Chamberlain, Mr. S. Bartow Strang, Mr. William C. Sturgis.

A CHURCH IN THE KENTISH WOODS, ENGLAND.

Last Friday was laid the foundation-stone of the little mission church of St. John the Baptist in the woodland district on the border of Charing and Westwell, in Kent. Though adjoining an important junction of main roads (writes a correspondent) the site of the new church lies in dense woods, surrounded by beech and oak. It was a perfect summer evening, and the procession of choir and clergy, with cross-bearer and banners, slowly winding along the woodland path, made a scene of unusual beauty The service was accompanied by the singing of birds; and two fox cubs were noticed peeping out wonderingly. The dedication (St. John the Baptist) recalls the fact that for 350 years Charing was a center of devotion to the Forerunner. Richard I sent home from Palestine a stone reputed to be the block on which the Baptist had been beheaded. The stone was placed by Archbishop Hubert Walter in Charing Church, and was an object of veneration to pilgrims till the Reformation. At the Reformation the block disappeared, but it is believed to lie hidden somewhere beneath the floor of Charing Church.

POOR MEN'S GARDENS IN LONDON.

"Our purpose," said Wyndham Deedes at a meeting of the London Gardens Society, "is to change every drab street into a garden." Something of what the society has accomplished will be seen at the exhibition in the Royal Horticultural Hall, Westminster, on September 6 and 7, when a fine display of flowers grown in small London gardens and allotments is expected. Beginners who have never won a prize at a flower show, and poor people whose total garden area does not exceed sixty square yards will be invited to bring the results of their efforts. London municipal authorities and horticultural societies will also show what can be done in dismal and congested neighborhoods. The "growing of flowers" by Londoners should become a habit, says the society, for many parts of the capital are sombre and others are sordid, and it is urged that even the poorest can help to make the town brighter by cultivating a box or a pot of flowers in their windows. The society hopes to distribute bulbs, plants, seedlings and cuttings, and gifts of this sort from more fortunate people in the country would be welcomed by Miss A. K. Lock at 47, Whitehall.

* * *

It must be admitted that a difficulty for the window-box gardener is that local authorities, landlords or architects often object to drippings from the boxes and to the danger from boxes insecurely fixed. The difficulty ought to be tackled fairly. It is not for an architect or a municipal landlord to say finally that the town dwelling of the future is not to be decorated with flowers. The London Gardens Society has anyhow designed a "non-drip" box. There is an old story on this subject. A tenant of a London flat informed a neighbor that she had started a window-box. "Has anything come up yet?' "No," was the answer, "only a policeman."

UNIVERSITY CHAPLAIN CONDUCTS RETREAT.

The Rev. John Crocker, Episcopal chaplain at Princeton University, will give the addresses at a retreat for the clergy at Adelynrood, South Byfield, Mass., September 9 to 12. The retreat is held annually, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of the Way of the Cross, and is open to all the clergy of the Episcopal Church. The Rev. Frederic W. Fitts, of Roxbury, Mass., is superior of the brotherhood, and the Rev. Sherrill B. Smith, of East Dedham, Mass., secretary.

ENGLISH LECTURER COMING TO BERKLEY DIVINITY SCHOOL.

The Rev. G. W. Butterworth, of London, will be the visiting English lecturer at the Berkeley Divinity School, New Haven, during the fall term of this year. Mr. Butterworth was trained at Mirfield under Neville Figgis. He is the translator of Clement of Alexander in the Loeb library. The Rt. Rev. G. K. A. Bell, Bishop of Chichester, speaks of him as "a quite remarkable man". He is vicar of the Church of the Ascension, Balham Hill. At Berkeley Mr. Butterworth will give a course on Early English Church History, and will assist in the departments of homiletics and apologetics. He will do a certain amount of outside lecturing and preaching. Those desiring to secure his services should communicate with Dean William P. Ladd.

CHURCH ARMY CAPTAIN TELLS OF SIXTY WORKING DAYS IN THE TENNESSEE VALLEY.

Between May 20 and July 28 Captain C. L. Conder, Southern Representative of Church Army, undertook a piece of work in Alabama under the direction of Bishop McDowell.

Making the House of Happiness, near Scottsboro his headquarters, the missionary made 212 visits within a four mile radius reaching 83 families.

Sunday services have been held with an average attendance of 60. Weekly Cottage Services were held with an average of 40 each. A two weeks Preaching Mission drew approximately a hundred each night, and a Children's Bible School averaged 30 attenders.

These resulted in two men, one woman, five older and two younger children being baptised.

At the Cumberland Mountain Rural Rehabilitation Project, Captain Conder made an every-week visit to the barracks, the shacks and new farmhouses; the total number of visits there being 213.

Prayer Cards issued by the Department of Religious Education at Church Missions House, have been placed in many homes, also religious pictures and 175 Bibles have been distributed to colonists.

A weekly preaching service was held through ten weeks, the average attendance being 101. A two weeks' Bible School drew 50 children together.

Captain Conder gave six days a month visiting the families attached to the Mission Chapel at Guntersville, Warren County.

The Church School was re-organized and a Confirmation Class confirmed.

Cottage Services were held on Sand Mountain and at Boaz.

On Georgia Mountain a plantation owner built a brush arbor in preparation for a week's outdoor preaching Mission.

It is probable that Church Army will be asked to continue these and other activities in that section of the Tennessee Valley.

Church Army can place a small team of missionaries and Mission Sisters at the disposal of the Bishops responsible for the work, if friends of such sane work under the auspices of the Episcopal Church will give some assistance.

A portable stereopticon, small organ and preaching tent would be required as part of the necessary equipment. From $700 to $1,000 would enable Bishop McDowell to enter in and consolidate these promises of permanent Missions.

Further particulars can be obtained from Church Army Headquarters at 414 East Fourteenth Street, New York City.

MISSIONARY DISTRICT OF HONOLULU.

Rt. Rev S. H. Littell, S. T. D., Bishop.

Kagawa.

It was a rare privilege to have Kagawa stand in the Cathedral and preach the Incarnate Christ to us. In the morning of July 7 the Cathedral was cram-jammed with every chair in our possession conscripted into use. In the evening that same day there was a very good-sized congregation, with many Japanese visitors.

"God-Consciousness" was the word most often upon Kagawa's lips—"the need of God consciousness". His sermon in the morning was "The Meaning of the Cross"—its social, its ethical, its cosmic meaning. And as he preached, we knew there was a fourth meaning of the Cross—or perhaps a meaning summing up the other three—Kagawa!

In the evening the sermon was upon the "Seven Paradoxes of Saint Paul", and was based on Second Corinthians 6. This was a glorious message of the liberty of Christ-men, illustrated generously with examples of living virtues and testimony in his own life.

It was a great day when a great man gave great witness of the great things that Jesus had done for him; a day which stirred many of us to realize the poverty of our Christian life and the meagerness of our Christian service. The Cross of Christ has saved Kagawa, saved him by revealing to him the great social message of redemption, and has set him to work on a mammoth scale to reconstruct society after the meaning and spirit of the Cross. It has saved him by his embracing its ethical import, for all who saw and heard him saw and heard a man obviously possessed in every part of him by the evangel of self-sacrifice and self-surrender. It has saved him by giving him faith in God, who, in the Cross, shows Himself eternally sacrificing Himself in self-giving love. The Cross to Kagawa has become not a thing of time and space, not a thing of the past, but a thing of eternal value and moment, to which even now we are called to unite ourselves, that through the Cross the world may be brought to God.

It was a great message, preached by a great man, through the great power of the Holy Ghost.

Young People's Conference.

Mokuleia, August 31-September 2.

A Camp by the sea.

Fellowship.

A hundred young people living in Community.

Lively discussion on present-day problems.

Camp-fire, games, rallies, discussions.

That about tells the story. And to this Young People's Conference all young people over sixteen are invited.

Everything that an active committee of young people can do to make the Conference alive, attractive and valuable is being done. The plans are almost complete. And now remains only the registrations to be made. The cost for the conference will be $3.00, which pays for everything.

All those who have been to these conferences will want to come again, and they will find this one bigger and better. Those who have not had the experience will not be sorry if they register this year. THE MORE THE MERRIER.

And when the last verdict of the Conference is written, it will be, "A good time was had by all". But that won't tell the whole story, for we will all learn things there that will make life more worth living, and add power and zest and grace to our lives.

So all aboard and join the crowd!—Hawaiian Church Chronicle.

Creating Public Opinion.

The Washington Clergy Committee, Canon William Sheafe Chase, D. D., acting chairman, has been organized with a view to creating public opinion against the pending Italio-Ethiopian war and for the purpose of influencing Congress to take some steps in connection with the Pact of Paris, signed by the United States and sixty-two other nations, including the two conflicting peoples. In the light of the international declaration never to seek solution of international difficulties "except by pacific means", this committee proposes to do what it can to hold the nations true to this declaration.

Significant Musical Event.

Dr. Finley Williamson, head of the famed Westminster Choir, conducted a festival of sacred music this summer at Massanetta Springs, near Harrisonburg, Va., which was attended by thousands of people, from four or five States and the District of Columbia. The great choir of nearly a thousand singers from a dozen or more cities, including Richmond, Norfolk, Roanoke, Hagerstown, etc., was heard by an auditnce of some five thousand people. The concert was in the open and was devoted entirely to sacred music. This is possibly the most significant musical event of the year in the entire South—certainly the most significant in the realm of sacred music.

Fall work in the Diocese of Washington will be started and stimulated by the clergy conference to be held at Camp Overall, Va., September 17 to 19. The central theme of the conference will be the Forward Movement.

The Summer Training School, Sewanee.

"The gift of the Sewanee Summer Training School in 1928 has enabled us to hold a summer conference in the heart of China," said Miss Alice Gregg, educational secretary of the Chinese Episcopal Church, speaking in the University Chapel Sunday night before the members of the Sewanee Summer Training School. Miss Gregg recalled that she had attended the summer school here in 1928, and had asked for an offering so that the workers of the Episcopal Church in China might have some of the privileges that are enjoyed by the church workers in this country who meet at Sewanee. The money contributed by the Sewanee Summer Training School has been used to finance several such gatherings in China, which have been enthusiastically enjoyed by the Church workers there. The Chinese Summer Conference for this year was held in July in Ku Ling, a summer resort in the mountains, to which many of the Christian workers of China come.

Miss Gregg spoke of the great changes that the last few years had brought in China. The city of Anking has been modernized to some degree, and they now have paved roads and automobiles.

"China is being militarized," she said, "and in twenty-five years will be as much of a menace to the people of the world as Japan, if that country should undertake a policy of militaristic aggression.

At the morning service in the chapel, the Rt. Rev. W. M. Green, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi and director of the Adult Division of the Summer School, preached a strong sermon on the text, "They came unto the sepuchre after the rising of the sun". "Life and death," said Bishop Green, "in the world of reality, as we know it, are bound up together indissolubly. The Cross of Christ is the symbol of life through death, and victorious over death. The sufferings of the present time are but a preparation for the glory that is to be revealed in us, and are not to be compared with it".

On Saturday night the members of the Adult Division enjoyed a sumptuous banquet at the supper hour, prepared by Mrs. Mary Eggleston, the dining room hostess of the University. Rev. R. A. Kirchoffer, of Mobile, presided as toastmaster. The theme of the banquet was "The Rainbow and the Pot of Gold". Most of the toasts were presented in verse, and aroused hearty laughter.

The Adult Division closed on Tuesday morning after breakfast, and the Young People's Division opened its session on Tuesday night, under the leadership of the Rev. Alfred Loaring-Clark, of Memphis, Tenn.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. Henry J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

"Service" is the Watchword of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta.

The Y. P. S. L. has translated the "S" into Second-hand, Service, Salvage". They issued bulletins to the congregation and their friends requesting them to send discarded furniture, broken electrical appliances, pictures, any household equipment, papers, books, magazines, or tires—or what not, to the Church. Since this is moving season in Atlanta, the members were delighted to have a definite place to put collected "white-elephants", as well as things they would no longer need. The young people are painting, repairing, mending and rebuilding some of the articles. The best are being used to furnish the Old Assembly Room as a club room. Here games can be played after the Y. P. S. L. meeting, magazines are assorted and placed where they can be read while waiting for appointments, books are being catalogued as a foundation for a lending library, and sewing machines are to be installed to be used by St. Mary's Circle of the Woman's Auxiliary.

St. Mary's mets each Friday and sews. The women bring their lunches, and the day is spent making layettes, or whatever clothing is most needed by Grady Hospital and other charitable institutions. This group also mends the clothes which are brought to the Auxiliary to be placed in the clothes closet to be given the needy. The Social Service workers of the city know of this closet, and send many a requisition for clothing for families they are helping.

Articles for which the young people have no immediate use are placed in the "Swap-Shop" to be traded for things they do need. Some are sold for money to carry on their social service projects.

Scout troops for under-privileged children also forms a definite part of the social service project of the parish. St. Catherine's Guild sponsors the Girl Scouts Troop, and the Church, under the leadership of a committee, headed by Mr. Foster Fitzsimons, sponsors the Boy Scouts Troop. Uniforms and other needed things for the scouts are supplied by the Church. The meetings are held in a hut built near the garden, which the kindergarten department of the Church School has planted and cultivates. Money for the troops' activities is raised by the various groups of the Church, and supplemented by a monthly contribution from the budget of the parish.

St. Luke's oc-operates with the Community Chest and agencies under it in the social service work being done in the city.

During the month of August the rector, the Rev. John Moore Walker, and his family are at Cape Cod. Dr. C. B. Wilmer, rector emeritus, is preaching at St. Luke's.

Horizon of Service Widened.

This spring several articles by the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, dean of the Pro-Cathedral of St. Philip, Atlanta, have appeared in the Atlanta papers. They were so well written, their subject matter so timely and interesting that they attracted the attention of one of the big syndicates. They approached the dean, asking for six articles a week, which will be syndicated, appearing in many newspapers throughout the country. And so now the Dean has added another task to his daily routine. Already several of the well-known magazines have asked the dean to submit manuscripts for consideration—rest and sleep are receding farther and farther into the background.

The dean's lectures in psychology, his knowledge of human nature, the Children's Missions he has held so successfully, his wide reading necessary for his sermons, and the course of lectures he has given at the Sewanee Summer School, his travels and varied experiences, have given him rich and valuable material from which to draw for this new field of achievement.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Rt. Rev. G. F. Mosher, D. D., Bishop.

From Our Bishop.

With the coming of the Commonwealth there comes a serious responsibility. Our people of the Church will have to take their part in electing members of the national government. To many of them this is altogether new, and it is necessary they should learn carefully what to do and how to do it. First of all, it seems to me, we should remember that no votes should be cast for a man merely because he is a Churchman: if he is not a strong man, able to do what he believes is right when everyone is trying to make him do something else; if he is not a man of experience who knows (1) what all the people of the Mountain Province should have for their good; (2) how to secure things fairly and honestly by action of the government; and, above all, (3) how to be honest and unselfish himself (like General Wood was, for example)—then he should not be elected. But if his character is good and his knowledge and experience sufficient, then votes should be cast for him. It is better, too, to re-elect him time and again and to keep him in office. It is a most difficult thing to govern a country, and the more experience in government that a man has, the better will his share in the government be. All Church members have a duty to be loyal citizens of their government—but I hope each and every one will work according to the leading of his conscience, and not let "politics" lead him into any action of which he will be ashamed. It is right, if one does this, for Churchmen to be active in politics—all, that is, except our Church workers. Catechists and teachers must keep free of all political activity, for their position makes it appear that they represent the Church. But all others should do all they can to see that the Commonwealth has good government.

Gouverneur Frank Mosher,
Bishop of the Philippine Islands.

SEEKING SOLITUDE.

William F. Rockey.

Speed me away from the noisy streets,
That I may commune with God;
I would climb the hills and mountains high,
I would walk on the leafy sod.

There would I view the scenery rare,
And breathe the air so pure;
And offer my thanks unstintingly
For His gifts which so allure.

Where all is designed to calm our souls,
Where distraction is unknown;
There let me be closer drawn to Him,
This I could best do alone.

Then with my spirit's strength renewed,
Return with courage anew;
To zealously work for God and man,
Be my years many, or few.

Fruitful will be our mission on earth,
If we all look up, not down;
Only by faith, with a purpose strong,
Can we hope to win His crown.

Jenny C. Muller, M. D.

On Sunday, November 25, 1934, there passed to her rest one of the pioneer Medical women missionaries—Jenny Constance Muller, of the S. P. G. and Cambridge Mission to Delhi.

So bound up is the life story of Dr. Muller with that of the history of Medical Missions that I may be forgiven if I recall the fact that medical work among women was started in Delhi in 1863—Mrs. Priscilla Winter, wife of the first S. P. G. missionary in Delhi after the Mutiny, distributed quinine powders and other simple remedies to women suffering from Malaria, etc., whilst she preached to them on the banks of the Jumna at the bathing festivals. Mrs. Winter was instrumental in getting out from Europe a qualified midwife with some knowledge of medicines, and a house in Chandni Chowk, the main thoroughfare in Delhi, was hired for a dispensary (1870). In 1885 the first St. Stephen's Hospital was opened, built in memory of Mrs. Winter. Jenny Muller was present at the opening ceremony as a girl of eighteen. She and other senior girls from the Lawrence School, Sanawar, Punjab, were being trained in Delhi as teachers for zenanas and other work. Jenny showed a liking for hospital work and was sent to Karnal, seventy miles north of Delhi, as compounder (dispenser), for the English zenana worker there was also doing medical work and wanted an assistant.

As she showed considerable ability, Miss Muller was given a scholarship for training at the Calcutta Medical School. Three years was considered enough in those days for acquiring sufficient knowledge of all branches of Medicine, and obtaining the Diploma Certificate, qualifying for practice in India. Miss Muller made the best possible use of her three years. She used to tell how greedily she seized on every atom of information from her teachers. "I told them," she said, "that I should have to do everything when I went back to Delhi; they saw I was keen and showed me and let me do things, and very grateful I am."

Miss Muller worked for several years, from 1891, in charge of St. Stephen's Hospital, Delhi, as the one and only qualified medical woman in that great city, she had to train every one of her assistants, both in dispensary and ward. With a scholarship from S. P. C. K., she came to England and underwent further training at the Royal Free and other Hospitals in London, and finally, after taking the M. D., of the University of Brussels, she returned to India, and was posted to Karnal, in charge of St. Elizabeth's Hospital. She later (1903) came to Delhi, where she worked till she went on furlough in 1916, seven years after the new St. Stephen's Hospital was opened. So worn out was she that, although she was only fifty, the doctors forbade her return to Delhi. She took a locum tenens in a London Fever Hospital during the war, and after a serious, nearly fatal, illness, she retired from practice and lived a very secluded life in the country, till the end came peacefully on the Sunday before Advent.

Such are the bare facts of her life, but what of the woman, the doctor, the pioneer? My first introduction to Dr. Muller was in March, 1903. I had lately arrived in Delhi and went over for the day to Karnal to be introduced to the medical work there, which was carried on in two fine old hired houses in the centre of the small town. An epidemic of plague was drawing to its close; for weeks the medical and other authorities had been fighting it—no one was so successful as Dr. Muller in treating cases, and, what was far more important, in inducing people to undergo innoculation. A few minutes after my arrival, I was allowed to exchange my dress for an overall and join the daily round. We proceeded through the incredibly narrow, dirty streets. A man servant went first to clear a passage; Dr. Muller, a large very sola topi on her head, came next, sleeves tucked up above elbows, calling greetings to friends and acknowledging constant salaams. I came next, carrying bowls and instruments tied up in a cloth, followed by the compounder carrying large bottles of medicine. Nurse Lydia, a Brahmin convert, brought up the rear, bearing two enormous bottles of disinfectant. We visited numerous patients in queer corners and hovels, men, women and children; dressed and opened buboes; gave much advice and encouragement, medicine and pice for milk; and returned to the Hospital, driving before us a crowd of people, some contacts of our cases, some, from neighboring villages where plague was prevalent. Dr. Muller, I remember, kept up a constant fire of exhortation in fluent Hindustani, often relapsing into bald village patois, scolding, coaxing, chafing, threatening, till she had induced all the crowd to present their left arms to her, as she stood in the Hospital courtyard, armed with the syringe, and received the prophylactic dose. The crowd dispersed, bewildered and holding their arms; we bathed, changed and sat down to a belated lunch.

See Dr. Muller again—it is Sunday morning in Delhi: most of the staff had been to early Service at 6:30 at St. Stephen's Church. Now, after the patients had been attended to, all are gathering in the big ward, for the Bari Miss Sahiba is going to preach. Most of the congregation sat on beds or on the floor, Dr. Muller in a chair facing them. The simple ward service begins, a hymn, a prayer, more hymns (bhajans). Then Dr. Muller reads the Gospel for the day, and, apparently without any preparation, she begins to expound, making live in vivid language the gospel story. For more than twenty minutes she never lacks word or telling phrase; her audience remains spellbound till she ceases, when there is a sigh and a murmur of Sach, sach bat ("these are true words"). A prayer, another hymn, and the congregation disperses. When asked how she acquired this gift of eloquence she would remark, "My dear, one of my grandfathers was a Lutheran preacher of some renown." Another day, not ashamed of her mixed parentage, she would say, "I think I must have had a Mohammedan ancestor, for I cannot bring myself to touch or like dogs." Another vivid picture I retain of Dr. Muller, bringing in her arms a poor waif found in the street covered with smallpox and flies and their offspring. She laid the child, a Mohammedan girl of nine or ten, on a spring bed in a small room near the street door, stripped off its clothes and burnt them then and there in the courtyard, bathed and dressed the child, and because she saw the sweeper look askance at her when she suggested he should swill out the room, she did it herself, plying the broom with vigor, sending a stream of disinfectant pouring into the street and narrowly escaping the Padre sahib coming up the steps to pay a pastoral visit.

While comparatively few now living in India can remember Dr. Muller's personal ministrations to them as a doctor, and her skill as a surgeon, many thousands benefit yearly by her labors in building the present St. Stephen's Hospital. No one who did not work with her in those last ten strenuous years of her life in Delhi can imagine what a marvellous achievement it was, to design, plan, and watch building, stone by stone, that pile of buildings, wards, general and private, out-patients department, nurses' homes, isolation block, doctor's bungalow, chapel, mortuary, and all the other offices necessary for an up-to-date hospital. As in later years additions have had to be made, these have been placed where she originally planned to have them.

For months before it was thought that a new hospital to replace the cramped wards of the old one would be possible, Dr. Muller had been thinking, drawing plans, pondering over every detail, and when the new site was given and the sale of the old building arranged and it came to the actual construction, she hardly left it night or day. Preparation was made for every contingency, endless time was spent on the construction of verandas, floors, lighting, ventilation and cupboards; there to be no ledges for dust, no footholds for monkeys, pigeons and crows (the common pests of Indian hospitals), no death-traps for crawling infants or delirious patients—all was carefully carefully conceived and carried out under vigilant eye, and woe betide the crafty contractor who tried to put in second-rate material, or the slovenly workman trying to scamp a bit of plastering or joinery.

These buildings have stood the wear and tear of twenty-five years now, and no one can doubt but that the foundations were well and truly laid.

As a colleague of Dr. Muller for many years, I cannot but feel conscious that this brief sketch depicts quite inadequately the personality of one who has left her mark on the land of India, who deeply loved and spent herself in serving India's women and children, and through them the Master who went about doing good.—The Mission Field.

NAAMAN.

II Kings 5, v. 2-15.

Monica Williams.

Ah, Naaman, wise thou wert to heed the little maid,
Who captive served within thy Syrian home,
And to thy wife sweet counsel gave,
Which caused thee to Elisha's door to come.

And yet as thou dids't stand without the door
Of Israel's Prophet, thou did'st fail to see
That God to thee could grant no more
Than thou wert willing humbly to receive.

And so thy leprosy still clung with grievous waste,
While thou in wroth did'st turn thy steps away
Because Elisha came not out in haste,
To cleanse thee in the way thou thought'st that day.

But let us not reprove thee for thy pride,
For we, too, look for great deeds to be done,
And often from small tasks do turn aside,
Which, too, for us would mean life well begun.

But once again thy Lord to thee did'st come,
And through thy servants bid thee think again
If some great thing thou would'st not then have done
If bidden thus thy healing to obtain!

Well went thou back to that small river's brink
And washed seven times in Jordan's muddy sream
But living water did'st thou truly drink
By faith alone through which God made thee clean.

"Prescious" Alumninum.

Just fifty years has passed since the capstone was placed on the Washington Monument in the capital of our nation. Pausing from its more weighty duties on Thursday of last week, Congress noted with appropriate resolutions this anniversary of its acceptance of this monument to the Father of his Country. The years that have intervened have seen many changes, and the capstone itself reminds us of a most significant one. It is made of aluminum, and was probably the first casting to be made from that metal in this country. When the engineer in charge of construction, Col. T. William Casey, was looking for a suitable metal with which to cap the monument, particularly one that would protect it from lightning, a German immigrant, Frischmuth by name, suggested this rare new metal. He declared that while it would cost more than a platinum-plated bronze cap, "it would not tarnish, is an excellent conductor of electricity, and it would raise much curiosity." His offer was accepted, and "after hard work" he succeeded in casting "a perfect pyramid of pure alumnum made of South Carolina corundum." It was displayed in a window of Tiffany's in New York before being finally placed atop the monument. The cap weighed exactly one hundred ounces and cost $36 a pound. The present price is around 20 cents. Aluminum was first isolated in pure form by the Danish scientist, Hans Oersted, in 1825. In the middle of the eighteenth century, Napoleon III commissioned the chemist Deville to find a way of producing enough of this new metals to equip the French army. Only enough, however, was produced to make the buttons for Napoleon's own uniform, and the cost of these was approximately $545 a pound. Several years ago a building, constructed entirely of glass and aluminum, was erected in Richmond, Virginia, to house the city's public utilities department.—Christian Sun.

The Bible and English Literature.

An excellent outline of the influence of the Bible upon English literature has been given by the late Dr. Walter W. Moore, in his charming volume, "The Indispensable Book." Says he: "There is nothing surprising in Coleridge's remarks that 'to give the history of the Bible as a book would be little less than to relate the origin or first excitement of all the literature we possess. From this storehouse of literary material our leading writers have most freely drawn." In all the long list of English and American writers, whose names survive, there is not one whose pages are not sprinkled with the words and figures of Holy Writ.

"Emerson, speaking of the Bible, as the most original book in the world, and affirming that it came out of a profounder depth of thought than any other, says that Shakespeare, the first literary genius of the world, leaned on it. In thirty-seven of his plays there are allusions to the Bible. Professor J. Scott Clark, in his study of English prose writers, says that 'Bacon's acquaintance with Holy Writ is almost equal to that of Shakespeare, and the works of both unite with many modern masterpieces in testifying to the value of the English Bible as a literary model.' Milton, as all know, is saturated with its thought and diction. 'I have found,' says Dr. Henry Van Dyke, 'more than four hundred direct references to the Bible in the poems of Tennyson.' In Longfellow there are almost as many. Browning's 'Christmas Eve and Easter Day', a poem of about 2,500 lines, contains 130 Scriptural allusions. They are found also in his other poems, even those whose subjects are not closely allied to Scriptural themes. Maccauley's essays are full of them. So, too, are the essays of Robert Louis Stevenson.

"Hawthorne, the greatest American writer of fiction, confesses that the Bible and 'The Pilgrim's Progress" were the main source of his inspiration. To Wordsworth 'the grand storehouse of enthusiastic and meditative imagination are the prophetic and lyrical parts of the Holy Scriptures.' Of Daniel Webster it is authoritatively stated that he did not think himself prepared to appear before the United States Senate in the delivery of his immortal orations 'until he had taken as a tonic the Eighth Psalm and the fortieth chapter of Isaiah.' John Ruskin, the great master of English prose, tells us that whatever of merit or power is in anything that he has written is due to the fact that when he was a child his mother made him thoroughly familiar with the Bible." One would almost be safe in saying that the Bible had made English literature what it is.—Rev. W. L. Carson, in Presbyterian.

"Believing As I Do."

Upon Washington's retirement from the Presidency in 1797, the Protestant clergy of Philadelphia, headed by Bishop William White, presented an address written by the Rev. Ashbel Green, in which occurred this tribute:

"In your public character we have uniformly beheld the edifying example of a civil ruler always acknowledging the superintendence of Divine Providence in the affairs of men, and confirming that example by the powerful recommendation of religion and morality, as the firmest basis of social happiness." . . . "We most devoutly implore the divine blessing on you in your retirement . . . and finally to receive you into happiness and glory infinitely greater than this world can bestow."

Washington's reply bespeaks the reverence of his spirit, his appreciation of religion, and of the ministerial calling:

"Not to acknowledge, with gratitude and sensibility, the affectionate addresses and benevolent wishes of my fellow citizens on my retiring from public life would prove that I have been unworthy of the confidence which they have been pleased to repose in me.

"And among those public testimonies of attachment and approbation none can be more grateful than that of so respectable a body as yours.

"Believing, as I do, that religion and morality are the essential pillars of civil society, I view with unspeakable pleasure that harmony and brotherly love which characterizes the clergy of different denominations, as well in this as in other parts of the United States, exhibiting to the world a new and interesting spectacle, at once the pride of our country and the surest basis of universal harmony.

"That your labors for the good of mankind may be crowned with success, that your temporal employments may be commensurate with your merits, and that the future reward of good and faithful servants may be yours, I shall not cease to supplicate the Divine Author of life and felicity."—New York Christian Advocate.

Responsible.

The dominant responsibility for the moral and spiritual condition of the nation does lie at the door of the churches. If the recognized mediators of the revelation of God to man sound an uncertain note, we obviously have no right to expect those who administer the affairs of Caesar to show consistent devotion to great moral or spiritual ideals. The power of Caesar is necessarily subject to constant approach by powerful influences of Mammon and greed for gain and selfish advantage. The Christian conscience must always exercise its largest influence upon civil government through its own consistent devotion and witness to the high and unselfish spiritual truths which it is its province to teach. Only as it contributes to the state of citizenship that seeks mercy from God and loves justice can they who rule follow such high principles.—Western Recorder.

GAZING UP INTO HEAVEN.

Acts 1-11.

Martha Young.

I have had glimpses of that Land,
The blessed Land of peace and love;
It is within reach of my hand,
Thence stretches to heights above:

The God-Within calls for that Realm,
With mere Presence would guide us there,
Save that we seize on life-boat's helm,
Steering we know not where.

FOR THE CHILDREN

A CHILD'S PRAYER.

L. R. Edwards.

Father in Heaven, watch me today,
Keep me in my work and play,
Fair and honest in what I do.
Remembering all I owe to you.
Keep my lips clean from naughty words,
And keep me happy—like your birds.

Letty's Adventure.

"Oh, dear," sighed Letty as she picked up the dish-towel to wipe the glasses. "If I didn't have to do dusting and practicing I'd start out in search of adventure; it's such a wonderful day."

"Good idea," said Bob, who had just come into the kitchen. "Glad you spoke of it. I think I'll go for a tramp myself and see what adventure I can find."

"If you will wait half an hour," said mother as she put the china dishes into the drainer, "until Letty has finished her dusting, and will take her with you, I will put up a picnic lunch for you both. You may be excused from practicing today, Letty, for you have been so faithful I think you should have a vacation."

Letty's feet and eyes both danced as she flew away to do her dusting, and by the time the half hour was over and Bob called her, she was ready.

Mother put the lunch basket in Letty's hand. "For my trustworthy daughter," she whispered, and Letty's heart swelled with pride to think that mother thought that of her.

On and on the two went, along the road, across the pasture, into the pine woods, then along the turnpike. But no adventure met their eyes. The road lay peaceful under the warm sun, the pine woods were as sleepy and quiet as ever, and not even a cow switched her tail in the pasture.

Bob began to get tired. "What is an adventure anyway?" he said. "They never come except in books."

"An adventure," said Letty quietly, "is something that happens out of the ordinary. I just know that if we keep on long enough we will find one."

Suddenly Bob stopped. "Pshaw!" he exclaimed. "I clean forgot the boys were going hiking to Brimmer's Camp today." He drew out his watch. "Just time enough to make it," he said. "You had better go home, Letty," he said. "Mother won't let you go in the woods or far down the road alone. You can go with me as far as the lane, then I will catch the boys just beyond."

Tears came to Letty's eyes. It had been such a treat to think of a whole day with Bob, and to hunt for that shining illusion called "adventure". Now to go home again and dust and practice and do all the hum-drum things that she did every day was almost more than she could stand.

She bit her lips, however, to keep back the sobs. Bob hated cry-babies, and if she cried today, some other time he would not take her, but it was a very mournful girl that stood at the head of the lane and watched Bob trudging off to join the boys in the distance.

"I think I'll go and look in the song sparrow's nest," she said. "Luckily, I have plenty of crackers in my pocket to feed them."

Suddenly she heard voices. Strangers were coming along the road. A man and a girl about her own age, each dressed in dusty khaki. They stopped when they saw her.

The man smiled as he said, "Did I hear someone speak of nests?"

So Letty told him about the pair of song sparrows who had built their nest in a blueberry bush, and how she had kept bits of bread and cracker for them.

She told how, little by little, they had grown so tame they would hop on to her outstretched finger, and even help themselves to bits of cracker from her blouse pocket.

She also said that she thought if they would be very quiet, she could hide them among some of the bushes so they could see for themselves.
